There was safety nowhere; and soon every street ran red with blood, and grew more and more encumbered with the bodies of the slain.

Sex or age, rank or distinguished services, were alike disregarded; men slaughtered even their nearest kindred with devilish impartiality; Catholic lads, scarce ten years old, rushed about with borrowed daggers to murder Protestant children in their beds.

Soon nothing could be heard in the city but the report of musketry, mingled with the cries and groans of the victims, the crash of breaking doors and windows as the houses were forcibly entered, and fiercely, continuously above all else, the frantic shouts and curses of the murderers. ~ Griesinger[437]

The Serpent Queen with the Royal family took to a balcony to enjoy the spectacle. Charles, such a fan of running down and killing foxes with hounds he wrote a book on the subject, took shots at fleeing Christians from his high vantage point.[438]

> Revolting as was the aspect of the streets, that presented by the stately halls and staircases of the Louvre was still more so. A few moments before the appointed time, Charles, with his mother and brothers, took their place on a balcony, to witness the opening of the spectacle.
> Silently he sat gazing into the still night, until suddenly the report of a musket immediately below was heard, and he knew by the signal that Coligny had ceased to live.
> Then the king rose, and, with frantic exultation, commanded the great bell to be rung. It pealed over the city, and, whilst giving its terrible message, the Swiss Guard were marshalled by their officers into two long-drawn lines, to be ready to strike down every Huguenot who should attempt to enter or leave the Louvre; another detachment under Coconna and Cruice, took possession of the corridors of the palace, and thence proceeded to search every chamber where Protestant nobles or servants were lodged, dragged them from their beds into the court-yard, where, under the orders of d'O, colonel of the guard, they were all put to death. ~ Griesinger[439]

There was an attempt at resistance but it was easily crushed.

> Many offered a desperate resistance; they were unarmed, but they managed to get possession of the swords worn by their murderers, and, at least, sold their lives as dearly as possible; some endeavouring to escape through the palace, were pursued by the Swiss soldiers from chamber to chamber, and felled to the ground without mercy. By four o'clock that morning, scarcely a nook or corner of the stately Louvre but was befouled with blood. More than two hundred of the bravest and most influential of the higher ranks of the Huguenot Aristocracy, and more than six hundred of the lesser nobles and knights, found their death there that night.[440]

The slaughter of the Huguenots was an opportunity for the worst of Paris to indulge their most evil passions.

> Whilst the hours thus passed within the Louvre, the massacre went on with unslackening fury throughout the city. No single house, where there seemed a possibility of a concealed Huguenot, but it was immediately ransacked.
> Every form of robbery, wholesale plunder, and violence, were superadded to this orgie of blood. The armed citizens and soldiers were joined by a vast crowd gathered from the vilest dregs of the populace, who seized with fiendish delight the opportunities thus offered to the indulgence of their passions. None of the reformed faith escaped... ~ Griesinger[441]

Although the bloodletting was scheduled to cease at daybreak, it did not. The gruesome events are difficult to read.

> At length the sun arose; but on what horrors was its light to fall! On every threshold the dead and dying lay heaped together. Blood ran down the streets as in a slaughter-house, and the Seine was so completely choked with corpses that no boat could cross it. Tens of thousands had been killed, still the work of death was not allowed to cease; it continued by daylight with the same fury as in the darkness.
> The actors in the dire tragedy seem to have lost every feeling of humanity, and to have revelled in its horrors like Carib Indians at some monstrous orgie of blood.
>
> Many wore in their hats, in place of the white cross, the ear of a murdered Huguenot; some tossed dead heads and hands to each other in grim playfulness; others formed in procession behind a cross, on which a Protestant babe hung crucified.
> Not until vespers had sounded[[cccxlv]] did the king give orders for the people of Paris to return to their dwellings; for, during the night, none but the royal bodyguard were allowed to perambulate the streets. Few, however, paid any regard to the order; and murder and robbery continued through that night and the next day.

That the king did not care to be taken at his word when he commanded the massacre to cease, we may conclude from the fact that, towards evening, he and his mother and her fair maids of honour went in a gay cortege through the blood-stained streets; and the gay laughter and pleased aspect of the royal party sufficiently proved the grateful nature of the spectacle offered them.

One Morning at the Gates of the Louvre,* Édouard Debat-Ponsan (1880). Wikimedia Commons.

The ladies appeared to find especial interest in inspecting the Seine, with its multitude of naked corpses thrown from the Louvre. The king, in passing the gallows on which the great admiral hung in chains, declared "the scent of Coligny's corruption was a sweeter savour in his nostrils than the perfume of roses and violets."

Whilst Paris was thus weltering in blood, like scenes were reproduced in the provinces, especially in their larger cities. On the nights of the 23rd and 24th, the king's messengers were speeding far and wide over the land, to bear the royal orders to all governors of towns and provinces, directing them to seize the persons and property of the Huguenots, and let loose the jealous fury of the people against them.

The officials obeyed implicitly with but rare exceptions; and thus at Lyons, Orleans, Bordeaux, Toulouse, &c., during the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth of August, as great a murder festival was held as that consummated on Bartholomew's eve at Paris. ~ Griesinger[442]

Anywhere from 70,000 to 100,000 French Christians were thus slaughtered and it gave the Catholics in Paris and Rome no little glee.

Even the corpses were defiled for profit.

Speculators turned the tragedy to profitable account by boiling down the bodies, and drove a brisk trade in human fat. We have no means of ascertaining the exact number of the Calvinists who perished; it is given respectively at 50,000 and 100,000. The truth lies, perhaps, midway between the two accounts; and we may conclude that about 70,000 persons were murdered.*

It was, therefore, no marvel the joy of the orthodox passed all bounds, and that the old man at Borne [Ugo Boncompagni, "Pope Gregory XIII"] was well-nigh beside himself in the greatness of the triumph. He took no pains to conceal his satisfaction; on the contrary, immediately on receiving the news, summoned the cardinals to proceed in solemn procession to St. Peter's, to give God thanks, whilst the cannons of St. Angelo thundered proudly, and the streets of Borne were illumined by bonfires. A great jubilee, and plenary indulgence was appointed by the Holy father, in his joy, on receiving the head of Coligny, which had been preserved in spirits, by order of the king, whilst he further rewarded his dear son with the title of "Piissimus," most Christian. [[cccxlvi]]

* The celebrated [Maximilien de Béthune, Duke of] Sully states the number of the killed at 70,000, whilst the historian Perefize [?], who wrote a biography of Henri IV., published in 1661, places it at 100,000. Of this we may be assured that the most sanguinary > campaign had never cost so much in human life; for in the capital alone, 10,000 Huguenot corpses were counted!

Although Antonio Michele "Pope Pius V" Ghislieri had helped plan the event, Ugo "Pope Gregory XIII" Boncompagni reigned during its execution. He was no less ecstatic.

> The news of the massacre was welcomed by Philip II of Spain, and Pope Gregory XIII had a medal struck to celebrate the event. Protestant nations were horrified. To explain the massacre, Charles, assuming responsibility for it, claimed that there had been a Huguenot plot against the crown. ~ Britannica[444]

We need no reminding that Felipe II of Spain was also a Catholic fanatic.

> He learned with wrath that Coligny, the Protestant leader, had almost convinced Charles IX that France should ally itself with the rebels. When news came that Charles had let loose the Massacre of St. Bartholomew upon the Huguenots, Philip rejoiced, and he hardened his heart against the Netherlands. He urged and paid for the assassination of William of Orange. He tried to buy the friendship of Henry of Navarre, but Henry proved unpurchasable. So Philip bought the Guises and the Catholic League, and dreamed of making his daughter the queen of France; then Spain and France, joining forces, would subdue the Netherlands, make Mary Stuart queen of England, and end Protestantism everywhere.

When Elizabeth sent aid to Holland (1585) and Mary to her death (1587), Philip, after years of bearing with politic patience the harrying of Spanish vessels, coasts, and treasure by Elizabeth's privateers, turned to war and bankrupted his government to finance the Armada. All Spain supported the effort and prayed for victory, feeling that the fate of that fleet would determine the history of Europe.

Philip took the ignominious catastrophe with outward stoicism, saying that he had sent the ships to fight men, not winds. But it broke his spirit and almost broke Spain, though he survived and fought through ten years more and Spain took a century to admit her ruin. He could hardly believe that God had abandoned him after thirty years of fighting for the faith; yet the dark truth must have come to him at last that after taxing his people into poverty he had failed in everything except the accidental acquisition of Portugal and the temporary repulse of the Turks — who had recaptured Tunis and were recovering power. Henry IV was moving to victory in France; the Netherlands were in irreconcilable revolt; the Pope refused to bear a penny of the Armada's cost; Protestantism held the prosperous north; England was taking control of the seas, therefore soon of America and the East; and that incredible virago, Elizabeth, was sitting triumphant on her moated throne, having outwitted all the kings of her time. ~ Durant[445]

Even Thériault in her overly-humorous account is forced to admit the ruthless reality, although couching it in the "suspicions" of the Huguenots.

By the time the massacre was over, Catholic mobs had murdered tens of thousands of their Huguenot countrymen. Henri de Navarre and his cousin Henri of Condé were spared, but only because they had promised to embrace Catholicism. The remaining Huguenots were convinced that the whole thing had been an elaborate plot wrought by the Serpent Queen; they thought that, in a deeply Machiavellian move, she had arranged her daughter's wedding to Henri with the intention of luring Protestants to Paris and then slaughtering them. Henri's conversion was the icing on her scheming, poison-filled cake.[446]

It took a literal river of blood (the Seine) to finally convince French Christians of the warning against all Royalty found in I Samuel 8:1-22: Now it came to pass when Samuel was old that he made his sons judges over Israel.

> The name of his firstborn was Joel, and the name of his second, Abijah; they were judges in Beersheba.
> But his sons did not walk in his ways; they turned aside after dishonest gain, took bribes, and perverted justice.
>
> Then all the elders of Israel gathered together and came to Samuel at Ramah, and said to him, "Look, you are old, and your sons do not walk in your ways. Now make us a king to judge us like all the nations."
>
> But the thing displeased Samuel when they said, "Give us a king to judge us." So Samuel prayed to the Lord. And the Lord said to Samuel, "Heed the voice of the people in all that they say to you; for they have not rejected you, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them. According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt, even to this day — with which they have forsaken Me and served other gods — so they are doing to you also. Now therefore, heed their voice. However, you shall solemnly forewarn them, and show them the behavior of the king who will reign over them."
> So Samuel told all the Words of the Lord to the people who asked him for a king. And he said, "This will be the behavior of the king who will reign over you: He will take your sons and appoint them for his own chariots and to be his horsemen, and some will run before his chariots. He will appoint captains over his thousands and captains over his fifties, will set some to plow his ground and reap his harvest, and some to make his weapons of war and equipment for his chariots. He will take your daughters to be perfumers, cooks, and bakers. And he will take the best of your fields, your vineyards, and your olive groves, and give them to his servants. He will take a tenth of your grain and your vintage, and give it to his officers and servants. And he will take your male servants, your female servants, your finest young men, and your donkeys, and put them to his work. He will take a tenth of your sheep. And you will be his servants. And you will cry out in that day because of your king whom you have chosen for yourselves, and the Lord will not hear you in that day."

Nevertheless the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel; and they said, "No, but we will have a king over us, that we also may be like all the nations, and that our king may judge us and go out before us and fight our battles."

And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and he repeated them in the hearing of the Lord. So the Lord said to Samuel, "Heed their voice, and make them a king."

And Samuel said to the men of Israel, "Every man go to his city."

According to one Catholic "historian", the Huguenots now began to question everything! They were treacherous; they claimed Catholic conversion to save their lives and then reverted back to being heretics. They followed Calvin to Geneva and sought true, Godly constitutional consensus government.

Catherine[[cccxlvii]] emerged from the shambles cheerful and refreshed; the King was now again her vassal, and the Huguenot problem seemed solved. She was mistaken. Though many French Protestants had accepted conversion as an alternative to death, these recantations proved transitory; within two months of the massacre the Huguenots opened the Fourth Religious War; La Rochelle and several other towns closed their gates to royalist troops and successfully resisted siege. On July 6, 1573, Charles signed the Peace of La Rochelle, guaranteeing the Huguenots religious liberty. Politically the massacre had accomplished nothing.

And now the Huguenot intellectuals, who had heretofore professed loyalty to the King, turned in horror from Charles IX and questioned not only the divine right of kings but the institution of monarchy itself. François Hotman, a Huguenot jurist, had fled to Switzerland after the massacre; a year later he published a passionate attack upon Charles, De furoribus Gallicis*: the crimes of that King had released his people* > from their oath of loyalty; he was a felon and should be deposed. Before the year was out Hotman sent forth from Geneva his Franco-Gallia*, the first modern attempt at constitutional history.* ~ Durant[447]

Prior to the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (not to be confused with the myriad of other massacres of Christians by Ruling Elite Catholics), the Huguenots of France were comfortable with mingling their calls for freedom of worship with professed allegiance to the Crown.

Unfortunately, however, it became brutally obvious that the "nominally Catholic" Medici / Valois in power were anything but. The French Crown was merely an extension of the Antichrist in Rome.

> When the prince de Conde issued his manifesto in 1562, he justified his rebellion[[cccxlviii]] by accusing the Guises of usurping the government. He soon had to shift his ground, however, as the government, headed by Catherine, gave up its conciliatory efforts. Conde could no longer maintain that he and his friends were simply defending the government against the Guises. In a second manifesto, he professed to be defending the nation's constitution against the government.
> The same argument was taken up by several Huguenot pamphlets in the late 1560s, but it was the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day and the role played by the king and his mother in that tragic event which made it impossible for the Huguenots to justify their armed opposition in terms of defending the monarchy. Charles IX had, on his own admission, ordered the slaughter of their leaders, even if he had not sanctioned the mass slaughter that ensued. Huguenots could no longer profess loyalty to a monarchy tainted by such a monstrous crime; a line could no longer be drawn between the king and his "evil counsellors". The hands of both were soaked in the blood of God's children.[55]
> As Huguenot survivors of the massacres threw off their allegiance to the ruling dynasty, they had to find a new justification for their action. They all believed that the massacres had been planned in advance by Catherine and her sons, particularly Anjou.[[cccxlix]] Xenophobia, or at least a deep suspicion of Italy, permeates much of the polemical literature produced by the Huguenots after 1572. "Among all the > nations", wrote Henri Estienne, "Italy carries the prize for cunning and subtlety, so it is in Italy with Tuscany, and in Tuscany with Florence." Catherine was seen as a disciple of Machiavelli, the quintessential Florentine, whose spectre had begun to haunt Protestant Europe. It was said that she had brought up her children on Machiavelli's Prince*, and that Anjou always carried a copy in his pocket. The massacre was interpreted as the application of Machiavelli's precept to commit all necessary cruelties in a single blow. Innocent Gentillet's* Anti-Machiavel (1576) helped to create the legend of Machiavelli as the author of text-books for tyrants. He was blamed directly for the French government's "infamous vices". ~ Knecht[448]

Deal With The Devil

If the Maggot from the Tombs of Italy did, indeed, facilitate her fruitfulness by a "deal with the Devil" it was most certainly a Faustian one as now, Charles, grew deathly ill.

Despite her fruitfulness, the Serpent Queen was fast running out of male children, with only Henry III and the youngest, Hercule François, remaining.

Upon the death of Sigismund II, the Polish and Lithuanian Aristocracy scrambled to install a Catholic monarch that would keep them safe and stable (the plight of the peasantry notwithstanding). They decided to forego another Habsburg and sell the Throne to France. This seemed politically shrewd as France was on good terms with the looming Ottoman Empire. Henry III was selected and "elected".

To the Polish and Lithuanian Elite, a half-French, half-Italian (Florentine) foreigner of dubious sexuality was far more appealing than a native who was neither of the inbred "blood of Kings" nor of unquestioning fealty to Rome.

Now the Merchant's daughter was seen as desperate. She needed Charles to stay alive but many still believed she had poisoned the King, if for no other reason than she was fully capable of it.

Three centuries later, a French Catholic expert in the occult would recount that the Serpent Queen had conducted a “Black Mass” to keep Charles with the living.

Alphonse Louis Constant (1810 – 1875) attended Saint Sulpice seminary in Paris but, supposedly, was distracted by “love” from becoming ordained.

Instead, he became an occult adept and wrote several instruction manuals on “magic” and incantations, but not under his own name. He assumed the identity of “Éliphas Lévi”. As a “Jew”, Constant was free to take his Catholicism to its ultimate conclusion.

In his book Dogma and Ritual of High Magic (circa 1855), he described the Satanic being whose supposed worship by the Templars caused the outrage that followed with their suppression 500 years previously.

“Baphomet” is a creature that is supposed to embody all duality; good and evil, male and female. The Luciferian gesture of the arms states the cry of Satan and all who serve him, “As above, so below.”

It was also in Dogma and Ritual that Constant / “Lévi” described the Medici Mass.

In spin so typical of Papal propaganda, the “almost Priest” Constant / “Lévi”, writing as a “Jew”, attacked another Catholic expert on the occult, Jean Bodin, as being a secret Jew whose only purpose was to attack Catholicism.

Constant / “Lévi” would quickly follow with a defense of his fellow witches and warlocks whom he lamented were slaughtered by bigotry. It would be a lament frequently repeated by his Russian understudy, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky.

According to Constant / “Lévi”, a beautiful child was picked on the eve of his “First Communion”. The ceremony was conducted by an “apostate Jacobin” which is spin for “Catholic Priest steeped in the Jesuit doctrines of Johann Adam Weishaupt”.

In yet another Faustian twist, even though the boy was ritually slaughtered, it availed the King nothing and he spiraled deeper into paranoia and despair.

> The Kabalist Bodin, Israelite by conviction and Catholic by necessity, had no other intention in his Demonomania of Sorcerers than to impeach Catholicism in its works and undermine it in the greatest of all its doctrinal abuses. The treatise of Bodin is profoundly Machiavellian and strikes at the heart of the institutions and persons it appears to defend. It would be difficult to conceive without reading it his vast mass of sanguinary and hideous histories, acts of revolting superstition, sentences and executions of stupid ferocity. “Burn all!” the inquisitors seemed to cry. “God will distinguish His own!”
> Poor fools, hysterical women and idiots were accordingly sacrificed without mercy for the crime of Magic, while, at the same time, great criminals eluded this infamous and sanguinary justice. Bodin gives us to understand as much by recounting such anecdotes as that which he connects with the death of Charles IX. ...
> Attacked by a disease of which no physician could discover the cause or explain the frightful symptoms, King Charles IX was dying. The Queen-Mother, who ruled him entirely and had everything to lose under another reign – the Queen-Mother, who has been suspected as author of the disease, even against her own interests, because hidden devices and undeclared interests have been attributed always to her who was capable of anything – consulted her astrologers and then had recourse to the foulest form of Magic, the ORACLE OF THE BLEEDING HEAD, for the sufferer's condition grew worse and more desperate daily.

The infernal operation was performed in the following way. A child was selected, of beautiful appearance and innocent manners; he was prepared for his first communion by the almoner of the palace. When the day or rather night of the sacrifice arrived, a monk, an apostate Jacobin, given over to the occult works of Black Magic, celebrated a Mass of the Devil at midnight in the sick-room, in the presence only of Catherine de Medicis and her trusted confidants. It was offered before the image of the demon, having a crucifix upside down under its feet and the sorcerer consecrated two hosts, one black and one white. The white was given to the child, who was brought in clothed as for baptism, and was murdered on the steps of the altar immediately after his communion. His head, cut by one blow from the body, was set palpitating upon the great black host which covered the bottom of the paten, and then transported to a table where mysterious lamps were burning. The exorcism began, an oracle was besought of the demon, and an answer by the mouth of the head to a secret question which the King dared not make aloud and had confided to no one.

A strange and feeble voice, which had nothing human about it, was heard presently in the poor little martyr's head, saying in Latin: Vim patior – "I suffer violence". At this reply, which doubtless announced to the sick man that hell no longer protected him, a horrible trembling seized the monarch, his arms stiffened and he cried in a hoarse voice: "Away with that head! Away with that head!" and so continued screaming till he gave up the ghost.

His attendants, who were not in the confidence of this frightful mystery, believed that he was pursued by the phantom of Coligny and that he saw the head of the illustrious admiral.

> That which tormented the dying man was not, however, a remorse but the hopeless terror of an anticipated Hell.[449]

Charles continued to suffer and seemed to become more and more haunted by the Bartholomew's Day massacre.

The French King died on the 30th of May in 1574. Most "historians" claim tuberculosis was the cause yet also admit he would frequently sweat blood.

Before he passed, he had several incidents which must assuredly have given his Catholic mother fits.

One was to deeply embrace Henri of Navarre, whose Protestant faith was forced out of him by the massacre.

> Catherine never showed regret or remorse over the massacre. In fact, she seems to have thoroughly enjoyed its results. The Huguenot party had lost its leaders. Henri de Navarre was her son-in-law and a king in his own right. What is more, he and Henri de Conde had become Catholics. The queen-mother's joy became manifest during a ceremony held by the chapter of the Ordre de Saint-Michel on 29 September.
> As she watched Navarre kneel before the altar like any good Catholic, she turned to the foreign ambassadors present and burst out laughing.[54] On 3 October he wrote to the pope asking for forgiveness and on the 16th issued an edict restoring Catholicism to Beam. Thereafter he behaved as if the massacre had never taken place, fraternizing with Guise and others who had murdered his friends. ~ Knecht[450]

It may, however, have been an act. Henri may have believed the Christian cause was better served with him doing whatever was necessary to attain the throne.

> Catherine tried to help [her son] Henry III by detaching his brother-in-law, Henri de Navarre, from the Protestant movement, but he was far too wily to succumb to her blandishments. He may have calculated that time would play into his hands. Events were to prove him right. ~ Knecht[451]

The British “scholar of letters” Isaac D´Israeli was the son of a Jewish merchant who emigrated from — where else? — Italy. He would sire future Prime Minister Benjamin D´Israeli as well as collect a sizable number of “Curiosities of Literature”. Amongst them is the rare account of Charles reconciling with Henri.

> Dr. Cayet is an old French controversial writer, but is better known in French literature as an historian. His Chronologie Novenaire is full of anecdotes unknown to other writers. He collected them from his own observations, for he was under-preceptor to Henry IV. The dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew took place in the reign of Charles IX.; on which occasion the English court went into mourning. The singular death of Charles has been regarded by the Huguenots as an interposition of divine justice: he died bathed in his blood, which burst from his veins. The horrors of this miserable prince on his dying bed are forcibly depicted by the anecdotes I am now collecting. I shall premise, however, that Charles was a mere instrument in the hands of his mother, the political and cruel Catherine of Medicis.
> Dr. Cayet, with honest* naïveté*, thus relates what he knew to have passed a few hours before his death.
>
> “King Charles, feeling himself near his end, after having passed some time without pronouncing a word, said, as he turned himself on one side, and as if he seemed to awake, ‘Call my brother!’ The queen mother was present, who immediately sent for [François] the Duke of Alençon. The king perceiving him, turned his back, and again said, ‘Let my brother come!’ The queen, his mother, replied, ‘Sir, I do not know whom you mean; here is your brother.’ The king was displeased, and said, ‘Let them bring my brother the King of Navarre; it is he who is my brother.’ The queen mother observing the dying monarch’s resolute order, sent for him; but, for reasons known only to herself, she commanded the captain of the guards to conduct him under the vaults.
> They went to the King of Navarre, and desired him to come and speak to the king; at that moment, this prince has since repeatedly said, he felt a shuddering and apprehension of death so much that he would not go.

But King Charles persisting on his coming, the queen mother assured him that he should receive no injury. In this promise, however, he put little trust.

He went, accompanied by the Viscount d'Auchy, on whose word he chiefly relied. Having, however, observed under these vaults a great number of halberdiers and arquebusiers in ranks, he would have returned, when the viscount and the captain reassured him that no harm should happen to him. The soldiers bowed, and their behaviour was respectful.

By a private staircase he entered the chamber of the king, who, immediately on perceiving him, turned towards him, and stretched out his arms. The King of Navarre was affected; he sighed and wept, and fell on his knees at the side of the bed. Charles embraced, and having kissed him, said, 'My brother, you lose a good master and a good friend. I know it is not you who occasions me so much trouble; had I believed what they said, you would not have been alive; but I have always loved you. It is to you alone I trust my wife and daughter; earnestly do I recommend them to your care. Do not trust the queen; but God protect you!'"

"The queen mother here interrupted him, 'Ah, sir, do not say that!' — 'Yes, madam, I must say it; it is the truth. Believe me, my brother; love me; assist my wife and daughter, and implore God for mercy on me. Adieu, my brother, adieu!' The King of Navarre remained till his majesty expired."

The following minute particulars are drawn from the journal of Pierre de L'Etoile. In the simplicity of his narration, so pleasing in the old writers, the nurse and the monarch*, — the religious remorse of the one, and the artless consolations of the other — become interesting objects.*

"King Charles, two days before his death, having called for Mazzille, his chief physician, and complaining of the pains he suffered, asked him if it was not possible that he, and so many other celebrated physicians that were in his realms, could give some alleviation to his disorder; 'for I am,' said he, 'cruelly and horridly tormented.' To which Mazzille replied, that whatever had depended on them had been tried, but that in truth God only could be the sovereign physician in such complaints."

"'I believe,' said the king, 'that what you say is true, and that you know nothing else. Draw from me my custode (or large cap), that I may try to rest.'"

"Mazzille withdrew, and left orders that all should leave the king except three, viz., La Tour, St. Pris, and his nurse, whom his majesty greatly loved, although she was a Huguenot*."*

"As she had just seated herself on a coffer, and began to doze, she heard the king groan bitterly, weeping and sighing; she then approached the bed softly, and drawing away his custode*, the king said to her, giving vent to a heavy sigh, and shedding tears plentifully, insomuch that they interrupted his discourse — 'Ah! my dear nurse! my beloved woman, what blood! what murders! Ah! I have followed wicked advice! O my God! pardon me, and be merciful. I know not where I am, they have made me so perplexed and agitated. How will all this end! — What shall I do? I am lost for ever! I know it.'"*

"Then the nurse thus addressed him: 'Sire, be the murders on those who forced you to order them; your majesty could not help it, and since you never consented, and now regret them, believe God will never impute them to you, and will cover them with the mantle of justice of his Son, to whom alone you should look for aid. Ah! for the honour of God, let your majesty cease from this weeping.' Having said this, she rose for a handkerchief, for his was drenched with tears: Charles having taken it from her, made a sign that she should retire and leave him to repose."[452]

Perhaps it's no surprise that one of the sources for "user-edited" Wikipedia's entry on Charles IX of France is Jesuit-trained Roman Catholic William James "Will" Durant (1885-1981).

Durant's "Story of Civilization" (Volume VII) would paint the same biased picture of Catherine de´Medici as most every other "biographer" as well as the “unforeseen excesses” of a massacre that was “initially done to protect the Crown from treasonous Protestant assassination plots.”

To Durant, Catherine de´Medici wasn’t a ruthless Florentine literally “Hell-bent” on ruling in France for as long as possible; she was a “puzzle” in character and motivations; a pawn to be pitied. She was barren and discarded by her heartless husband then, without explanation, she became fruitful.

Durant also painted her as caught between two equally dogmatic, equally powerful religions of fanaticism. She was only “rumored” to have played dirty with intelligence-gathering Aristocrat prostitutes and she was driven by wounded feelings to rule France with an iron grip for three decades.

> Descended from Lorenzo the Magnificent, grandniece of Pope Leo X, she was a typical Medici, with government in her heritage and subtlety in her blood. Born in Florence (1519) of parents who both died of syphilis before she was a month old, she remained a helpless and movable pawn in the diplomacy of her embattled relatives until her uncle, Pope Clement VII, gave her, aged fourteen, in marriage to the future Henry II of France. For ten years she remained barren while her somber mate devoted himself to Diane de Poitiers. Then children emerged from her almost annually, ten in all. She hoped and schemed to get them thrones. Three of them died in childhood; three became kings of France; two became queens. Nearly all of them tasted tragedy, but herself most of all, who lived through the deaths of her husband and three successive royal sons. Queen or Queen Mother, she bore the vicissitudes of four reigns, and survived them by prudence, self-control, and unscrupulous duplicity.
> A contemporary described her as “a beautiful woman when her face is veiled”[14] — that is, she had a fine figure; and Brantôme assures us that her bosom was “white and full,” her “thigh very beautiful,” and her hands and fingers exquisite.[15] But her features were rugged, her eyes too big, her lips too thick, her mouth too large. If she seduced men it was by proxy. Rumor accused her of keeping about her an escadron volant*, or flying squadron, of pretty women who might bring men* around to her purposes;[16] but this was apparently a fiction.[17] Wounded by Diane's dominance in policy as in love, she found revenge, after Henry's death, by making herself for thirty years the power behind the throne. Her finesse had to atone for the incompetence of her sons; they resented her interference, but their failure as kings compelled it.

Cast into the maelstrom of a religious revolution, surrounded by aggressive nobles and intolerant dogmatisms, she fought with the only weapons she had — Medicean money, Italian acumen, Machiavellian diplomacy. Machiavelli had dedicated The Prince to her father; Catherine hardly needed its instruction... [453]

Durant did admit that Charles, in his despair, blamed his mother for the massacre. He, too, acknowledged the King's reaching out to his "formerly-Huguenot" friend, but without quite so much Protestant fanfare.

Life itself soon deposed Charles IX. Good and evil in him had struggled to the point where a constitution congenitally botched had broken down from the strain. Sometimes he gloated over the hardihood and the extremity of his crime; at other times he accused himself for having consented to the massacre, and the cries of butchered Huguenots kept ringing in his ears, murdering sleep.

He began to reproach his mother: "Who but you is the cause of all this? God's blood, you are the cause of it all!" She complained that she had a lunatic for a son.[90]

He became melancholy and somber, thin and pale.

He had always tended to tuberculosis; now, his resistance weakened, it destroyed him; by 1574 he was spitting blood. In the spring his hemorrhages grew more violent, and he again had visions of his victims. "What bloodshed, what murders!" he cried to his nurse. "What evil counsel have I followed! O my God, forgive me! ... I am lost!"[91]

On his dying day, May 30, 1574, he called for Henry of Navarre, whom he embraced affectionately. "Brother," he said, "you are losing a good friend. Had I believed all that I was told, you would not be alive. But I always loved you. ... I trust in you alone to look after my wife and daughter. Pray God for me. Farewell." Soon afterward he died.[[cccl]]

He was not yet twenty-four.[454]

Did the Serpent Queen decide that enough was enough and hurry along the death of another son?

That same year of 1574, her personal necromancer, Cosimo Ruggeri, was tried for an attempted assassination of the King by means of sorcery. Inexplicably, the charges were dismissed. It was clear, however, his intimacy with the Queen made the occultist "magician" pas touché (untouchable).[455]

His accomplice was the Aristocrat Joseph Boniface de La Môle, who also happened to be another lover of the King's sister, Marguerite.[ccccli]

Unlike the Serpent Queen's personal necromancer, de La Môle was not protected. He was "quartered" (horses ripped his limbs from his body) and beheaded.

As a token of her affection, Marguerite kept her lover's severed head embalmed and in a small coffin (practices that fit in well with everyone else "at Court").[456]

How like a Medici that Catherine would use black arts to conceive her son, have a "Black Mass" in attempt to keep him alive and then murder him when he became a nuisance.

When Henry III was made aware of his brother's death, he quickly left the foreign squalor of Poland and rushed home to the perfumed Court of the Louvre. By then, even the Polish and Lithuanian Elite were glad to be rid of him. They half-heartedly warned that if he did not return to Poland, it would be considered a Constitutional abdication and they all breathed a sigh of relief when the warning went unheeded.

He did, of course, help himself to a consolation prize: the Polish Crown Jewels.[457]

It may not have been an act of robbery so much as an act of vanity.

The homosexual advocacy blog Gay Influence has a surprisingly honest and scholarly account of Henri's character (probably because it so suits the blog's agenda to be honest in his case).

> The twenty-three-year-old dandy Henryk Walezy[[ccclii]] (1551-1589) had served only two years as King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania when he received news that forever changed his life. His brother Charles IX (Henryk's bitter enemy), who happened to be king of France, had just died, leaving Henryk with a much better prospect. King of France trumped King of Poland any day of the week. Born

Alexandre-Édouard de Valois-Angoulèm in the Royal Château de Fontainebleau (built by his grandfather, François I of France), the outrageously vain and effeminate Henryk took a leave of absence from Poland to hie himself to Reims, where he was crowned Henri III, King of France, on February 13, 1575.*

The day after his coronation as the king of France, Henri participated in an arranged marriage to Louise of Lorraine, and it was expected that they would conceive a child. Never happened. Though Louise fell deeply in love with Henri, the sexual feelings were not reciprocated. Henri treated his wife as a doll, dressing her up, applying makeup to her face, teaching her how to flirt. Her mild and gentle virtues contrasted her husband's vice, vulgarity and coarseness. Louise soon learned that her husband was a flamboyant omni-sexual given to wild sadomasochistic orgies while dressed in drag. Among the passions he was unable to restrain was an obsession for outrageous jewelry. He surrounded himself with legions of twenty-something boyfriends, favorites known as "mignons de cœur" (darlings of the heart), and they scandalized the public with their effeminate mannerisms. They also copied their king's fashion innovations, protecting their hands by carrying small muffs, wearing outsized earrings and keeping pet parrots and monkeys. Even the king's fondness for lapdogs – especially small spaniels – was copied by his mignons. When Henri changed the style of his beard or moustache, his mignons followed suit. I kid you not.

A real fashionista, Henri changed his garments, jewelry and perfumes several times a day. He showed little interest in typically masculine pursuits such as hunting, preferring masked balls, parlor games and the intrigues of court life and etiquette (he introduced the use of a fork to the tables of France, an item of cutlery that had been in use while he was king of Poland).

In fact, the contemporary reports of Henri's untempered homosexual activity and effeminate mannerisms were so numerous and blatant that some historians dismiss many of them as politically motivated exaggerations. However, seldom in history had the homosexual activity > of a monarch been so public and undisguised. His harem of young male mignons was not confined to the royal palaces; when the king attended public fairs and carnivals, his fawning favorites accompanied him in full force. Not only did Henri dress in women's clothes, he did so in public.[[ccliii]]

> Throughout his life Henri had been controlled by his power-mad mother, Catherine of Medici, whose pet name for her son was "chers yeux" (precious eyes). She was responsible for setting him up on the throne of Poland. She had been the one to embroil her children in the hideous crimes of the St. Bartholomew Massacre of Protestants. Catherine was content to watch her son Henri occupy himself with frivolous fashion and childish games, allowing herself to control many affairs of state, marked by religious animosity between Catholics and Protestants. However, Henri's inability to produce an heir resulted in a succession crisis.[458]

The good news for the Serpent Queen was that Henri III was more interested in the latest fashions than running France. Even though he was of age, the "Maggot from Italy's Tomb" continued to rule as "Regent".

One thing the two shared was an interest in the occult.

> During her reign Catherine de Medici was also accused of practicing dark arts that she taught her son Henry. According to rumors Catherine de Medici showed great interest in occult. Her acquaintance with Cosimo Ruggeri, an Italian astrologer was one of the reasons why the Queen of France was suspected of dealing with dark, evil powers. Catherine gave patronage to the Ruggeri brothers and Cosimo was believed to be Catherine's own "trusted necromancer, and specialist in the dark arts". During his lifetime, Cosimo Ruggeri became well-known as a master of the occult, black magic and witchcraft. ~ Lloyd[459]

Hercule François: duc de Anjou et Alençon

Hercule François was the odd boy out of the Medici-Valois family. He had contracted smallpox at age 8 which had scarred his face. He had a slightly-deformed spine and had only grown to about 5 foot 1.

He was also at constant odds with his brother Henri.

His ambition caused him to be open to the Huguenot cause and this made both Henri and the Queen mother nervous.

William, Prince of Orange, considered him an excellent choice to become Sovereign of the Dutch Republic.

William, a German, had led the Protestant Dutch Revolt against the Catholic Habsburgs there in the “United Provinces”.

At first, William’s plan seemed to work, but Flemish and Dutch Protestants refused to accept Hercule François as anything other than a Medici-Valois French Catholic.

This frustrated the young Prince and he foolishly undertook military campaigns to bring key Dutch cities under his authority.

He personally led an attack on Antwerp, attempting to disguise his French soldiers as a “Joyous Entry” into the city. Unfortunately for him, the citizens weren’t fooled. The city militia had a ruthlessly effective ambush and defense that they unleashed upon him and he barely escaped with his life.

These turns, combined with word on the full extent of the St. Bartholomew’s Day massacre was enough for England’s Queen Elizabeth to call off their engagement.

Shortly after, Hercule François fell gravely ill with what many have considered was malaria. He was rushed back to France to reconcile with his mother and brother. He died on June 10th in 1584 before reaching the age of 30.

There may not have been as much motive for him to have been assassinated by the Maggot Queen Regent (especially as this placed “former” Protestant Henri of Navarre in succession to the Throne) but she is reputed to have written him after the debacle of Antwerp, “...would to God you had died young. You would then not have been the cause of the death of so many brave gentlemen.”[460]

Now a “former Protestant”, Henri of Navarre, was Dauphin.

By 1588, chaos had took France over. Catholic mobs ruled Paris and the Serpent Queen was barely allowed the freedom to travel to Mass. The King was forced from the city.

This was open warfare and the de Guises held the upper hand via the “Holy” Catholic League. The League was constantly being supported by the Papacy, Felipe II of Spain and the new insurgency of Jesuits.

As a result, an astounding thing occurred. Paranoia overtook King Henri III. He lured Inquisitor Cardinal Louise II and his brother Henri I (whom had brutally assassinated Protestant Admiral Gaspard de Coligny) to the beautiful stronghold of Château de Blois where Henri’s Royal Guardsmen murdered them.

In one fell swoop, the enemies of French Christians were cut down by the mania of their effeminate bisexual King.

This was too much for the Serpent Queen. In September of 1588, she fell ill with a lung infection. Henri used this opportunity to be at last rid of her influence and immediately dismissed all of the advisors she had hampered him with. On January 5th, 1589, the Maggot from the Tomb of Italy died.

Because the Royal family had been thrown out of Paris by Catholic mobs, de´Medici's body could not be buried according to custom but it was eventually interred (as all highly-thought-of Catholics are) under the pews and altar in the Saint-Denis basilica in Paris.[cccliv]

By August 1st of 1589, Henri had marshalled an army of Swiss Guards and planned to crush the Catholic mobs of Paris. A Dominican friar named Jacques Clément brought forged papers forth and was granted access to the King. He walked right up to Henri, feigning to whisper into his ear but instead plunged a dagger into the King's abdomen.

The Royal Guard killed the assassin on the spot but Henri's wound proved fatal and he died the next day, but not before he made his guard swear allegiance to his friend and brother-in-law, Henri of Navarre, now King Henri IV.

Ippolito Aldobrandini, "Pope Clement VIII", immediately excommunicated Henri but he quickly gained support, money from England and soldiers from Germany.[ccclv]

Henri IV won the Battle of Arques in September 1589 and the Battle of Ivry in March 1590 but the Catholic League held Paris.

Henri again decided to yield allegiance to Protestantism and vowed eternal fealty to Rome. Paris was opened and the Aldobrandini excommunication was lifted.

Loved by neither Protestant nor Catholic, he was still known as "Good King Henri" and he intended freedom of worship for French Christians by honoring the Edict of Nantes which he had signed in 1589.

Even that was too much and on May 14th, 1610, while his carriage was impeded by crowds, a fanatical Catholic assassin named François Ravaillac plunged a knife into his body and killed him.

France's brief dalliance with freedom to Christians ended.

Chapter 7

Erzsébet Báthory: The Protestant Vlad Țepeș?

March 1610: Holy Roman Emperor Matthias II of Austria dispatches his personal representative (Palatine), György Thurzó, to investigate accusations that a noble woman was committing atrocities in Čachtice (modern Slovakia).

Dracula enthusiasts are well familiar with what they've been told was his female counter-part: Erzsébet (Elizabeth) Báthory.

Born in 1560, Erzsebet (or Elizabeth) Báthory was the daughter of an Aristocratic soldier and the sister of Poland's reigning king. Her family, in fact, was one of the oldest noble houses in Hungary, its crest bearing the draconic symbol incorporated by King Sigismund into the Order of the Dragon. The Báthory clan included knights and judges, bishops, cardinals, and kings, but it had fallen into decadence by the mid-16th century, the royal bloodline marred by incest and epilepsy, with later family ranks including alcoholics, murderers and sadists, homosexuals (considered criminally deviant at the time) and Satanists.

Though physically beautiful, Erzsebet was clearly the product of polluted genetics and a twisted upbringing.

Throughout her life, she was subject to blinding headaches and fainting seizures — probably epileptic in nature — which superstitious family members diagnosed as demonic possession. Raised on the Báthory estate at the foot of the brooding Carpathian Mountains, Erzsebet was introduced to devil worship in adolescence by one of her Satanist uncles. Her favorite aunt, one of Hungary's most notorious lesbians, taught Erzsebet the pleasures of flagellation and other perversions, but young Erzsebet always believed that where pain was concerned, it was better to give than to receive.

> When Erzsebet was barely 11, her parents contracted her future marriage to Count Ferencz Nadasdy, an Aristocratic warrior. Their wedding was postponed until Erzsebet turned 15, finally solemnized on May 5, 1575.
> The bride retained her maiden name as a sign that her family possessed greater status than Nadasdy's clan. ~ The Encyclopedia of Serial Killers, Newton[461]

Any references to her religion are resoundingly "Protestant", yet all that surrounded her was Catholic, from Hungary to Poland. Recall that Sigismund's "Order of the Dragon" was a Roman Catholic knighthood whose mission was to serve the Holy Roman Emperor and the Papacy.

Báthory family Coat of Arms

More than once, serial-killer researcher and author Michael Newton states her family included "bishops" and "cardinals".

> The strangest and most vicious female serial killer of all time was probably Countess Erzsébet (Elizabeth) Báthory (1560–1614). Born of Hungarian nobility, Báthory grew up in luxury, surrounded by relatives who included kings and knights, judges, bishops, and cardinals.
> Unfortunately, her bloodline also included strong undercurrents of insanity, alcoholism, sex crimes, and black magic.[462]

Amongst aficionados of the macabre, Báthory is a household name.

However, discerning truth from fiction is extremely difficult.

It is sadly true that Medieval wealthy, landed Elite were free to commit unbelievably heinous acts upon the peasantry.

It is also true that they were equally ruthless amongst themselves in their never-ending lust for power. It was all-too-easy to frame rivals or enemies.

> Everyone by now has heard the story of the seventeenth-century female vampire serial killer in Transylvania — the Blood Countess, the female Dracula — Elizabeth Báthory.
> Elizabeth was once said to be the first "real" female serial killer — one who killed for sadistic, sexual, hedonistic lust instead of political or personal power. Her victims were not her rivals but mostly peasant girls employed in her service or daughters from minor, declining Aristocratic families. Elizabeth Báthory is special in that she is the only known female sexual sadistic serial killer without a dominant male partner — to this day, four hundred years later.

We have never had another quite like her.

It was said that she bathed in the blood of her adolescent servant girls in the belief that it nourished the beauty of her skin. She was accused at one point of having killed as many as 650 girls — many tortured to death in the most savage and cruel manner.

Portraits of Countess Elizabeth from her youth show a beautiful woman with raven black hair pulled back from a high forehead, smoky, almond-shaped intelligent eyes, and sensual, pouting lips. Yet there is a cruel curve to her mouth and her face exudes a sullen petulance that betrays an underlying rage.

Elizabeth was born in 1560 into the powerful and wealthy Báthory family in the eastern regions of the Holy Roman Empire — a fluid confederation of territories today roughly covering Hungary, Austria, the former Czechoslovakia, Romania, and other Balkan States, and parts of Germany and Poland. This included the region bordering Hungary and Romania called Transylvania (of Dracula fame, and not coincidentally as we shall see) where her branch of the Báthory family had their seat of power.

At the age of eleven, as traditional with the Aristocracy there, Elizabeth was engaged to marry when she would have turned fifteen a minor Hungarian count named Ferenc Nadasdy, five years her elder. A year before the marriage, Elizabeth became pregnant while "horse playing" with a peasant boy on her future mother-in-law's estate. After having the child in a remote estate and giving it away to a local family, Elizabeth finally married Count Nadasdy in 1575 as scheduled.

The marriage was a happy match, although Elizabeth's husband was away for years at a time fighting the Turks in the south where he developed a distinguished reputation as a warrior. Together the couple lorded over a vast network of castles, country manor houses, and palaces in Prague, Vienna, and other cities. At their country estates and inside the walls of their castles they had the power of life and death over their servants and peasants. The adolescent Elizabeth developed a reputation for excessive cruelty while disciplining her female servants.

Elizabeth used her power to torture to death in the most horrific and sadistic ways her servants, mostly peasant girls, burning their genitals with a candle; biting them to death; ripping their mouths open with her own hands; burning them with heated metal rods and rivets; beating them with whips, clubs, or iron bars; cutting and stabbing them; throwing them naked into the snow and pouring freezing water over them; pouring boiled water on them and tearing away their skin; hauling them up in suspended barrels spiked inside and rocking and rolling them while showering in their blood below; or closing them in spiked Iron Maidens like garlic in a garlic press.

Perhaps as many as 650 girls and young women were murdered over a thirty-five-year period — and at least between 37 and 51 in the last decade before Elizabeth's arrest in 1610 at the age of fifty, when she started killing not only peasant girls, but girls of noble birth as well. This led to her downfall.

When her castle was raided during the Christmas holidays of 1610, it was said mutilated corpses of girls were found strewn in the courtyard and in the basement of the tower. When the arresting party burst into her chambers, according to legend, she was found sitting on a stool chewing on the mutilated dying body of a girl prostrate before her. The Hungarian authorities ordered that Elizabeth be walled-in for the rest of her life in a castle apartment with only a small open port for food. After four years she died at the age of fifty-four, her legendary cruel beauty still preserved. The true story of Elizabeth Báthory, however, is slightly more complicated, but horrific nonetheless in its details. ~ Vronsky[463]

Arresting authorities bursting in upon Báthory as she was cannibalizing her latest victim is certainly the narrative one would need to cement her as a ghoulish predator.

But her punishment raises questions. In an age where no barbarism was off limits, it is said that Báthory's status as a female Aristocrat spared her from execution.

> While several of her servants were arrested and executed, a special law was passed to permit [the] prosecution of Báthory, who enjoyed the special status of the nobility. Even then, however, she could not be sentenced to death for her crimes. Instead, when convicted, Báthory was walled up inside a wing of her castle, ordered to spend the rest of her life there. Jailers found her dead on August 21, 1614.
> Rumors later spread that Báthory tried to stay young by bathing in blood from her victims, but no evidence supports those stories. ~ Newton[464]

Exile, seclusion and / or imprisonment instead of torture and execution is often the mixed "mercy" granted political prisoners; to be allowed continued life but guaranteed never to tell their story. Was she one?

Most damning of all, the legend of the "female Dracula" would not exist if not for the work of the Company of Loyola.

> Elizabeth Báthory would have remained merely an anonymous monster had not a Jesuit scholar, Father Laszlo Turoczy, discovered the trial records in 1720, about one hundred years after her death. Turoczy restored the legendary female vampire to human form with a name, identity, history, and detailed description of her crimes in a book published only in Latin.[110]
> It 1796, Michael Wagener, in a book entitled Articles on Philosophical Anthropology*, was the first to publicize the story of Elizabeth's alleged bathing in blood skin-care motive, stating that after a chambermaid noted some hair out of place in Elizabeth's coiffure, the countess struck her so hard that the girl's nose spurted blood into Elizabeth's face. When Elizabeth wiped the blood, according to Wagener, she discovered that her skin seemed rejuvenated. From then on she would bathe her entire body in fresh blood.*[111]

These details, however, often differed depending on the source. The most common version states that Elizabeth's handmaiden's blood spurted onto the countess's hand*. Moreover, the girls had to be virgins or of Aristocratic origins before Elizabeth would believe in the renewing power of bathing in their blood. What was the true story?*

It was not until the 1970s that Boston College professor and Fulbright scholar Raymond T. McNally, along with his colleague Radu Florescu, established rare access to Hungarian and Romanian archives (then still behind the Iron Curtain) that led to their hugely popular book, In Search of Dracula*, a history of the Transylvanian Prince Vlad Tepes, nicknamed Dracul ("Devil" or "Dragon") — the historical figure who inspired Bram Stoker's decision to name his fictional vampire "Dracula" and situate him in a Transylvanian castle.*

In the wake of the success of In Search of Dracula*, McNally returned to the archives in Transylvania and discovered an abundance of original documents from the trial of Elizabeth Báthory.*[112] It was not until 1983 that we began to get a more accurate glimpse of what crimes the Blood Countess was actually charged with, and the blood bathing became the first myth to fall. Nowhere in the trial record was there any mention of bathing in blood. It was local gossip and folklore picked up by writers in the eighteenth century.

But still, the likely explanation for how this myth took root bodes darkly for what Elizabeth was really into: She was thought to have bathed in blood because she was so covered in it after torturing her victims, it appeared as if she had bathed in it. ~ Vronsky[465]

Wagener is an equally interesting source. University of Berlin Professor Hermann Strack referenced Wagener on Báthory in his 1909 text, The Jew and Human Sacrifice: Human Blood and Jewish Ritual, an Historical and Sociological Inquiry.[466]

The blood superstition has often led to crime, in proof of which I have collected a large number of authentic documents. They are intended to show legal officials, ecclesiastics, and teachers that this superstition has not remained merely theoretical, and alien to our common life. And that it cannot be described as a peculiarity characteristic only of by gone times, but that it is a frequent cause of crimes perpetrated for therapeutic or magical purposes.

A. Murders. Michael Wagener, "Beitrage zur philosophischen Anthropologic, Psychologie," etc., II. (Vienna, 1796), 268, asserts that desire for beauty has been a source of inhuman cruelty, and goes on to relate : "A story of a Hungarian lady, which is very noteworthy in this respect, can be found in some Hungarian historiographers, e.g., in Ladislaus Thurotz, Istwanfy, etc. I detail the circumstances which are relevant here, both according to the afore said historiographers and (mainly) according to the existing legal documents."

"Elizabeth (Bathori) was excessively fond of making herself up to please her husband, and spent as much as the half of a day at her toilette. It happened, as Thurotz relates, that one day one of her chamber-maids once made some mistake in her coiffure, and received for it such a violent box on the ears, that the blood spurted on her mistress's face. When the latter washed the drops of blood off her face, the skin on the place appeared to her to be much more beautiful, whiter and more delicate. She at once came to the inhuman decision to bathe her face, nay her whole body, in human blood, so as thereby to increase her beauty and attractions.*

>  The name, which W. omits, I have filled in from Meyer's "Konversations-Lexikon[3]" II., 668: "E. B. (d. 1614), wife of the Hungarian Count Nadasdy, is notorious for the unparalleled cruelty with which, after enticing young girls into her castle, she had their blood extracted from them, which presumably was used for the beautifying of her skin, and in which she bathed herself ..."*
> "The Count Palatine Georg Thurzo surprised the Countess redhanded in 1610. The result of the examination showed that 650 girls had been the victims of this thirst for blood. A man-servant, who was an accomplice, was beheaded ; two female servants were burnt alive. The Countess was condemned to life-long confinement."

With this horrible intention, she took counsel of two old women, who accorded her their entire sympathy, and promised to assist her in the ghastly project. A certain Fitzko, a pupil of Elizabeth, was also made a member of this bloodthirsty society. This madman usually killed the unfortunate victims, and the old women collected the blood, in which that monster of a woman was wont to bathe in a trough about four o'clock in the morning.

She appeared to herself always more beautiful after the bath. She therefore continued her operations even after her husband's death in 1604, in order to win new worshippers and lovers. The wretched girls who were allured into Elizabeth's house by the old women under the pretence of going into service, were taken into the cellar on various pretexts. Here they were seized and beaten until their bodies swelled.

Not infrequently Elizabeth tortured them herself, and very often she changed her blood-dripping clothes and then began her cruelties anew.

The swollen bodies of the poor girls were then cut open with a razor. It was not uncommon for this monster to have the girls burnt and then flayed ; most of them were beaten to death.

She herself beat her accomplices when they did not wish to help her in her torturings; whilst, on the other hand, she abundantly rewarded the women who brought the girls to her and let themselves be used as tools for the execution of her cruelties.

She was also given to supposed magic, and had a peculiar magic mirror in the shape of a cracknel, before which she used to pray for hours at a time.[[ccclvi]]

Finally her cruelty reached such a pitch that she pinched her servants and stuck pins into them, especially the girls who drove with her in her carriage. She had one of her serving-maids stripped naked and smeared with honey, in order that she might be eaten up by flies.

When she became ill and could not practise her usual cruelties, she had a person come to her sick bed, [so she could bite] her like a wild cat.

About 650 girls lost their lives through her in the way described, partly in Cseita (in the County of Neutrau, in Hungary), where she had a cellar specially arranged for the purpose, partly in other places; for murder and bloodshed had become a necessity to her.

When so many girls from the neighbourhood, who were brought into the castle on the pretext of entering service or of receiving further education, disappeared, and the parents never received satisfactory, but generally ambiguous, answers to their enquiries, the matter became suspicious. ...

At last, by bribing the servants, it was discovered that the missing girls went hale and hearty into the cellar, and never made their appearance any more.

*A denunciation followed both at Court and to the then Count Palatine Thurzo. The Count had the castle of Cseita surprised, commenced the strictest investigations, and discovered the horrible murders. The monster was condemned to life long incarceration for the terrible crimes, but her accomplices were executed."

> [A Viennese pamphlet, communicated by Grimm, "Armer Heinrich," 181 sq. probably refers to the same episode, although the number of girls tortured to death is given as only 29, and the "beautiful and distinguished lady in Hungary" is alleged to have been "burnt alive in the public market-place" with the old woman who shared her guilt.]

"User-edited" Wikipedia adds multiple superfluous details to thoroughly connect Báthory to Protestantism.[467]

The entry states that she was a "Calvinist Protestant", as if to imply that she was so serious about it, she passionately followed John Calvin and not other "Reformers".

The hero who harangued officials until an investigation outed Báthory is a "Lutheran Minister" — a rival Protestant. The implication is that the legend surrounding Báthory had nothing to do with Catholics attempting to slander Protestants.

The slandering of Queen Elizabeth suitor Robert Dudley, however, is an excellent example of how Papal agents actively stretch partial truths to impugn the Vatican's targets. A brutal, spoiled, inbred Elite, nominally connected to Protestantism would suit Catholic propaganda needs perfectly.

Canadian film-maker and author Peter Vronsky has addressed Báthory at length, to include details as to the motive for her prosecution.

> Prince [György] Thurzo was related by marriage to Báthory's powerful family, who were all aware of the deliberations taking place in parliament [the investigation ordered by Holy Roman Emperor Matthias II of Austria]. (As was Elizabeth, who believed she was beyond the reach of the law.) Aside from their reputation, much was at stake for the family if Elizabeth ended up being convicted for murder or witchcraft — which the rumors of blood bathing warranted. Elizabeth's wealth and properties would have been seized by the Hungarian crown if she were put to death under those circumstances.
> Moreover, the Hungarian king had borrowed money from Elizabeth's husband when he was still living,[[cccLvii]] and as his widow, the debt was still owed her. If executed, the crown debt would be cancelled instead of being paid out to her surviving family members. Prince Thurzo had the title of Lord Palatine — meaning that he had the king's judicial powers in his regional principality — and Thurzo staged the trials in his own jurisdiction in such a way as to ensure that Elizabeth's property and the debts to her remained payable to all the surviving relatives. There emerged a vast literature in Hungary, particularly in the heady nationalist periods of the twentieth century, suggesting that Elizabeth Báthory was entirely innocent and a victim of a family plot to seize her wealth. Thanks to the discovery of more court transcripts and witness statements, Thurzo's correspondence, and other archival records in the 1970s, the real story of Elizabeth Báthory is now better known.[468]

Báthory's trial was kept secret save to a "Priest" here and there; either due to her status as an Aristocrat or to the corrupt nature of the proceedings designed to frame her. Neither reason is acceptable.

As we've already seen, Medieval feudalism provided circumstances where the Elite could take out any perverse, Satanic lust upon the peasantry and, seemingly, get away with it.

> ...not long before the rule of Bathory, a peasant uprising was quashed by the Hungarian king. Their young leader was kidnapped; hours later he was grilled alive on a fiery throne.
> His followers were made to eat part of him. Then they themselves were hanged. Certain members of the ruling class devoted so much time to creative methods of torture that it was almost a kind of entertainment, pastime, or sport. Unfortunately, the lower classes were generally treated by royalty as though they were mere animals and severe force had to be used to discipline them. ~ Morrison[469]

These are circumstances Rome works daily to bring a return of.

> The Magna Carta ushered in the "rule of law" (but only for the Aristocracy) creating a "due process" for criminal charges, representation for taxation or impressment into military service and punishment commensurate with the crime — which had to be proven to have been committed — as well as several other important precedents.
> Few know that one of the most powerful enemies of the Magna Carta was the Vatican.
> > The Vatican has consistently fought every democratic advance from absolute monarchies toward government by the people, beginning with England's Magna Carta (June 15, 1215), "the mother of European Constitutions." That vital document was denounced immediately by Pope Innocent III (1198-1216), who "pronounced it null and void and excommunicated the English barons who obtained it"[2] and absolved the king of his oath to the barons.[3] Encouraged by the pope, King John brought in foreign mercenaries to fight the barons, bringing great destruction upon the country.

It is also worth noting that both the Crusade that her husband Count Ferenc Nádasdy de Nádasd went on, and the methods of torture he, she and her investigators are all reputed to have used, are all resoundingly Roman Catholic.

The news of Elizabeth's arrest and charges did not become widely known.

A Priest's diary from the period, with detailed descriptions of events, only provides this short matter-of-fact notation: "1610. 29 December. Elizabeth Báthory was put in the tower behind four walls, because in her rage she killed some of her female servants."

The secret trial began within three days of Báthory's arrest, at Thurzo's courts of justice in Bytca on January 2, 1611. All the court officials and jury members owed their allegiance to Prince Thurzo. The plan, apparently, was to quickly sentence the countess to life imprisonment (in perpetuis carceribus — "perpetual incarceration") in a fait accompli while the parliament was on holiday to ensure that her properties were not seized or debt to her cancelled.

While the countess was locked away back in Cachtice, four of her servants were questioned at Bytca, including a session under torture to clear away any loose ends. Using the methodology developed by the Inquisition — which is said to be the first in history to use relational databases in investigative procedure[[ccclviii]] — the same questions were put separately to each prisoner, and then their answers carefully cross-indexed and compared. At the end of the interrogations, the servants were charged as Báthory's accomplices despite their pleas that they had no choice but to obey the countess's orders. ...

While at first it was believed that Elizabeth began her killing spree after her husband's death, witnesses testified that the murders began while her husband was still alive and with his knowledge and participation.

> At Sarvar during summer His Lordship Count Ferenc Nadasdy had a young girl undressed until stark naked, while His Lordship looked on with his own eyes; the girl was then covered over with honey and made to stand throughout a day and a night. [So that she'd be covered in insect bites. She collapsed into unconsciousness.] His Lordship taught the Countess that in such a case one must place pieces of paper dipped in oil between the toes of the girl and set them on fire; even if she was already half dead, she would jump up.

The accused servants who were in Elizabeth's service for a period ranging from sixteen to five years, testified that they personally witnessed from a total of thirty-six to as many as "fifty-one, perhaps more" girls killed. ~ Vronsky[471]

Wikipedia claims this of Ferenc Nádasdy's death[472]: On 4 January 1604, Ferenc, the Black Knight of Hungary died of a mysterious and sudden illness in the middle of a battle. The disease which killed the Count Ferenc Nádasdy is still unknown. It is known, however, that he had suffered a disease of the lower limbs for at least two years before succumbing to the illness.[5]

However, columnist, author and New York Public Library Research Curator Alexis Coe states:

> Ferenc was dealt a final wound as well, but not by Elizabeth's hands. He refused to pay a harlot for her services in 1604, who, in lieu of payment, punctured his body. After the deep laceration became infected, he was not long for this world.[473]

It is said that Báthory brought ruin upon herself because she expanded her appetite for killing to the Aristocracy...particularly, the Catholic ones.

> Elizabeth became brazen and careless toward the end of her killing career.

> While staying in Vienna, she ordered a renowned choir singer from the Church of Holy Mary, Ilona Harczy, to perform privately for her at her apartments in the city on Augustinian Street. The girl was never seen again and witnesses claimed Elizabeth killed her when she could not sing for her, either out of fright or shyness. ~ Vronsky[474]

Vronsky does give Báthory a fair assessment in how she was prosecuted.

> The case against Elizabeth Báthory herself was reviewed by a higher court five days later, on January 7 [of 1607], and Prince Thurzo himself testified before some twenty judges and jurors. Unlike the January 2nd lower court trial, the records of which were kept in Hungarian, the high court trial was transcribed in Latin[[ccclix]]. Thurzo and members of his raiding party described finding the still warm battered corpse of Doricza "ex flagris et torturis miserabiliter extinctam." ["whipped, tortured, in misery and finally killed"] Depositions from thirteen witnesses were heard. It is here that a witness identified only as "the maiden Zusanna" testified that a register was discovered in Elizabeth's chest of drawers listing her victims and that it totaled 650 names. Zusanna testified that in the four years she was in Báthory's service, she witnessed the murder of eighty girls. The hearing was presided over by the king's judge, and its purpose was to appear to gather sufficient evidence to sentence the countess to death, confiscate her properties, and cancel the crown's debt to her. Thus the testimony of Zusanna might have been entirely contrived for that purpose. Báthory desperately petitioned the court to make an appearance to defend herself, but her family blocked those attempts.[475]

It has been rumored that Palatine Thurzó cunningly cut a deal with the Báthory family who probably considered Countess Erzsébet both expendable and a nuisance.

> Elizabeth Báthory ... remained imprisoned at Cachtice. Despite the crown's attempt to hold a retrial of Báthory and condemn her to death, the agreement between Thurzo and Elizabeth's family prevailed. When she attempted to challenge Thurzo's authority, he condemned her in front of several of her relatives, saying, "You, Elizabeth, are like a wild animal. You are in the last months of your life. You do not deserve to breathe the air on Earth, nor to see the light of the Lord. You shall disappear from this world and shall never reappear in it again. The shadows will envelop you and you will find time to repent your bestial life. I condemn you, Lady of Cachtice, to lifelong imprisonment in your own castle."

Elizabeth Báthory was walled in her castle apartment. The exterior windows were bricked up and only several small openings for ventilation and food gave her contact with the outside world. On August 21, 1614, one of the jailers observed the countess collapsed on the floor, dead. All mention of her name in Hungary was prohibited for the next one hundred years. The memory of her faded behind the mists of the vampire and monster legends of Transylvania until her identity was rediscovered in 1720. ~ Vronsky[476]

What conclusions can we draw?

Holy Roman Emperor Matthias and his henchman Palatine Thurzó found Countess Erzsébet Báthory an easy target. She was nominally connected to Protestantism, the Emperor owed her money and she was already well-propertied.

Unfortunately for her, she was mentally unstable and her wealth and status greatly exacerbated her flaws. It was easy to take her excesses and expand them to monstrous proportions.

How "expanded" were they?

We may never know.

Chapter 8

Aqua Tofana: The Catholic Black Widow of Sicily

> July 12th, 1633: Sicilian Thofania d´Adamo is executed for murdering her husband, Francis. She was suspected to have used an untraceable poison which she probably passed on to her daughter, Giulia Tofana. Tofana perfected it as a topical, extremely potent toxin and began distributing it under cover of a well-known relic of "the Catholic Santa Claus".

There's no such thing as a "classic".

If a work or the one who made it is a household name, there is an excellent chance the most powerful and corrupting force of all time — Rome — wants it so.

Even those who know little of music have heard of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.

Mozart was a devoted Catholic whose work frequently glorified his religion.

Mozart was also a Freemason.[477] This winning combination (feigned "war between the two" aside) guaranteed the composer legendary status.

Freemasonry provides Rome with an army of "non-Catholics", many of whom portend to be "Christians" or "Protestants" though "The Craft" is Luciferian and is completely incompatible with dedication to Jesus Christ.

> Freemasonry, like any secret society, is a gateway organization. If aspiring men wish access to power, they must prove they will be dedicated to the agenda of the Luciferian Elite by being inducted into such a society and showing as they rise through the degrees that they will dutifully serve Satan. That may sound inflammatory but that is, essentially, the truth and it is born out in the ancient rituals memorized and conducted by the acolytes.

In this, the Freemasons sound very much like the Jesuits and perhaps with good reason. Secret societies not connected to Rome provide the Church with both plausible deniability as well as the comfort of keeping heretics at arm's length. ...

The Jesuit guidebook Secreta Monita gives instructions regarding the use of front groups and on how to hide behind prominent individuals.

> The society can also usefully trade, under the name of rich merchants attached to us; but certain and abundant gain is to be looked at, as in the Indies, which have furnished the society not only souls but thus far also much wealth through the favor of God. ~ Secreta Monita[1558]

But what makes these efforts so successful is that the adherents within the secret societies so willingly conform to their Luciferian agendas.

For Freemasons, Bacon's "New Atlantis" was a powerful ideal of gnostic nirvana; Salvation by secret knowledge. It is this reason that causes them to parse "the devil" from "Lucifer, the bearer of light" yet they serve one and the same. ...

The Catholic Church teaches vehement opposition to Freemasonry, as Jesuit Priest Robert Bradley tells us;

> What is the truth regarding the present official attitude of the Catholic Church toward Freemasonry? To begin this inquiry into that which is now in effect, we should go back to what was stated in the Church's canon law before there was any doubt about where the Church stood on Masonry. The former code (which, incidentally, was promulgated on Pentecost, May 27, 1917, just two weeks after Our Lady's first apparition at Fatima) contained a canon which definitely capped all the previous papal condemnations of it. Canon 2335 reads as follows: Persons joining associations of the Masonic sect or any others of the same kind which plot against the Church and legitimate civil authorities contract <ipso facto> excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See.

How is it possible for a Catholic to become initiated into Freemasonry if the Masons are Rome's "mortal enemies"?

Does the "G" in the center of the masonic compass and square stand for "Gnosticism", or "Gesu" as in the Italian of "Society of Jesus": Compagnia di Gesù?

Author John Daniel considers the Illuminati and the Freemasons to be the Jesuits' greatest weapons.

> The truth is, the Jesuits of Rome have perfected Freemasonry to be their most magnificent and effective tool, accomplishing their purposes among Protestants, yet remaining completely hidden and unknown. But when you decipher their Occult symbols of the Illuminati and Freemasonry that you see in Washington D.C. and on the U.S. Great Seal, then you discover the workings and intentions of Rome that she so secretly and amazingly works behind. One of the most startling, when you understand what it means, is the pyramid and its capstone, "not sitting in place", that makes up the reverse of the American Great Seal and as seen on the back of one dollar bills. That "Pyramid", which represents the heart and soul of Babylonian Sun Worship, and its "Great Work", that is carried on by Romanism, is unfinished! Why? Because the "Capstone", which represents the Novus Ordo Seclorum, or New World Order, is not yet in place. Which also means however, that Rome's timeclock, ever since the birth of this nation, has been ticking; anticipating for over two hundred years, the date when the Capstone "will" be put into place.
> This special event, will "signal" or herald the "beginning" of the so called triumph of Mary which proclaims the victory of Rome for dominating the whole world. The Virgin Mary, who is actually Rome's Isis, will become Rome's central figure, used to deceive and rally the earth's inhabitants; compelling them to submit to the

New Order of things. Consequently, it will bring on the need to immediately revive the diabolical Holy Inquisition with unprecedented powers and brutality to rid the earth of dissenters.[1563]

It's hard to accept that Freemasons are the "mortal enemies" of the Catholic Church when so many high-profile Catholics have partaken of "the Craft". A sampling of these names include—

* Pierre Charles L´Enfante (1754 – 1825): architect of "Washington D.C.", one of the most gnostically-designed cities in the world, save its twin sister, Rome.
* The aforementioned Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756 – 1791).
* Assassin John Wilkes Booth (1838 – 1865), member of Albert Pike's "Knights of the Golden Circle" and secret Roman Catholic[479].

* William Frederick “Buffalo Bill” Cody (1846 – 1917), “Templar Freemason” and Catholic.
* Sir Arthur Ignatius Conan Doyle (1859 – 1930): author of the Sherlock Holmes series and The Lost World.
* Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Pacelli / Pope Pius XII (1876 – 1958): as Nuncio to Prussia and Germany from 1920 – 1930, Pacelli was instrumental in creating the Nazi 3rd Reich.
* Actor Walter Brennan (1894 – 1974); John Birch Society Roman Catholic and Freemason.
* Hall of Fame baseball player George Herman “Babe” Ruth Jr. (1895 – 1948): Knight of Columbus and Freemason.
* Enrico Fermi (1901 – 1954), “father” of “physics” and “nuclear reactors”[cccl x].
* Actor Marion “John Wayne” Morrison (1907 – 1979), also a member of the Jacques de Molay Society for Boys.
* Lebanese Catholic actor and comedian Amos Muzyad Yaqoob “Danny Thomas” Kairouz (1912 – 1991).
* Actor Ermes Effron “Ernie Borgnine” Borgnino (1917 – 2012).
* Comedian Richard Franklin Lennox Thomas Pryor (1940 – 2005); mother raised him strict Catholic (and sexually abused him), he was an open bisexual and a Freemason.
* Politician Terry Branstad (1946 –), Gov. of Iowa, Donald Trump’s Ambassador to China, mother a Jew, father a Lutheran, but he converted Catholic and became a Knight of Columbus; also Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry “Knight Commander of the Court of Honor”.
* Politician Steve Scalise (1965 –); highly-publicized victim of the 2017 Congressional baseball shooting (a bush-league false flag).
* Comedian Christopher Ashton Kutcher (1978 –); Congressional “expert” on child trafficking[480], [ccclxi].

In 1791, Mozart was writing the liturgy for his Requiem Mass when he fell gravely ill.

Convinced that there was no chance of recovery, he > began to speak of death, and asserted that he was setting the Requiem for himself… "I feel definitely," he continued, "that I will not last much longer; I am sure that I have been poisoned. I cannot rid myself of this idea… Someone has given me acqua tofana and calculated the precise time of my death.

University of Huddersfield (a publicly-funded college in the U.K.) Professor William Stafford has written on Mozart's death. Not surprisingly, most of his references have a positive-yet-hidden Catholic spin.

> His wife [Constanze], seeing that the Requiem was oppressing his mind, took away the score. His health improved for a while, and he was able to complete a Masonic cantata which was well received. This cheered him up, and his wife allowed him to resume work on the Requiem. But his illness returned, and he took to his bed. His hands and feet swelled, he was in great pain and partly paralysed, there was constant vomiting. He even had to ask them to remove his canary, because the sound of its singing distressed his nerves. The success of Die Zauberflöte pleased and at the same time saddened him, for he knew he would not live to enjoy his triumph. In the evenings, his watch beside him, he followed in imagination the progress of the opera he would never hear again. He continued to work on the Requiem, advising [Austrian composer and conductor Franz Xaver — "Francis Xavier"] Süßmayr as to its completion.[[ccclxii]] On the very day before his death he held a rehearsal of the score with a few friends; but when they reached the Lacrymosa he broke down in tears. ...
> [According to devout Roman Catholic "philosopher" Georg Friedrich Daumer[482] in 1861:] For thousands of years a secret conspiratorial organization has been active in the world; it became especially vigorous in the eighteenth century.
> "Human society is occupied and infested by a ghastly and terrible worm, pervaded and imbued by a secret conspiracy, which has turned the ground on which we walk into a volcano, continually threatening eruption and devastation."[8]

> [Daumer now lists every boogeyman outside the Catholic Church, all of whom are agents for Rome, anyway] It has appeared in many forms — for example, the Freemasons, the Illuminati, the Jacobins and the Carbonari[[cccLxiii]] — but its inner esence is hidden, even from the mass of the "initiated", in the deepest darkness. Its aims are world domination, free love and the worship of nature. It masquerades behind the ideals of freedom and equality, but in truth seeks a new order of power and domination; it has a low view of the common people and of women, wishing to reduce them to a degraded and bestial condition. It is ready to use violent means to attain its ends. It fears only one enemy, namely Christianity. The leading members of the antichrist party — for example Hume, Voltaire, Condorcet and Proudhon were all members. At its head is a secret triumvirate: the God-man or Man-god, and below him the world-bishop and the world-emperor — perhaps the last is Karl Marx in London.
> Mozart was drawn into the toils of this organization when, in all innocence, he became a freemason.[[cccLxiv]] Die Zauberflote is manifestly a masonic opera symbolizing the struggle against Christianity and the Catholic church. But the masonic propaganda of the opera is challenged and subverted by Mozart's doubts. His nature was deeply religious, and for the duet of the armed men he smuggled in a Christian chorale. Sarastro is not unambiguously praised, but appears as a kidnapper. Mozart had come to be at odds with the masons; this is most clearly revealed by his plan to found a rival order, Die Grotte*, as reported in a letter from* [his wife] Constanze to Breitkopf & Hartel[[cccLxv]] in 1799.[9] Tragically he took his friend, the clarinettist Stadler, into his confidence and the latter betrayed him. Therefore he was poisoned, like Leopold II and Lessing. Most of his masonic brothers were not involved; it was the work of those hidden in the inner recesses of the order, perhaps using Stadler as their agent to administer the poison. His estrangement from the order is revealed, however, by the fact that they did not help Constanze with the funeral expenses, but allowed him to be buried like a dog.[483]

As to Mozart's opera Die Zauberflöte, "The Magic Flute", Wikipedia summarizes:

> In this opera, the Queen of the Night persuades Prince Tamino to rescue her daughter Pamina from captivity under the high Priest Sarastro; instead, he learns the high ideals of Sarastro's community and seeks to join it. Separately, then together, Tamino and Pamina undergo severe trials of initiation, which end in triumph, with the Queen and her cohorts vanquished. The earthy Papageno, who accompanies Tamino on his quest, fails the trials completely but is rewarded anyway with the hand of his ideal female companion Papagena.[484]

Many rank-and-file Masons fall for the propaganda that they are at "war" with the Catholic Church, despite their own lore happily tracing its way through some of Rome's most dedicated soldiery; the Templars.

What any of this has to do with a "Magic Flute" only an "innocent" Freemason can say.

Aqua Tofana

Little is known about Giulia Tofana.

> So, who was Giulia Tofana outside of being the prolific creator of a widow-maker poison? In many ways, one of history's most prolific serial killers remains a mystery. There are no portraits of Giulia. During the mid-1600s, Giulia sold cosmetics in southern Italy — and her special recipes for Aqua Tofana contained enough arsenic to kill without leaving a trace. Her goal was to keep her poison secret so that she could continue to sell the potent concoction. And she managed to fool the authorities for nearly 50 years. ~ Carlton[485]

Tofana is reputedly the daughter of murderess Thofania d´Adamo, also a poisoner though this, too, is in dispute.

However, the clues seem to bear these facts out. As the blog "Unknown Gender History" puts it[486] — This monster, while still a young girl, by some means or other became possessed of a recipe for a mixture of which from four to eight drops were fatal. This liquid, which has become known under the name of "Tofana Water," has been described as clear, tasteless, colourless, and odourless. It was of such a nature that it battled the cleverest medical men of the time, and the acutest analysts were utterly unable to testify to its presence in the organs of one of its victims, after the most searching post-mortem examination.

The supposed motive for Tofana's profession was that women of Medieval Europe, and especially Italy, were treated as possessions of men; no better than slaves. Under misogynist abuse, Tofana (along with a confederacy of other women poisoners that may have included an order of nuns) offered a "solution".

> The first dose, administered in wine or tea or some other liquid by the flattering traitress, produced but a scarcely noticeable effect; the husband became a little out of sorts, felt weak and languid, so little indisposed that he would scarcely call in a medical man; but, if he did, it was only to be told it was a mere nothing, which a draught or two would put to rights.
> After the second dose of poison, this weakness and languor became more pronounced, and the doctor would begin to think that, after all, the patient required to be put on a course of diet and rest.
>
> The beautiful Medea who expressed so much anxiety for her husband's indisposition would scarcely be an object of suspicion, and perhaps would prepare her husband's food, as prescribed by the doctor, with her own fair hands.
>
> In this way the third drop would be administered, and would prostrate even the most vigorous man.
>
> The doctor would be completely puzzled to see that the apparently simple ailment did not surrender to his drugs, and while he would be still in the dark as to its nature, other doses would be given, until at length death would claim the victim for its own.
> Then, when too late, the dreadful word " poison" would be uttered, upon which, of course, to save her fair fame, the wife would demand a post-mortem examination. Result, nothing — except that the woman was able to pose as a slandered innocent, and then it would be remembered that her husband died without either pain, inflammation, fever, or spasms.

> If, after this, the woman within a year or two formed a new connection, nobody could blame her; for, everything considered, it would be a sore trial for her to continue to bear the name of a man whose relatives had accused her of poisoning him.[487]

The writer of the article calls themselves “St. Estephe” which is a wine town in the Bordeaux region of France. According to one wine expert[488], the Catholic “Saint Stephen” in question is “Saint Stephen of Calonne, Patron Saint of stone masons”.[cccLxvi]

> Giulia created a poison she called Aqua Tofana. Its exact composition is unknown, but it is known that arsenic, belladonna, and lead were components of the mixture; ingredients that were also used in the cosmetics of the time.
>
> Lead and arsenic were common ingredients for facial powders to lighten the skin, and women used a drop of belladonna in each eye to dilate their pupils, giving their eyes a luminous and arresting look. All of these substances, however, are also highly toxic when ingested.
>
> The concoction was said to have no odor, scent, or taste, which made it very easy for an unhappy wife to slip a little into her husband’s food or drink. ...
>
> She practiced her craft stealthily for decades. Aqua Tofana was sold for nearly 50 years disguised as a cosmetic powder or in vials as a devotional object called “Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari.”
>
> Giulia’s daughter joined her in the business and they kept their work quiet as they moved from Palermo to Naples and then to Rome. ~ Harvey[489]

Of course, not every Italian is Catholic, but Catholicism is deeply insinuated in many nations such as Italy and even the entire continent of South America.

In Ireland, 90% of the schools are run by the Catholic Church, even taxpayer-funded ones.[490]

Ownership of infrastructure like schools, hospitals and orphanages is how the Vatican conducts some of its most heinous crimes against children and Catholic agents in government make it all possible.

However, there are several parts of the Giulia Tofana narrative that suggest she was not only Catholic, but in league with her clergy.

An explanation is given by the “St. Nicholas Center” web site.

> The true story of Santa Claus begins with Nicholas, who was born during the third century in the village of Patara in Asia Minor.
>
> At the time the area was Greek and is now on the southern coast of Turkey.
>
> His wealthy parents, who raised him to be a devout Christian, died in an epidemic while Nicholas was still young.
>
> Obeying Jesus’ words to “sell what you own and give the money to the poor,” Nicholas used his whole inheritance to assist the needy, the sick, and the suffering. He dedicated his life to serving God and was made Bishop of Myra while still a young man.
>
> Bishop Nicholas became known throughout the land for his generosity to those in need, his love for children, and his concern for sailors and ships.
>
> Under the Roman Emperor Diocletian, who ruthlessly persecuted Christians, Bishop Nicholas suffered for his faith, was exiled and imprisoned. The prisons were so full of bishops, Priests, and deacons, there was no room for the real criminals—murderers, thieves and robbers.
>
>
> He died December 6, AD 343 in Myra and was buried in his cathedral church, where a unique relic, called manna, formed in his grave. This liquid substance, said to have healing powers, fostered the growth of devotion to Nicholas.
>
> The anniversary of his death became a day of celebration, St. Nicholas Day, December 6th (December 19 on the Julian Calendar).[491]

In regards to the “miracle mana”, the “St. Nicholas Center” says this:

> The “manna of Saint Nicholas” which was once commonly called “oil” is actually transparent pure water that is formed in the tomb of the Saint in the crypt of the Basilica in Bari.
>
> This phenomenon is not easily explainable. It is absolutely excluded that there is some kind of infiltration of water from the outside for it has been proven that the casket containing the bones of the Saint is impermeable.
>
> Notwithstanding the various solutions that are arrived at from numerous hypothesis forwarded, whether supernatural or natural explanations of the phenomenon, the manna is an authentic relic, because it is a liquid that remained in contact with the bones of the Saint, and therefore explains the very reason why there is such a great devotion springing up from this relic.
>
> The manna also exuded in the tomb of the Basilica of Myra immediately after the death of Saint Nicholas, as attested to by numerous biographies and eulogies, all are in accord of the exemplary virtue of the miracle worker.
>
> The Legends of the translation likewise affirm that the urn containing the remains of Saint Nicholas of Myra was full of “manna”.
>
>
> It is also fully proven that the pilgrims coming to Bari, are attracted to the tomb of the Saint in view of the fact that the “manna” is famous because of the miracles St. Nicholas accomplishes through it.
> Between 1954 and 1957, the authenticity that this liquid truly came from the bones of the Saint, as was commonly held, was put into question. In 1954, because of the renovation being done in the crypt, the tomb was opened and the bones were exhumed. Then they were placed inside an urn, where it remained exposed to the public to see and venerate for three years in the hall of the treasures (of the Saint in the Basilica).

> Sometimes it was observed that the bones "perspired" a certain kind of fluid; one time the linen sheet which held the relics was found to be soaking wet when the mortal remains of St. Nicholas were re-interred in the tomb. This linen cloth has been preserved up to this day.[492]

Is the "Manna of St. Nicholas" truly miraculous?

Unfortunately, the Catholic Church has a dark history of merchandising "relics" and many a technician cleric can "age" their handiwork enough to convince an expert. Recall the aforementioned example of "Paleontologist" Jesuit Priest Pierre Teilhard de Chardin who employed relic "aging" techniques to fabricate the Darwinian hoax of "Piltdown man".

Even more fascinating, the hand-painted bottles that were used to disseminate "Aqua Tofana" were indistinguishable from the jars used to sell the "Manna of St. Nicholas".

Many bottles were decorated with naked, bathing or frolicking children. This was a Medieval mechanism for implying sexual deviancy and pedophilia under cover of innocence. It was so common in Catholic Europe, especially Italy, it was given a name — "putto" — which was usually a naked male child.

Possible "Aqua Tofana" bottle: "historical oddity" author Mike Dash.

The "putto" has been erroneously adopted as a typical depiction of a "cherub" however the "kerub" of the Bible (Strong's 3742) was clearly a terrifying and intimidating force as more than one were placed by YHWH in Eden to guard the Tree of Life from fallen man (Genesis 3:24).

In 2003, the fourth meeting between the Vatican and the "Protestant" World Council of Churches took place on neutral ground: the shrine of St. Nicholas of Bari where all who attended gave their veneration.

> The meeting was held at Oasi Santa Maria, a center for spirituality, under the direction of Monsignor Colucci of the archdiocese of Bari-Bitonto, located just outside the town of Cassano delle Murge.
>
> Archbishop Francesco Cacucci and the whole local church welcomed the JWG ["Joint Working Group"] in the traditional spirit of the Bari region, renowned for its history of contacts between Christians of various Churches, drawn to the Basilica of Bari which houses the tomb of St Nicholas.
>
> Each day, morning and evening prayer were celebrated according to the varied traditions of the churches and Ecclesial Community represented in the working group.
>
> ... The WCC representatives reported on the results of the Special Commission on the Relations with the Orthodox Churches, and the celebration of the 75th anniversary of Faith and Order held in Lausanne in 2002 and shared the plans thus far for future world events such as the Faith and Order Plenary (2004), the Conference on World Mission and Evangelism (2005) and the next Assembly of the WCC itself (2006).
> The representatives from the Catholic Church reported on the wide scope of bilateral relations and dialogues between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox, Anglican, Lutheran, Methodist, Reformed, Mennonite, Pentecostal and Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) as well as consultations with the Seventh Day Adventists and Evangelicals. ...

The rich ecumenical environment of Bari was experienced on several occasions. An opening ecumenical prayer service was held in the parish church of Santa Maria Assunta in Cassano delle Murge, at which Archbishop Cacucci presided, with testimonies presented by local Orthodox, Waldensian, Baptist and Seventh Day Adventist participants.

The whole event was organized by the Ecumenical Group of Bari under the leadership of Fr Angelo Romita.

Afterwards the Mayor of Cassano delle Murge, Giuseppe Gentile, addressed the JWG and spoke of the unity of Christians as a necessary sign and encouragement to civil society in its search for greater harmony and service to the common good.

A visit was made to the Dominican Patristic Institute of Bari which is a center for ecumenical dialogue, research and learning, bringing together Christians principally from Catholic and Orthodox backgrounds.[[ccclxvii]]

A visit to the museum of the diocese of Bari-Bitonto helped to illustrate the important crossroads that Bari has been for Christians from Byzantine, Slav, Latin and Armenian traditions for over 1000 years.

The members participated in the celebration of the translation of the relics of St Nicholas at the waterfront in Bari, presided over by Archbishop [Francesco, "Francis"] Cacucci, which highlighted the strength of popular devotion to St Nicholas, who is venerated by the Christian East and West. ~ Vatican.va[493]

Dedicated Seventh Day Adventists may be upset to read of their hierarchy's participation but no more so than the Waldensian Church which was brutally persecuted to near extinction by Rome.

There are many rumors surrounding Tofana, her mother and daughter. The strongest of them state that they moved to Rome and were given sanctuary by Catholic clergy.

One account even states that Tofana and her gang of accomplices were given key ingredients hard to acquire by a "dubious Priest".

> Aqua Tofana, though, has always been most closely associated with Rome, and it is there that we first encounter Giulia Tofana a few years after the Naples poisoning.

Let's repeat that sentence.

> Aqua Tofana, though, has always been most closely associated with Rome, and it is there that we first encounter Giulia Tofana a few years after the Naples poisoning. [Sicilian folklorist Salvatore] Salomene-Marino [(1847–1916)] says that she came to the city from Palermo, and does what he can to link her to Teofania di Adamo – it was then the custom in Sicily, he notes, for the children of parents with unusual Christian names to take those names as their surnames, and on that basis he suggests that Tofana was Teofania's daughter.
> Salomene-Marino was a noted authority on Sicilian tradition, and may be right about this. ...
>
> Salomene-Marino and [Alessandro Felice] Ademollo [(1826 – 1891)] – the latter basing his work on research in old court records from the Archivio di Stato di Roma*, a contemporary chronicle, and the famous diary kept by a Roman gentleman named Giacinto Gigli – write that Tofana arrived in what was then the wealthy capital of the Papal States in the company of a much younger woman, Girolama* [sometimes spelled "Hieronyma"] Spara.
>
> The pair had apparently fled Palermo in the wake of an attempted poisoning gone wrong, and quickly resumed their old activities.
>
> They recruited several new accomplices – two poison-makers, Giovanna de Grandis and Maria Spinola (nicknamed Grifola), and two saleswomen, or "dispensers," named Laura Crispolti and Graziosa Farina.
>
> At some point, this group obtained a regular supply of arsenic by striking up an acquaintance with a dubious priest, Father Girolamo of Sant´Agnese in Agone, a new church in the centre of Rome. ~ Dash[494]

Another "renegade Priest"?

Don’t for a minute believe that Catholic hierarchy is in any way unaware of every detail associated with the lives of necromancers, poisoners and pedophile Priests. The proof of this is in how they are enabled and rewarded for their skullduggery.

Hieronyma / Girolama Spara is another illusive femme fatale, a sorceress and confederate of Tofana. She is said to have conducted her poisonings more for personal gain rather than women’s suffrage.

History author Dr. Michael Dash continues with a vignette of a high-profile victim with many names we have seen previously in these pages.

It is strongly incriminating to note that, in this narrative, the assassination isn’t facilitated by a female member of the Tofana / Spara gang, but “Father Girolamo”, himself (on behalf of a member of the powerful Aldobrandini family).

> Ademollo lists several suspected victims of Aqua Tofana, but there is room here to examine only a single case in detail. This is the death of Francesco Cesi, who was the Duke of Ceri and certainly the richest and most powerful of all those caught up in the poisoning scandal. The scion of a highly distinguished family (his father had been a noted scientist and an intimate of Galileo, and he himself was nephew to the future Pope Innocent XI), Cesi died suddenly and unexpectedly in June 1657. Suspicion eventually fell on his even better-connected young wife, Maria Aldobrandini, a member of one of Rome’s most powerful and influential noble clans.[495]

Again, we have another intimate, positive connection between “Galileo” (Galilei) and the Vatican; interestingly, one that died of apparent assassination. An unhappy wife could be a cover for the motive of covering up Cesi’s involvement in the corruption of “science” orchestrated by Rome, of which Galilee was a key agent.

> Federico Cesi was born to an Aristocratic family highly connected in Rome and the Papal States. The family derives its name from Cesi, a little town near Rome. They had a close connection with the Catholic Church, Frederico’s uncle Bartolomeo Cesi was a cardinal in the church, and most of their wealth came from that connection.[1]

> Federico was the first of eleven legitimate male children and was born in Palazzo Cesi, in via della Maschera d'Oro, Rome, February 26, 1585.
> His father was Federico, marchese di Monticelli (1562–1630)[2] and his mother was Olimpia Orsini of Todi. In 1614 Cesi was married to Artemisia Colonna, the daughter of Francesco, principe di Palestrina; she died two years later. In 1617 he married to Isabella, cousin of Filippo Salviati, the daughter of the Marquis of Lorenzo.[3] In 1618 he moved to Acquasparta and lived there until his death at the age of forty-five. ~ Wikipedia[496]

Orsini, Colonna, Aldobrandini; these are the families which control our existence to this day and they are happy to inbreed in order to maintain that tyranny of wealth and power.

Dash continues with why we have an unhappy Aldobrandini:

> The facts, insofar as they can now be ascertained, are certainly suggestive.
> The Duke was, firstly, at least 30 years older than his wife; he seems to have been born around 1608 and first married in 1626.
>
> Aldobrandini, who was his second wife, was only 13 years old when they wed in 1648,[[cccLxviii]] and thus still no more than 22 when the Duke died ("young and beautiful, courted by many," her beauty only slightly dimmed by smallpox scars, according to a contemporary survey of the ladies of Rome).
>
> This lends at least some plausibility to Ademollo's account, even though his information was drawn from information given by Giovanna de Grandis while she was facing ... the likelihood of execution...
> According to De Grandis's testimony, the Duchess had fallen hopelessly in love with another suitor: a handsome count (and incorrigible rake) by the name of Francesco Maria Santinelli (1627-97).

Santinelli showered her with love poetry, which Ademollo points out can be used to date the start of their relationship to the months before the Duke of Ceri died.

Aldobrandini's infatuation gave her a pressing reason to rid herself of a husband who was – Ademollo says – in any case already ailing.

The Duchess's first contact with Spara's gang came via the shady priest Father Girolamo.[[ccclxix]]

De Grandis's testimony states that the priest came to see her in search of a poison that could be trusted to do its work inconspicuously; Aldobrandini was fearful of administering anything that might make her husband vomit so copiously that he suspected her.

De Grandis, who had a healthy respect for the power of the Roman nobility, was not keen to become entangled with her, but ... Father Girolamo calmed her fears. He pointed out that Aqua Tofana was a gentle poison that did not cause much vomiting, and added that, in any case, the Duke's food passed through so many hands that there was little danger of any suspicion falling on them.

De Grandis agreed to supply a bottle of her poison, which seems to have been disguised, as usual, as "Manna of St Nicholas." The Priest, in turn, passed it on to a trusted female servant of the Duchess, and within a day or two the Duke was dead[[ccclxx]] (one version of the story, of unknown reliability, suggests that the whole bottle was tipped into his food in error).

There seem to have been no immediate suspicions that poison was involved, and there was no autopsy, even though the cause of death was scarcely clear. But the body was placed in an open casket in the basilica of Santa Maria supra Minerva, and when De Grandis went to see it there, she realised immediately that the Duke had met his death by poison.

If Maria Aldobrandini was guilty of her husband's murder, her actions did her little good; Federico Gualdi notes that her own family locked her up in order to prevent her rushing into a scandalous and unequal second marriage with her lover Santinelli. But she at least escaped suspicion of having anything to do with the Duke's swift death – until, that is, Spara's gang was rounded up the following year.

How the group's murderous activities came to light is far from clear.[497]

Perhaps that's because "the group's murderous activities" never "came to light".

Another version of Tofana's death states that furious townspeople raided the Catholic church that kept her safe and did what the Vatican had refused to do: executed her for her crimes. Sometimes this account is mingled with reports that they forced the Inquisition to be the Inquisition; to torture for "prosecution" the accused and then kill them.

Continuing the family tradition, her daughter joined the business, and they operated quietly in Italy, moving from Palermo to Naples, and then to Rome. They was eventually betrayed by a wife who put the poison in her husband's soup, then regretted it. The regretful wife stopped her husband from eating the soup, and he smelled a rat. He forced the truth from her, then dragged her off to the Papal authorities. Her obvious weak will and natural talkativeness were encouraged by the proximity of torture devices and the expertise of the authorities at that time. In short, she spilled every last syllable of what she knew.

While one would expect Guilia to be arrested immediately, that didn't happen. Too many locals had a stake in her remaining free, and she was warned. One version of her story from that point is that she was already retired and at her country estate. She had the opportunity to run, which she did. Her daughter and employees were executed. Then she was found and garroted at some later date. (A ghost tour for tourists in Rome includes their apartment, where her ghost is said to call for her lost daughter from their window in the black of night.) However, the most reported — and believed — version says that, while Guilia was elderly, she was still in Rome when she was warned. She ran for the nearest church and demanded sanctuary, which was granted.

However, that was not the end of it. A rumor suddenly raged throughout Rome that she had poisoned the water. This rumor (a rumor with suspicious beginnings) caused the church to be stormed and Giulia to be extracted from it and handed over to the Papal authorities.

Under enthusiastic torture, she confessed to poisoning over 600 men in just an 18-year span, from 1633 to 1651. She was executed along with her daughter and three employees in July, 1659. They died in the Campo de' Fiori, a square that was called "the field of flowers", because it had been kept an open field for a long time in ancient Rome, but had eventually been paved over and made into a square. Then it became the location for hanging people and burning them at the stake.

After Giulia's execution, her body was thrown back over the wall of the church that had given her sanctuary, and the clergy there were left to dispose of it. ~ Iverson[498]

Then there are other rumors which claim she was hunted down by the Pope, himself!

While still at Palermo, Tofana became acquainted with an old sorceress, Hyeronyma Spara, to whom she imparted her secret. The two worked together until the number of deaths among young married men began to attract attention, whereupon Tofano started for Naples, while Spara betook herself to the Eternal City.

At Rome Spara began operations on an extended scale. She formed a band of poisoners, the principal of whom was a woman named Gratiosa, for, be it remembered, Spara was well up in years.

Spara's method of working seems to have been this: — She gave herself out as a sorceress and fortune-teller, and in this capacity wormed the secrets out of the hearts of the silly women who consulted her. She would then cleverly insinuate that in three or four days the cruel husband or the faithless man, as the case might be, could be removed with, the most absolute safety. A bargain was struck ; mutual promises of the most profound secrecy were exchanged; and within the week there was a new widow in Rome.

If the discontented wife were a member of the middle classes, Spara artfully contrived that the dangerous portion of the negotiations should be carried on by some of the other members of the gang; for she judged that the women of the "masses" would be much more likely to betray her than the women of the "classes."

Of course the number of deaths among the newly-married men soon attracted the attention of the authorities in Rome, as it had done in Palermo; but, though the police may have had their suspicions, it was some time before they were able to bring the crimes home to the proper quarters; even after they knew that the sorceress Spara was implicated, it was long before they could obtain proof positive.

At length, however, they found a lady who was willing to act in concert with them; and so well did this amateur detective carry out her role, that at last the police knew all the principal members of this infamous gang...

The band was taken and put to the torture, according to the custom of the time.[[cccclxxi]] All confessed, except Spara, who seems to have had so little knowledge of human nature as to have thought some of the frail ladies whom she had assisted would step forward to protect her from justice. She withstood the torture several times, but, as no relief came, at length cried out, in despair, "Where are the Roman princes, nobles, and knights who have made use of my art? Where are the ladies who have promised me their favour?" But they came not; whereupon the miserable wretch denounced them all and confessed her crimes.

Pope Alexander VII. [Fabio Chigi] ordered Spara, Gratiosa, and three others to be executed at once; within the month he sent several others of them to their last account, and the remainder he banished for ever. It was in 1558 that this band of secret murderers was thus broken up and destroyed.

Meanwhile, the prime criminal was still at large, exercising her terrible vocation not only at Naples, which was her headquarters, but in various parts of Italy. For many years she evaded the police and the Custom-house officers with her bottles of poison in her luggage, and death after death, in the most mysterious way, was reported. She continued her atrocious business until 1709, when her disguise was penetrated. She was publicly strangled. Previous to her death she > confessed to having supplied the poison for over 700 murders! ~ Unknown Gender History[499]

However, the narrative that Tofana was in collusion with Catholic clergy and forcibly executed by vigilante citizenry has more than once source.

> ... there are two wildly different versions of Tofana's story. The first has her flourishing in Sicily as early as the 1630s; the second has her still alive in prison a century later. She is supposed to have operated in Palermo, in Naples, and in Rome, and is variously said to have been the inventor of the poison that bears her name, or merely its inheritor.
> Nor is there any certainty when it comes to the ingredients of her elixir. Most accounts agree that Aqua Tofana was based on arsenic. But some state that it also contained toadflax, Spanish Fly, extract of snapdragon, a solution of pennywort known as aqua cymbelaria, and even madmen's spittle.
>
> The mysteries multiply when we consider the vexed question of when, and how, Tofana met her end. One source says that that she died of natural causes in 1651, another that she found sanctuary in a convent, and lived on there for many years, continuing to make her poison and dispensing it via a network of nuns and clerics.
> Several assert that she was captured, tortured and executed, though they differ as to whether her death occurred in 1659, or 1709, or 1730. In one especially detailed account, Tofana was dragged bodily from her sanctuary and strangled, after which "her body was thrown at night into the area of the convent from which she had been taken." ~ Dash[500]

Dash's article is the most extensive. Many of his sources are, of course, Catholic clergy, such as Cardinal Pietro Sforza-Pallavicini (1607-67) who was a biographer of Fabio Chigi, "Pope Alexander VII".

The fact that so many different narratives exist of the capture, torture and execution of the assassins lends credence to the idea that it never really happened; that their knowledge of murder without trace was carefully and silently consumed by Rome.

In a history with few details, the excessive minutia of Vatican care to track down the killers strikes as fabricated cover. In this version, Papal authorities "played along" with the killers in a masterful game of entrapment!

> There is, nonetheless, yet a third version of the unveiling of the poisoners.
>
> Roman chronicles and court records suggest that the gang was exposed not by the activities of Spara's Aristocratic contacts, but by the low class clients whom she left to Giovanna de Grandis.
>
> De Grandis, in this telling, was the weak link in Spara's operation; she had come to the attention of the authorities and been detained on no fewer than three occasions. Her luck ran out with a fourth arrest; this time she was caught with a sample of her poison on her, and although she claimed that it was simply a potion intended to remove unwanted marks from clients' faces, her captors suspected otherwise.
>
> In this version of events, the Roman authorities chose to act with a discretion and a willingness to play a long game seldom exhibited by police during the seventeenth century.
>
> Realising that De Grandis could not be working alone, they released her, allowed her to go back to her old haunts, and then set up an elaborate trap to catch both her and her confederates.
>
> A Florentine noblewoman by the name of signora Loreti was brought to the city and set up with the identity of the "Marchesa Romanini." Establishing her bona fides by moving into a substantial mansion in a fashionable district of the city, Loreti began to pay visits to De Grandis.
>
> At first the fake Marchesa sought the services of an astrologer, but it was not long before she was spinning tales of an unhappy marriage and offering huge sums for a bottle of Aqua Tofana. An appointment was agreed, and, as soon as the exchange was made, two officers and a notary stepped out from behind a curtain. The liquid in the bottle handed to Loreti was tested on a number of stray animals.[[cccLxxii]] It swiftly killed them, and the whole of Spara's gang was rounded up and brought to trial.

The result was the scandalous court case whose written remnants Ademollo discovered during his searches of Rome's archives.

The main members of the gang were rapidly convicted, and – although the details of the sentences are missing from the record – we know that, on 6 July 1659, Spara herself, De Grandis, Maria Spinola, Laura Crispolti and Graziosa Farina were all hanged in the Campo di Fiori in the presence of an unusually large crowd.

Ademollo mentions that five accomplices were also tried, but we have no record of their fates, and ... Vita di Alessandro VII adds that 46 of the gang's customers were subsequently "immured" for life.

Most, if not all, of the women convicted in this way were surely De Grandis's low-class clients; Gigli's diary notes that they were packed off to prison rather than banished or detained in convents, the fates most often meted out to well-bred female criminals in this period.

There are certainly hints that attempts were made to limit the scope of the scandal.

Some very prominent and powerful people had found themselves caught up in the investigation, and Ademollo states that Alexander VII himself ordered that Maria Aldobrandini's name should be kept out of Spara's trial; the Duchess was apparently never charged with any wrongdoing, and lived on until 1703.

The dubious[?] Father Girolamo is another conspicuous absentee from the records of the case. It is uncertain whether he was dead by this point, or was spirited away by the church authorities; either way, he was never interrogated and did not stand trial. Nor was any attempt made – publicly at least – to trace the full extent of the Priest's connections in either the Roman underworld or in high society. This creates a considerable gap in our understanding of the case for – as will become apparent later – [“]renegade[”] clerics of Girolamo's type were essential to the functioning of the "magical underworlds" that seem to have existed in most large cities throughout Europe at this time. [emphasis added][501]

Again we read of the “dubious cleric” who magically escapes punishment for his role, perhaps even in leading the assassins. Dash at least acknowledges that such “renegade Priests” were instrumental in Satanic skullduggery from sorcery to suspect “suicide”.

The same can be said of his most prominent confederate.

> Tofana died in about 1651 – probably in her own bed, and apparently unsuspected of any crime...[502]

Dash sows it all together; from Rome, to Naples to Paris.

> All this, I think, allows for two conclusions.
>
> The first is that we can place the historical Giulia Tofana in the Rome of the 1640s and 1650s, and dismiss reports of murderous “Tophanas” in the Naples of the first third of the 18th century as errors that have muddied waters for two centuries.
>
> The second is that the notoriety of the Naples poisoners tells us a good deal about the lasting impression that the real Tofana made in early modern Europe. Her name, it’s clear, became synonymous with poison – not merely in Italy, but well outside its boundaries.
>
> To grasp how a single sensational court case dating to 1659 could have a lasting impact, and why Aqua Tofana itself was much discussed and so much feared, we next need to consider the broader reputation of Italians during this period – an era in which it was widely believed that they knew more about poisons, and poisoning, than any other people.
>
> Late in the summer of 1568, Charles de Guise, the enigmatic cardinal of Lorraine, made a plan to end the [so-called] Wars of Religion ...
> According to a dispatch written by the English ambassador, the churchman sent to Italy for 50 expert poisoners, each of whom he paid 1,000 crowns “to empoison wine, wells, and other victuals” most likely to be used by his Protestant Huguenot enemies.

Charles, Cardinal of Lorraine (left), receives the head of Admiral Coligny, the leader of France's protestants... Mike Dash, A Blast from the Past Fifty thousand crowns was an enormous sum, and though there are grounds to doubt the details – there was no mass poisoning of Huguenots at the time – the fact that the story was circulating in the highest diplomatic circles suggests that it was known and thought credible at the time.

Certainly it is hard to imagine a better illustration of the reputation that Italians enjoyed during these years as masters of the art of poison.

> Most of Europe was united in the opinion that there was something uniquely skilful – and uniquely devilish – about the Italian way with lethal compounds.
>
> The English traveller Fynes Moryson wrote a few years later that "the Italyans above all other nations, most practise revenge by treasons, and espetially are skilful in making and giving poisons."
> A French pamphlet, cited by Anne Somerset, asserted that "in Italy poisons were the surest and most common aids in relieving hate and vengeance."[503]

With the success of Rome and her Ruling Elite agents like the Medici, the de Guises, Felipe II of Spain and many others in openly slaughtering Christians, a mass poisoning was simply unnecessary.

Chapter 9

“La Voisin”: The Perfect Amalgam of Witchcraft, Satanism and the Catholic Church

> July 17th, 1676: Marie-Madeleine-Marguerite d´Aubray, the Marquise de Brinvilliers, is beheaded and burned for having poisoned her father and two brothers to inherit their estates.
> A witch is rumored to have given her both the poison and the training. She remained at large.

By the latter half of the 17th century (1600’s), an understandable paranoia encompassed Europe over fear of dying a painful, lingering death from the undetectable killer of poisoning.

The hysteria culminated in L´Affaire des Poisons. During the years of 1677-1682, several French Aristocrats were arrested, interrogated, tortured, imprisoned and executed for murder by poisoning.

It was precipitated by the trial and execution of Marquise[cccLxxiii] de Brinvilliers.

A “respected” source on the “Affair of the Poisons” is a book by the same name written by Anne Somerset, daughter of David Somerset, Duke of Beaufort.

Little biographical information is available on “Lady Anne” though she was married to the now-deceased artist Matthew Xavier Maillard Carr and she handles terms like “Confessor” with familiarity and a lower-case “c”.

Marie Madeleine d´Aubray, born in 1630, was the eldest daughter of Antoine Dreux d´Aubray who was the Civil Lieutenant of Paris, a position of high importance and ample pay.

In 1651, she was married to Antoine Gobelin, of the Gobelin dye manufacturing dynasty which included multiple tapestry workshops. Their combined worth was considerable.[cccLxxiv] Their property and wealth earned them the title of Marquis and Marquise de Brinvilliers (due a clerical error on transcribing of the fiefdom of Brunvilliers).

> M. de Brinvilliers was an officer in the French army. Soon after his marriage he became colonel of the Normandy regiment and it was while on active service that he made the acquaintance of another officer named Gaudin de Sainte-Croix. Sainte-Croix was, by his own account, the illegitimate offshoot of an illustrious Gascon family. Presumably they had given him money to purchase a commission in the army, for he was a cavalry captain in the Tracy regiment.[[cccLxxv]] Sainte-Croix was an immensely attractive man.
> Handsome, witty and unscrupulous, he possessed a vitality and charm that many found irresistible. While entering with enjoyment into most forms of dissipation, he retained a capacity for serious conversation which gave the impression that he was an upright character. Unfortunately, "beneath the appearance of a wise and good-natured man he concealed a most black and detestable soul".[8]
>
> M. de Brinvilliers liked Sainte-Croix so much that he invited him to stay at his house in the Rue Neuve Saint-Paul in Paris. This was a mistake.
>
> According to one account Mme de Brinvilliers was already dissatisfied with her husband as he had been unfaithful to her and thus proved highly susceptible to Sainte-Croix's "artful and insinuating manners". Before long Sainte-Croix's "assiduities towards the husband were transferred to the lady".
>
> Her discontent with M. de Brinvilliers reinforced the attractions of her admirer, ensuring that Sainte-Croix "did not sigh for long".[9] ~ Somerset[504]

Later, under torture, Madame de Brinvilliers stated her first sexual experience was at 7 and that she had frequently committed both incest and adultery beyond that.

Although a confession under torture is far from reliable, such a statement is sadly plausible for Catholic Aristocracy anywhere or at any time (and, in fairness, any Aristocracy though Rome is the foundation of most all familial wealth).

The Madame's husband (doubtless focused on his own adulterous affairs) made no protest but her father and two brothers were thoroughly displeased by the scandal.

Antoine d´Aubray used his influence to have Gaudin de Sainte-Croix arrested.

However, not only was Sainte-Croix released from the Royal prison (the Bastille) after only six weeks, while there, he met Egidio Exili who was reputed to know more about poisons than anyone else in the world.

Exili was, of course, Italian.

> Italians were thought not only to be predisposed to employing insidious methods but were also regarded as experts on toxicology, a devastating combination in French eyes. ...
> A tract issued shortly after Mme de Brinvilliers's trial likewise stressed that the Italians had an unrivalled mastery of poison and that "by dint of hard work and study they have composed such subtle and well-disguised types of poison that they baffle the skill and capacity of doctors. Some are slow … others prompt and violent, but none leave the slightest trace that might reveal their presence."[505], [ccclxxvi]

Damning to their innocence, after Gaudin de Sainte-Croix was released from the Bastille, he immediately took back up with the Marquise de Brinvilliers and he erected a laboratory at his home.

Somerset explains[506] that alchemy was a common practice amongst European Elites with too much wealth and time on their hands. Often, they or "experts" they hired conducted experiments to find the "Philosopher's Stone" that would turn base metals into gold.

> Suspicions were later voiced that Sainte-Croix's alchemical experiments had merely formed a cover for more sinister activities and that he was using his knowledge of Exili's "detestable secrets" to > perfect new varieties of poison. One person suggested that this had always been his ultimate goal and that, as far as Sainte-Croix was concerned, "the secret of the Philosopher's Stone was poison".[15]

During her "interrogation", Marie de Brinvilliers also implicated the King's Apothecary, a Swiss by the name of Christophe Glaser.

Glaser had gone to Florence on a trip financed by the King's Superintendent of Finances, Nicolas Fouquet. In 1664, Fouquet was sent to prison for life, convicted of embezzlement and treason. He had started his Jesuit education at the tender age of 13 and had been installed by the Minister of State and Regent for young Louis XIV, Roman Catholic Cardinal Jules Mazarin (an Italian born "Giulio Raimondo Mazzarino").

Fouquet had designs on taking over from Mazarin as Minister of State but Louis had designs of his own. Being King wasn't enough. He wished to micro-manage even minute affair of State so, along with Mazarin's personal secretary, Jesuit-trained Jean-Baptiste Colbert, they conspired to frame Fouquet. This was likely done in close co-ordination with Rome as Fouquet was afterwards imprisoned in the Pinerolo fortress of Turin, Italy.

More on the "Sun King" and his Roman Catholic Cardinal Regent, shortly.

According to Marie de Brinvilliers, Glaser had been sent to Florence to learn about poisons but this was a scandal as well because Glaser was a respected "man of science".

> When all this emerged in the course of Mme de Brinvilliers's final interrogations it caused terrible consternation. The seventeenth century was a time of phenomenal technological advance when educated people's understanding of the world was undergoing profound modification. There had been significant discoveries in the fields of physics, mathematics, astronomy and medicine, and it therefore did not seem implausible that comparable advances had been made in toxicology. Understandably, therefore, the possibility that a brilliant and innovative man of science like Glaser might have been using his knowledge for perverted ends aroused intense disquiet.[507]

Many more "men of science" have shown themselves unscrupulous before and since, from climate expert Michael Mann fabricating his dreaded “hockey stick” curve chart to prove the fallacy of “global warming” to the aforementioned Jesuit Pierre Teilhard de Chardin creating the Piltdown man hoax to aid Darwinian evolution.

In fact, there are many examples of fossil fakery, including the fly trapped in “amber” (“fossilized tree sap”) that was the inspiration for Jurassic Park’s “mosquito in amber”.

The Natural History Museum’s fly and joy (pun intended) was discovered to be a fake by entomology student Andrew Ross, who noted that the underside of the fly’s amber betrayed the unmistakable signs of having been cut by a jeweler.[508] It wasn’t 38 million years old after all.

But whenever “science” is on the ropes for foisting frauds, the magic of Tinsel Town comes to the rescue. From dinosaurs to deep space, humanity gets its reality from movies.

> Do you remember the first time you saw a dinosaur? The first time you see them, it’s like...a miracle. You read about them in books, you see the bones in museums but you don’t really believe it. They’re like myths. And then you see the first one alive. ~ actress Bryce Howard as “Claire Dearing”, “dinosaur-rights activist” [Jurassic World: Fallen Kingdom, 2018]

Richard Attenborough as John Hammond gazes at the "source for dinosaur DNA" he has had made into a cane. Jurassic Park, Universal Pictures (1993) [Fair Use]

In quick succession, Marie de Brinvilliers arranged for the poisoning of her father and two brothers. Her accomplice and lover, Gaudin Sainte-Croix, had consumed what was left of the family fortune. Sadly, for them, the deaths yielded little more.

When both brothers Antoine and François wasted away into painful deaths following father Antoine Dreux d´Aubray, all in 1670, suspicion was aroused.

A fourth family member had been targeted but the new scrutiny made the murder untenable.

Proving her pro-Roman bias, Somerset describes the sister thus:

> Not content with having murdered her three closest male relatives, Mme de Brinvilliers next contemplated poisoning her sister. The latter > was a devout spinster who had displeased her by making large donations to various religious foundations, thus diminishing the wealth which Mme de Brinvilliers considered should be passed on intact to her children.[509]

Only one "religion" was organized for "charity" in 1670.

An autopsy was done on brother Antoine and the degraded state of his internal organs pointed towards poison.

A servant named La Chausée had been hired by Marquise de Brinvilliers and Sainte-Croix to execute the poisoning. He fled but was captured and, according to Catholic French "justice" procedures, tortured into a confession.

Gaudin Sainte-Croix died in 1672 of, ostensibly, natural causes and Marie de Brinvilliers fled France.

Anne Somerset's description of Marie de Brinvilliers' life "on the lamb" and capture leave little to question about her biases as she paints the "devout spinster sister" as a paragon of virtue though we are left to assume what she was "devout" in. [emphasis added below][510]

> ...even before La Chausée had been brought to trial, attempts were made to lay hands on Mme de Brinvilliers. In the autumn of 1672 it emerged that she had fled to England and the French at once sought to extradite her.
>
> Permission for this was granted, but the English declined to arrest the fugitive themselves, and the resultant delays gave Mme de Brinvilliers time to escape to the Continent. During La Chausée's trial she was pronounced in contempt after ignoring a summons to appear in court and for this the judges sentenced her to be beheaded. For several years, however, Mme de Brinvilliers remained beyond the reach of justice as she travelled war-torn Europe, never resting long in one place and eking out a penurious and wretched existence.
> Ironically, her main means of subsistence was a small allowance sent to her by the devout sister whom she had once plotted to kill. In August 1675 the sister died of natural causes, leaving Mme de Brinvilliers in a more precarious condition than ever.

Then, in the spring of 1676, Mme de Brinvilliers made the colossal blunder of renting a room in a convent in Liège. Liège at the time was an independent city state but it had become embroiled in the war between France and Holland, and a year earlier French troops had occupied its citadel. When her presence there became known the French applied to the city authorities for permission to arrest her and this was granted. On 25 March she was seized and taken to the citadel. The news was at once relayed to a delighted Louis XIV, who had shown a keen interest in her case and taken it "very much to heart that Mme de Brinvilliers does not escape justice".[42]

Sun King Pin

As noted earlier, "former Protestant" Henry of Navarre married Marie de ´Medici Valois. They produced a son who would rule France as "Louis XIII".

Needing to preserve the "Divine Right" to rule over their subjects, Louis XIII married Ana María Mauricia whose father was Felipe III of Spain and whose mother, Margaret of Austria, was a Habsburg. It was all the same, however, because Austria, Spain, France and every other major power in Europe were all dominated by Roman Catholicism, including the "nobility".

In 1638, they had Louis Dieudonné, who would go on to become Louis XIV, King of France.[cccLxxvii]

One thing Royal "Divine Right" inbreeding did cause was mistrust. Although Austria, Spain and France were all Catholic, each was ruled by families filled with the lust to forever seek more power and more land.

Because of Ana María's Habsburg lineage, Louis did not trust her to rule as Regent and he became ill when Louis XIV was only 5. Instead, a "Regency Council" was formed, rather than putting the power into the hands of just one individual.

But after Louis XIII's death, Queen Anne had his will annulled by the Parlement de Paris which was ruled by Catholic clergy. She then made an Italian Roman Catholic Cardinal, Regent of France.

Not surprisingly, Giulio Raimondo Mazzarino (Jules Cardinal Mazarin[cccLxxviii]), maintained a vehement hatred of all non-Catholics, especially Protestants (Christians).

> The Pope [Maffeo Barberini, "Pope Urban VIII"] sent Mazarin to Paris at the beginning of 1631 to work out the final details of the agreement. He returned to France again from April to July 1632. He had his first interview with Lous XIII and with the Queen, Anne of Austria, in May 1632. He tried to persuade Louis XIII to send a military expedition to capture Geneva, the fortress of the Protestant movement, but the King, who had good relations with the Swiss cantons, rejected the idea. ~ Wikipedia[511]

The drive to crush Protestantism via the "Thirty Years War" ended in 1648 which granted Sweden and the Netherlands generous concessions and weakened the Habsburg Empire.

The War had considerably drained the French treasury and the Elite did what they usually do in such situations: passed the burden on to the commoners with increased taxation.

More specifically, it was the Italian Catholic clergyman ruling France, Giulio Mazzarino (Jules Cardinal Mazarin), who raised crushing taxes upon the French. However, the policies were initiated by his Minister of State predecessor, Armand Jean du Plessis, Duke of Richelieu, who was also a Roman Catholic Cardinal.

This caused several uprisings to take place and considerable unrest in Parliament. They have become known as Le Fronde — named after the slingshots peasants used to break the windows on the houses of their Lords and Ladies. When Louis XIV was only 8, he was forced to flee Paris. It left a hatred for the "unwashed masses" that would mark the "Sun King's" rule.

At sixteen, Louis was considered competent to rule the nation of France (thanks to his Royal lineage) and he was crowned at Notre Dame Cathedral (named after the Virgin Mary), in Reims; a city dominated by the Collège des Jésuites de Reims, the Jesuit university there.

The English College at Reims would be the location from which the cutting edge of the Roman Counter-Reformation would translate the Latin Vulgate into English.

Purposeful inaccuracies were written into the text to bolster unbiblical Roman doctrines.

For instance, in Matthew 6:11, Jesus teaches His disciples to pray, "Give us, this day, our daily bread." The Douay-Rheims translates it "Give us, this day, our supersubstantial bread," to validate transubstantiation (a Catholic doctrine many a Protestant was burned alive for not avowing).

In Titus 1:5, Paul instructs Titus to appoint elders πρεσβύτερος ("presbuteros") in every city just as Titus was appointed by Paul. The Douay-Rheims translates them as "Priests" when Christ had already upgraded the Priesthood to all Believers via the Cross. [I Peter 2:9]

James 5:16 in the King James (based upon the Textus Receptus*) states "Confess your* faults*" ἁμαρτία ["hamartia" — to miss the mark] "one to another". The Douay-Rheims, along with many modern "Protestant" translations based upon the questionable* Codex Sinacticus (more later) translates it "Confess your sins*..."*

Likewise, the King James translates Matthew 3:1-2 as:

> In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judaea, and saying, Repent ye: for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand! [capitalization added]

While the Douay-Rheims renders it —

> And in those days cometh John the Baptist preaching in the desert of Judea. And saying: Do penance*: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. [emphasis added]*

But perhaps the most disturbing mistranslation is the one which supplants Jesus Christ as Messiah with the Semiramis / Isis cult of "Mary", co-redemptrix.[94]

In Genesis 3:15 the curse against the Serpent is simultaneously the first prophecy of a Divine Redeemer.

> And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her Seed; [He] shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise His Heel.
>
> It is physically impossible for a woman to have "seed", either in procreation or in lineage. This is carefully worded to imply the virgin birth of a Divine Savior (and the lower-case error in the King James has been corrected with appropriate capitalization).
>
> The Douay-Rheims renders it —
>
> > I will put enmities between thee and the woman, and thy seed and her seed: she shall crush thy head, and thou shalt lie in wait for her heel. [emphasis added]
>
> These purposeful mistranslations in the Douay-Rheims were engineered by the Jesuits.[95] In fact, the Douay-Rheims used to be disparagingly called the "Jesuit-Rheims".
>
> However, the role of Loyola's Company in this translation has been erased from documentation. No modern accounting of the Douay-Rheims connects it to the Jesuit order. ~ Secret History, Cirucci[512]

Versailles

When Royals and Elites aren't fomenting needless wars to satiate their greed or orgies to satiate their lust, they often while away their copious free time chasing and slaughtering inoffensive animals.

This was the case with Louis XIII, son of Henry of Navarre and Marie de ´Medici. "Good King" and "former Huguenot" Henry also enjoyed the "sport" of killing.

Of course anything as opulent and extravagant as the Palace of Versailles has an intimately Catholic history.

> The site of the Palace was first occupied by a small village and church, surrounded by forests filled with abundant game. It was owned by the [Florentine banking] Gondi family and the priory[[ccclxxix]] of Saint Julian. King Henry IV went hunting there in 1589, and returned in 1604 and 1609, staying in the village inn. His son, the future Louis XIII, came on his own hunting trip there in 1607. After he became King in 1610, Louis XIII returned to the village, bought some land, and in 1623-24 built a modest two-story hunting lodge on the site of the current marble courtyard.[4] He was staying there in November 1630 during the event known as the Day of the Dupes, when the enemies of the King's chief minister, Cardinal Richelieu, aided by the King's mother, Marie de´Medici, tried to take over the government. The King defeated the plot and sent his mother into exile.[5]

After this event, Louis XIII decided to make his hunting lodge at Versailles into a château. The King purchased the surrounding territory from the Gondi family, and in 1631–1634 had the architect Philibert Le Roy replace the hunting lodge with a château of brick and stone with classical pilasters in the doric style and high slate-covered roofs, surrounding the courtyard of the original hunting lodge. The gardens and park were also enlarged, laid out by Jacques Boyceau and his nephew, Jacques de Menours (1591–1637), and reached essentially the size they have today.[a][4][6][7] ~ Wikipedia[513]

The "Day of the Dupes" is another typical chapter of in-fighting between Italian Catholics, French Catholics and their most hated or beloved clergy who were intimately involved in all aspects of their lives.[cccIxxx]

Day of the Dupes (in French: la journée des Dupes) is the name given to a day in November 1630 on which the enemies of Cardinal Richelieu mistakenly believed that they had succeeded in persuading Louis XIII, King of France to dismiss Richelieu from power.[1] The actual day is thought to have been on the 10th, 11th, or 12th of the month.*

In November 1630, the political relations between the cardinal and the queen mother, the Italian-born Marie de´Medici, reached a crisis. In a stormy scene on 10 November, in the Luxembourg Palace, Marie de ´Medici and the cardinal met in the king's presence. The queen mother demanded the cardinal's dismissal, declaring that the king had to choose between him and her.[2]

No immediate decision came from this conference, but the king retired to his hunting lodge in Versailles. Richelieu seems to have believed that his political career was over, but the intercession of influential friends saved the minister from impending disgrace. While the apartments of the Luxembourg Palace were thronged by the cardinal's enemies celebrating his fall, Richelieu followed the king to Versailles, where the monarch assured him of continued support. Marie eventually exiled herself to Compiègne.[3]

The "Day of the Dupes," as this event was called, marks the complete restoration of the cardinal to royal favor.[4] ~ Wikipedia[514]

Louis Number Fourteen decided to finish his father's "hunting lodge" in a manner that best benefitted France.

Wikimedia Commons “Vintage News” described the “daily routine” of the “Sun King” at Versailles.

Louis XIV was one of Europe’s longest ever reigning sovereigns, keeping his throne for an incredible 72 years. His reign is known as sort of a Golden Age in French history, admired for the dazzling royal court culture at Versailles, and the intellectual and scientific achievements that blossomed under his patronage.[[cccclxxxi]] Louis ruled over France at the peak of its powers, and is remembered as the country’s “Sun King”.

As the ruler of a great European power, Louis was constantly in the public eye, performing the role of glorious monarch throughout his day. He kept a rigorous schedule, and was always surrounded by members of the royal court.

Taking the sun as his emblem, he developed a complex system of court rules and ceremonies, placing himself at the center of France’s political world and reinforcing his absolute, divinely inspired power.

> According to the website of the Palace of Versailles, the daily routine of Louis XIV began at 8:30am, when the First Valet of the Bedchamber came to rouse the king. This instigated the start of the "getting-up ceremony", in which favored members of the court were invited into the king's bedchamber to observe as he was washed, shaved, coiffed[[cccclxxxii]] and dressed.
>
> This getting-up ceremony occurred in two stages, with more and more people entering the chamber over the course of the morning. Once his ablutions were complete, the king would sit and eat his breakfast, watched by around 100 adoring male subjects.
> At 10 am the king left his apartments and usually went to the royal chapel to attend a personal mass. The corridors of Versailles would be filled with hundreds of people anxious to catch a glimpse of the king as he processed ceremoniously from one part of the palace to another.[515]

Louis commissioned a large number of busts and paintings of himself often as a Roman Emperor or the "Sun-god" Apollo, to be placed all around Versailles.

As has already been shown, the Catholic fixation with the sun is ancient and pagan, deriving from obscured metaphor of the sun as a symbol of Jesus Christ. [Genesis 1:3-5, Deuteronomy 4:19, Revelation 22:5]

> The vestments of the Priest of Horus are covered with Crosses of equal limbs, thus +. The Cross is also the recognised sign of orthodox Buddhism. ...
>
> These same shaped Crosses I have also observed in the Vatican Etruscan Museum, at Rome. They are on the breast of some large Etruscan male figures in paint, very pronounced, from mural decorations in ancient Etruscan tombs.
> Similar also to these are Crosses on two figures (also on the breast) to be seen in the British Museum, in the great Egyptian Hall on the ground-floor, on the right, passing to the staircase. ... The Cross is the same shape as the above, of equal limbs.

There is a figure of the youthful Bacchus, taken from an ancient vase with which, antiquarians are familiar, holding a cup and a leafless branch — a figure of much beauty. The head-dress is a band ornamented with Crosses of the same form as above.

A portion of the band falls from the head, and with its fringe and single Cross, if lengthened, would form curiously enough, a complete Priest's stole.

A consecrated wafer marked with a Cross was also used in the rites of Bacchus. The Cross in a circle is supposed to indicate sun worship. ~ Brock[516]

Fictional character "Professor Charles Francis Xavier", leader of the "X-Men" super heroes. Marvel comics [FAIR USE].

Again, a well-researched pro-homosexual blog gives the seedy details of Versailles that are avoided by the "expert" sources.

Homosexuality and lesbianism is woven into the history of the Palace of Versailles and into the lives of its most famous residents. ...

Louis XIII became king of France at just nine years old. And from his teenage years he preferred the company of male courtiers to women.

Charles d'Albert, the young Duke of Luyens, was his particular favorite. While it's not certain the two had a sexual relationship, it is widely rumored.

We do know they shared another passion – hunting. Among the titles Louis granted Charles was Grand Falconer of France. Caring for the king's hunting birds was a great honor.

Luyens died of a fever while fighting Protestants in 1621.

But the king kept hunting. And in 1624, that was to change the shape of a small village 20kms southwest of Paris – Versailles.

Louis, then in his early 20s, decided to build his hunting lodge there.

In Louis son's reign, Versailles was to evolve from hunting lodge to palace. But falconry was never forgotten there. The palace's world famous Hall of Mirrors would host an annual ceremony when the king would receive his new falcons.

Louis started another fashion in 1624, donning a wig. By doing so, he set the style of European men wearing wigs for the best part of two centuries.

The king had married Anne of Austria, daughter of Philip III of Spain, aged just 14. Politics, not love, dictated the match, which cemented the political and military alliance between the Catholic countries of France and Spain.

Some claim the king and queen enjoyed a few years of marital happiness. But Louis was soon busy with his male courtiers again. ...

Meanwhile, Louis didn't follow the usual kingly fashion by having a mistress. That was so unusual that he earned the nickname "Louis the Chaste".

...the king started another relationship with François de Baradas. He was a handsome and athletic officer in Louis' household.

A contemporary writer said Louis "loved Baradas violently". He added that the king committed "a hundred filthy acts with him". ...

Next in line was a more sensible young man, Saint-Simon. He stayed in the king's favor for a decade and ended up a duke. But he became too close to the enemies of Cardinal Richelieu, the virtual co-ruler of France, who had him banished.

Then there was the good-looking and stylish Henri Coiffier de Ruzé, the Marquis of Cinq-Mars.

Louis was obsessed with him but the two regularly argued, causing him much unhappiness. The king even complained to Cardinal Richelieu that the fights were making him have sleepless nights. ...

Louis suffered from ulcerated intestines, tuberculosis and generally weak health and died aged 41.

He left France much more firmly under the rule of the king rather than the nobles. And that was something his son and heir Louis XIV was to capitalise on.

But it was his other son, Philippe I, Duke of Orléans, who was to be the next great LGBTI[[cccLxxxiv]] figure in the French court.

The next king, Louis XIV created a new vision of monarchy, with Versailles at its heart.

He poured a fortune into large scale expansion of Versailles, swamping his father's hunting lodge. What is more, he positioned himself as the Sun King. Even today, symbols of him depicted as the sun, with light shining from him, can be seen throughout Versailles.

And he put the palace to a new use. Louis XIV ordered his troublesome nobles to spend a large amount of time there. It took them away from their own lands and personal power base.

Although ambitious nobles gained from having better access to the king, it wasn't all luxury. The palace became so crowded that some had to make do with just a few small rooms.

Louis' brother, Philippe, was at the center of life in this gilded cage.

The king's brother had been noted as intelligent and attractive from childhood. One duchess called him the "prettiest child in the world".

He was also unashamedly effeminate.

His mother, Queen Anne, called him "my little girl" and encouraged him to dress in feminine clothing.[[cccLxxxv]]

Philippe adopted this as his style and in adulthood would attend balls and parties in female clothes, for example as a shepherdess. ...

Louis' second wife Madame Maintenon once complained to him about the rampant homosexuality at the court. She warned him that if he did not stamp it out, God would punish France.

Louis XIV ... replied with ... : "Should I start with my own brother?"

> In fact, it could have helped Louis XIV. If Philippe didn't particularly want to marry and have children, he was less of a threat to the king's own dynastic plans.
>
> Philippe was around 18 when he found his first young lover. Philippe Jules Mancini, the Duke of Nevers, was the son of Cardinal Mazarin, King Louis' chief minister. He was around Philippe's age.
>
> In some accounts, Mazarin even encouraged Mancini to sleep with Philippe – believing a homosexual prince was less of a threat to the king.
>
> The Catholic Church may technically disapprove of homosexuality, but not when they can use it to exercise power and influence.[517]

This is a fascinating admonition because "user-edited" Wikipedia claims redundantly that Mazarin had no children and Philippe Jules Mancini was his "nephew".

As shocking as the idea is (especially coming from a so-called "man of the cloth"), parents encouraging their children to indulge in sexual depravity so that they might gain from it, is sickeningly common.

Investigative journalist Sherman Skolnick states that Yale Skull and Bones '48 President George Herbert Walker Bush (named after banker George Herbert Walker, educated by the Jesuits at Stonyhurst boarding school in England) encouraged his son, Yale Skull and Bones '68 President George Walker Bush to have a homosexual relationship with his Yale Skull and Bones classmate, Victor Ashe.[518] Ashe was the longest-serving Mayor of Knoxville, Tennessee when his classmate and partner made him the United States Ambassador to Roman Catholic Poland: a post he was obviously and eminently qualified for.

Reid-Smith of the "Gay Star News" continues:

> Of course, the word "gay" was not used then. Even the word "homosexual" wouldn't exist until 1860s, about 200 years later. In the bigoted language of the time, the French called homosexuality "The Italian Vice".

> ... His position gave [Philippe] license to be himself. But by doing that, he provided a human shield to other gay and bi men who grouped themselves around him.
>
> For others outside his protection, the law was cruel and the Catholic persecution of homosexuals lacked any Christian compassion.
>
> In fact, Louis XIV allowed the laws to become harsher under his reign. Gay and bi men were burnt to death at the stake in France.
> And the king himself reacted brutally when his own son got caught up in [a future] scandal at Versailles.[519]

This is ironic as so many Catholic clergy (then and now) are, themselves, homosexuals and most of them "practicing". They cover for, and think to compensate for their vice by vehemently persecuting other homosexuals.

However, the modern trend in Catholicism is to follow an openly far-Left agenda of welcoming all forms of sexual deviancy.

In 2014, the Archbishop of New York, Timothy Cardinal Dolan, began welcoming homosexual activists into the St. Patrick's Day Parade (of which Dolan was Grand Marshall), much to the anger of traditional Catholics.

> New York Cardinal Timothy Dolan led Manhattan's St. Patrick's Day parade on Tuesday as grand marshal, despite backlash from faithful Catholics unhappy with the organizers' decision to allow an openly homosexual activist group to march in the event.
>
> "I'm as radiant as the sun, so thanks be to God for the honor and the joy," said Cardinal Dolan on Tuesday morning, as he led 250,000 marchers down Fifth Avenue – including a delegation from "Out @ NBC Universal," a group of gay activists who work for NBC, the network that televises the parade.
>
> Catholic commentator Michael Voris and his team from ChurchMilitant.TV were present at the parade and were able to question Dolan on his decision during a press scrum. "Your Eminence, do you have anything to say to the loyal Catholics who find what you're doing here a great scandal to the faith?" Voris asked.
> "No, come on in. We'd love to have you," Dolan replied.

Voris reports that he and his cameraman were then removed from the press scrum, providing video of an official telling them to leave, and then calling police over to escort them out of the area.

Both the parade's organizers and Cardinal Dolan drew criticism from faithful Catholics last year by approving Out@NBC Universal's request to march in this year's parade, under a banner that makes reference to their homosexuality. The controversial decision prompted the Catholic League and at least one Catholic school to pull out of the parade, while nearly 5,000 people signed a petition urging Cardinal Dolan to withdraw from the event as a show of support for Catholic teaching forbidding homosexual behavior. ~ Life Site News[520]

Finishing with the Gay Star News:

The teenage Louis, Count of Vermandois, was the son of Louis XIV and his mistress, Louise de La Vallière. This is the same mistress who had enjoyed an affair with the bisexual soldier, Armand de Gramont.

And another figure returns to the stage at this point too – the Chevalier de Lorraine, the love of Prince Philippe's life.

The Chevalier allegedly lured the young Count of Vermandois into a brotherhood dedicated to the Italian Vice – homosexuality. They called themselves "brothers" of a "holy fraternity" and ranked themselves as "grand priors" and "novices".[[ccclxxxvi]]

The Count of Bussy-Rabutin reveals that they signed up to a constitution forbidding sex with women. ... Apparently the "brothers" enthusiastically embraced these rules.

But the Sun King Louis XIV was angry when he learned about the brotherhood. He had turned a blind eye to his own brother's sex life. However the inclusion of his illegitimate son, the young Louis, and his cousin, the Prince of Conti, tipped him over the edge...

When the brotherhood was discovered in 1682, Louis XIV insisted that he would watch as Vermandois was beaten in punishment. He then ordered that the young Louis should marry as quickly as possible. And the king punished The Chevalier by sending him into exile again. ...

When Louis XIV himself died in 1715, his son, yet another Louis, was only five years old. So, while the boy became King Louis XV, he needed a regent to rule for him.

The regent was Philippe II, Duke of Orleans. He was the son of the Philippe of Orleans who had been the great queer figure at Versailles during the last reign.

There were rumors that multiple groups of nobles set up "fraternities" of people having gay sex during this regency.

... the most famous example came on an April night in 1722. A group of 17 young noblemen met in the gardens of the Tuileries Palace in Paris. ...they had sex under the windows of the apartments of the 12-year-old King Louis XV.[521]

The Secret Treaty Of Dover

In spite of (or, perhaps, because of) the vices of his Court, the Sun King was a hyper-devout Roman Catholic. With Louis the "Opus Dei Effect" was in full-court swing: indulge the flesh then do copious penance was the formula then and still is amongst Catholic Elites.

Although Luther's Protest was received with both great joy at the return of Biblical Christianity and rage at the realization of Rome's crimes throughout Europe, the "1%" in power knew that their control over the populace was maintained through Catholicism.

Holland (The Netherlands) and Scandinavia (Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland and Iceland) took to heart Luther's teachings whilst Henry VIII's "Anglican Church" allowed the same in England.

The most powerful of those nations (and, therefore, the more dangerous) was England.

Although the surge of Protestantism in Britain was short-lived, the Papacy never slept as long as the English sovereign wasn't completely in Rome's back pocket.

As was previously mentioned, England's greatest Protestant leaders were young Edward VI and Puritan Oliver Cromwell.

Edward was too passionate a Christian to be allowed to reach adulthood and was murdered by Rome as a teen, although the assassins got to Cromwell only after he won the English Civil War against the Papal tyranny of Charles I.

Lord Protector

Out of the Protestant Reformation grew hearty sects like the Puritans. They were hard-working, disciplined souls who did their best to live Christian virtue.

Such a man was Oliver Cromwell.

When war broke out, Cromwell's disciplined, religious mind made him a natural leader and excellent field tactician much as it did Pennsylvania Quaker Dick Winters in WWII, whose exploits were immortalized in the HBO series "Band of Brothers".[477]

It was Cromwell's leadership that thwarted the Roman insurgency.

> At the battles of Naseby and Langport in June and July 1645, the first showing of the Parliamentarian New Model Army under Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell, the Royalists suffered major losses.
> Charles I's surrender in May 1646 concluded the first phase of the civil war, though he rejected all proposals intended to bring a peace. However, he did reach a secret agreement with the Scots regarding Presbyterianism in England, which incensed the English Parliament.
>
> The Civil War reached the end of its next phase with Charles's trial and execution in January 1649. ... ~ The British Library Board[478]

Edith Starr Miller, the Lady Queensborough, also credits Cromwell with putting the Jesuits into dire straits.

> The Jesuit power, much weakened in England by ... the advent of Cromwell, persisted nevertheless in its efforts to recapture its former status in that land. During the reign of James II, it schemed and intrigued incessantly through its representatives

Father St. Germain[2] and his successor Father Columbière.[3] After the enactment of the limitation of the English throne to Protestant succession the Jesuit diplomatists were hard put. ~ Miller[479]

On January 20th, 1649, Charles I was executed for treason.

A series of feckless Parliaments were raised and dissolved and Oliver Cromwell was the only man with strength to rule yet the restraint not become an autocrat. Cromwell held the title of "Lord Protector" and when he was offered the crown in 1657 he refused in fury. Why had they cut the head off of one king only to raise up another?

While Cromwell reigned, England was free.

But less than a decade from the death of England's traitor sovereign, Oliver Cromwell's daughter, Elizabeth, fell ill. A doctor was sent to her but she died despite his care.

Shortly thereafter, Cromwell started to suffer from what some have called "malaria" and the same doctor attended him. He died on September 3rd, 1658 at only 59 years old, the anniversary of his two greatest victories at Dunbar and Worcester.

Accounts of his death have caused experts to now question if he was poisoned.[480]

In an entry for the Journal of the Royal College of Physicians of London*, Dr. Leonard Jan Bruce-Chwatt, an expert in malaria[481], uncovered Cromwell's healer as his killer — George Bate, physician to secret Catholic Charles I and a Royalist.[482]*

Shortly after Cromwell's death, Charles II was rushed back from exile in Scotland and reinstituted as the monarch of England. On his deathbed, he converted to Roman Catholicism.[483] ~ Illuminati Unmasked, Cirucci Charles II was Catholic long before his deathbed. The Sun King saw to that.

Three hundred and fifty years after the espionage[cccLxxxvii] took place, even highly-biased sources like "user-edited" Wikipedia acknowledge the shocking truth.

The re-insertion of a King into England made subversion of that authority far easier than having to recruit key members of Parliament or Congress (though Rome has been completely victorious there, as well).

It immediately precipitated the betrayal of England's Protestant ally, Holland.

> The Treaty of Dover, also known as the Secret Treaty of Dover, was a treaty between England and France signed at Dover on 1 June[1] 1670. It required that Charles II of England would convert to the Roman Catholic Church and assist Louis XIV with 60 warships to help and 4000 soldiers in France's war of conquest against the Dutch Republic. In exchange, Charles would secretly receive a yearly pension of £230,000, as well as an extra sum of money when Charles informed the English people of his conversion, and France would send 6,000 French troops if there was ever a rebellion against Charles in England. The secret treaty was signed by Arlington, Arundell, Clifford and Bellings for England and Colbert de Croissy for France. Both kings exchanged letters of ratification and kept secret the existence of the treaty.[2] A public treaty of Dover was also negotiated, but it was a fake designed for propaganda and to hide the religious dimension of the secret treaty. The Third Anglo-Dutch War was a direct consequence of this treaty.[3] The actual treaty was published by historians a century later.[522]

Louis waged endless and relentless wars to expand his territory, seeking to secure key cities on his borders such as Luxembourg, Casale, and Strasbourg.

But it was his persecution of Christians that truly obsessed him, as a "loyal son of the Church".

Father Nicolaus Copernicus had taught that "all revolved around the sun", so also all should revolve around King Louis and his Catholicism: cuius regio, eius religio (whose realm, his religion).

The Edict of Nantes, which had been granted by "former" Protestant Henry IV of Navarre needed to go. It provided religious freedom to French Christians that Louis found quite offensive.

Having a high Roman Catholic clergyman as Minister of State made this easy for Louis. Jules Cardinal Mazarin had already empowered a Royal Commission to review the status of Huguenots in France, to exclude them from public office and begin closing down their places of worship.

The Sun King took these restrictions much further.

Nantes was revoked under the Edict of Fontainebleau in 1685.

Louis closed all Protestant schools and churches, forbade Catholics from marrying Protestants, and when pastors and preachers took to the streets instead, they were arrested and sometimes tortured and killed.

The Catholic clergy that populated the Sun King's Court were deeply pleased.

In fact, the King's Confessor was a Jesuit Priest named François de la Chaise.

Rather than stand down his bloated army, Louis wished to keep it active and found a unique solution: forcing Christian homes to quarter his soldiers.

The policy was known as Dragonnades, and the most brutal or criminal of soldiery were prized for the duty. They frequently raped and violated wives, daughters, even sons and servants.

Huguenots attempted to flee France to more hospitable nations like England, Switzerland and Holland as well as untamed colonies but Louis forbade them from leaving. They would be tortured and abused into Catholicism and many were forcibly baptized and cataloged into Church rolls: aut Mass aut mortem (Latin for "be at Mass or be dead").

Louis' clergy boosted his ego by telling him that he had whittled the Christian population from 900,000 in France to 1,500 or 1,000.

Many Protestants were able to escape France and the nation paid a high price in the loss of skill, intellect and creativity.

One of the excuses for the persecution was disloyalty to the Crown but the effect upon the military soon showed this to be a falsification as the army lost 500 officers, 8,000 sailors and 10,000 soldiers due the Huguenot exodus.

The smallest number — the officers — was perhaps the most telling as many were landed Aristocrats with little reason not to be Catholic other than sincere dedication to the Christian Faith.

They brought their skill and experience to the enemies of France and they did much damage fighting for nations like England.

Duke Friedrich Hermann von Schönberg was perhaps the most important defection. Schönberg had led his French troops with distinction and had earned the title “Marshal”.

With the assassination of Oliver Cromwell, his son Richard became Lord Protector of England but Richard lacked his father’s charisma and leadership.

Key members of Parliament turned Royalist and Richard Cromwell was forced to step down after less than a year in 1659.

The son of Charles I, Charles II (of course), was welcomed back to rule in England.

Charles and his brother James were living in exile in Catholic France although Charles later moved on to Spain for political expediency.

Charles died in 1685 by what may have been a stroke. Having no legitimate heirs, James II was put on the throne.

Although Charles had played at being Protestant, James had openly converted in France and his rule brought alarm to both loyal Ministers of Parliament and the citizenry.

Like Louis, James attempted to keep an active standing army but this was unacceptable to common Englishmen. When James encouraged Catholics to become officers without an oath of loyalty, many knew conflict was inevitable.

It was soon learned that James had a Jesuit confessor, Baronet Edward Petre, guiding his every move back towards Rome. For the first time since the reign of Bloody Mary, the Papal Nuncio, Ferdinando d´Adda, was welcomed at Court.

James continued to push his “Royal prerogative”, also known as “dispensing power” to expand the influence of Catholics in England. In 1687 he issued the aptly-named Declaration of Indulgence which allowed Catholics to openly dissent from government policy. He then required his edict to be read in the Protestant Churches.

James II injected Catholic teachers into Oxford, Christ Church and University College where they usurped power. When the Protestant President of Magdalen College died, James forced secret Catholic Anthony Farmer into the position, though he was completely unqualified and it should have been up to the Board of Regents to promote a qualified, on-campus educator to the position.

In 1886, Lord Robert Montagu, Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli’s Vice-President of the Committee on Education and a member of Queen Victoria’s Privy Council, went even further, as he described James’ role in the Vatican’s usurpation of all Ireland.

> Mr. [William Ewart] Gladstone [Prime Minister of Britain from 1892-1894] has been realizing the policy of [Richard Talbot, 1st Earl of] Tyrconnel, in Ireland. It was the old policy of the Jesuit party, which Tyrconnel carried out. Tyrconnel was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, under King James II. His nick-name was “Lying Dick Talbot” (Macaulay: Hist. II., p. 144). He “swore savagely at the Act of Settlement[[cclxxxviii]]”, and called the English interest a foul thing, a roguish thing, and a “damned thing,” while he “at first pretended to be convinced that the distribution of property could not, after the lapse of so many years, be altered.”
> Gradually, however, he took another tone, and tried to persuade the Council to deprive the English Protestant landowners of their property, and place it again in Catholic hands.
>
> In making a progress through Ireland, he found to his surprise, that the Roman Catholic secular Priests “exhorted their congregations to withhold from him all marks of honour.”
> But the Irish peasantry followed the lead of the Jesuits, and crypto-Jesuits, and the Regular Priests of the other Orders, and “sang Erse > songs in praise of Tyrconnel, who would, they doubted not, soon reappear to complete the humiliation of their English oppressors."[523]

In 1886, Lord Montagu used the term "Crypto-Jesuit" to describe incognito ordained Jesuits fulfilling their "Blood Oath" by infiltrating countless governments and organizations for espionage and destruction.

Today, that term has been mutated by those same Jesuits to blame Jews, instead. It is simultaneously cunning and ridiculous as anyone can be (and is) called a "Crypto-Jew" without cause or proof, simply to distract from the machinations of the Company.

Montagu described the same infiltration we experience today, though not just in government, but "law enforcement" and critical infrastructure as well.

The base of operations for the effort to control England was across the Channel in Roman Catholic France, the home of the Sun King.

> Another historian, Armand Carrel, wrote, in 1827, a book on "the Counter-Revolution in England." It was translated into English, and published by Bogue in 1846.
> Carrel traces the action of Tyrconnel directly to the Jesuits; and he wrote with the papers of the French Foreign Office at his command.
>
> To the Jesuits he ascribes great power, during the reign of James II., because James "never ceased to conspire with them. The orders which he dictated to the Council, were those which the directors of his conscience had previously sanctioned; these were the true Ministers, who had practical cognisance of all public affairs, through the obscure medium of their police, which everywhere superintended and influenced the authorities, high and low."
>
> There was, in fact, "a secret Government," which overrode the real Government of the country.
> Even the Courts of Justice were prostituted, and made mere engines of the well-known revenge and spite of the Jesuits against all those who had thwarted their projects, or passed censures on their acts.[524]

The warping of justice in the West through a Jesuitical application of “law” is so overwhelming it has sprouted its own subculture which Rome also feeds and twists to a destructive extreme with movies such as “Dirty Harry”, “Death Wish”, and “Falling Down”.

In each case, the “hero” (or “anti-hero”) is never truly righteous and never wins his fight against corruption. Instead, they self-destruct or barely escape the clutches of the Machine.

Montagu notes with sour surprise how the power of the Jesuits was as strong in his century as one and two before.

We can say the same, today.

Montagu then discloses an accusation erased by history: England’s Catholic King James II was an ordained Jesuit.

> Such a state of things might, in one respect, be more easily brought about in those days than in these. For (as we learn from certain letters, from the Jesuits at Liege to the Jesuits at Fribourg, which had been intercepted in Holland, and sent over to England) James II. had been “received” as a member of the Society of Jesus, and had vowed that the interests of the society should be his one end and aim; and that he would complete the conversion of the three kingdoms, or else earn a blessed martyrdom in the attempt.
> Nor was it necessary for him to go abroad every Easter, to make his confession and obtain advice from his Jesuit superiors; for Jesuits and crypto-Jesuits in plenty had been placed about him; and he had a Jesuit confessor and “Spiritual Director.”[525]

That was Father Edward Petre (1631 – 1699), the Knighted and landed Baronet of Cranham. James was so bold a Catholic upon the Throne of England that he flaunted Petre’s position and made him publicly his “advisor” by placing him upon the Royal “Privy Council”.

Petre was also the Vice Provincial of his Order in England.[cccLxxxix]

> In 1686 and 1687, Lord Tyrconnel pushed forward, with all the energy of his character, that part of the Jesuits’ plan which consisted in turning Ireland into one vast camp.[526]

How thoroughly have the Jesuits succeeded for Rome!

It was done with the usual tyranny of the iron fist.

> He took the ancient charters from the towns, so that there might be no law in Ireland but such as he approved; he put an end to the Corporate bodies, and dismissed all the Protestants who had been employed under the Duke of Ormond, or the Earl of Clarendon.
> By various acts of cruelty, he managed to worry out and extirpate the Protestant landlords, so that he might have at his command a Catholic Ireland to assist King James, if a struggle should ensue between the Catholic throne and Protestant England (Armand Carrel, p. 233).[527]

Although James' first wife, Anne Hyde, was a converted Roman Catholic, their two surviving daughters (other children died in infancy), Mary and Anne, were raised Protestant.

This posed a problem for Rome so James moved to pass the Crown to the Sun King of Catholic France.

> In 1687, King James (Macaulay, II., p. 306) entertained, the intention of leaving his crown at the disposal of Louis, the King of France — that Louis XIV. who had a Jesuit confessor [François de la Chaise], and was a willing tool of the Jesuits; that Louis who could not be got to listen to any complaints from the other side, "because he had so much of (Pere) Coton in his ears."
> The original paper, according to Lord Macaulay, exists in the archives of France and Holland...
> This paper was "handed about from "Jesuit to Jesuit, and from courtier to courtier, till some eminent Roman Catholics, in whom bigotry had not extinguished patriotism, furnished the Dutch ambassador with a copy."[528]

But the plan to bracket England between Catholic France and a Catholic Ireland was hatched and fomented across several centuries.

> In the meantime "Tyrconnel had, with his master's approbation, made arrangements for separating Ireland from the Empire (an aggravated Home Rule), and for placing her under the protection of Louis, as soon as the Crown should devolve on a Protestant Sovereign." ...

Tyrconnel proposed it in 1687; and Gladstone realized the scheme in 1881.[529]

The methodology of control is exactly as that being used today: positions of critical power are held by open, hyper-devout Catholics (usually Jesuit-trained).

Others are held by dupes, puppets and pawns who are either bribed or blackmailed into loyalty.

We must not suppose that the persons to whom James confided political places, or high posts in the army, were all Roman Catholics...

There were some who, while Romanists at heart, would have indignantly denied that they were Papists; and who would have betrayed their true character to the vigilant, who observed that they let a Popish conspirator escape at a critical moment, when they might have brought him to justice; or perceived that they conducted a cause in the law courts in such a way that justice should be wrested, in order to give vast riches to some adherent of the Roman Catholic cause.

Nor was it always advantageous to James to appoint Roman Catholics, whenever he could obtain professing Protestants whom he could manipulate and get to "roll the log" for the Papists.

He replaced the Duke of Ormond [James Butler] by the Earl of Clarendon [Henry Hyde, the brother of James' first wife, Anne Hyde] in the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland.

"He did not, however, confide his projects to Clarendon; he rather, indeed, made use of him to conceal them; for the attachment of the Earl of Clarendon to the Anglican religion being well known, his nomination would reassure the Protestants of Ireland; and it was important that their suspicions should not as yet be aroused."

"The person entrusted with the preparation of the Popish revolution in Ireland, and with organizing the troops who might come when the > proper time arrived, was a Popish officer named Talbot, created Earl of Tyrconnel by the King."

> He was the Parnell of that day![[cccxc]]
>
> May we, in this day, have our eyes opened and our energies aroused after the example of our forefathers two centuries ago!
>
> The history of that day is repeating itself so exactly in this day that we must be crass indeed if we do not understand the recondite meaning of events; and then but a little energy will be required to speak out what we see; and that will suffice to stop the Jesuit schemes for the present. [530]

Sadly, Lord Montagu's warnings were left unheeded.

Montagu describes the false Hegelian dichotomy of 19th century English Whig vs. Tory politics as one could precisely describe them today in "Republican vs. Democrat" America where (in 2015) Jesuit-trained House Speaker John Boehner worked hand-in-hand with Jesuit-mentored Democrat leader Nancy Pelosi to provide Jesuit Jorge Mario Bergoglio with the first-ever address of a Pope to the combined government of the United States in September of that year.

> In reading Armand Carrel's book we turn back frequently to the title-page, to assure ourselves that we are not perusing contemporary history.[[cccxci]]
> "To obtain or to retain certain employments, it was necessary to be of the same religion with the King."
>
> A famous crypto-Jesuit used to say to me, even in the days of the Protestant Lord [Henry John Temple, 3rd Viscount of] Palmerston, that there were two sides in the House; but that the division was not between Whig and Tory, Radical and Conservative, or any other political parties.
> Then, he added, "rest assured that no one ever gets on in the House except either by Palmerston or by me."[531]

Montagu confirms in 1886 what we know today: that agents of the Papacy disguise themselves in many forms from atheist to humanist to even Muslim.

Many promote themselves as “Protestant” but are beholden to the Luciferian doctrines of Freemasonry.

In Montagu’s example, one such Freemasonic “Protestant” was simultaneously a Knight of Malta.

> There are even those in England who consent to work in the Romanist cause at the bidding of their superiors, and yet profess to be Mahommedans.
>
> An earl said to me the other day: “Be an Atheist, be a Freethinker, be a Mahommedan, be anything you like, but do not belong to the Church of England.”
> He had just told me of one, who is extremely high in the land, who poses as a Protestant and as one of the chiefs of the Freemasons, and yet had received a dispensation from the Pope to remain so, even after having been received with great though secret pomp into the Roman Catholic society of the Knights of Malta![532]

Even at the time of Montagu’s writing, Rome was in complete control of England as she is everywhere else, today, especially in the United States.

The insurgency was conducted and is maintained through the infrastructure of “education”.

> “In order to secure the rising generation, it was necessary to have the direction of education.”
>
> “Not content with having founded colleges where the Catholic youth might be brought up secure from Protestant seductions, they determined to invade the Universities themselves”; and so they obtained the election, to fellowships of the colleges, of persons who would be content to work in their interest.
>
> The letters from the Jesuits of Liege exulted over the prosperous state of the Romanist religion in England, and explained all that the Society was doing to remove education out of the hands of heretics; they continued in these words: “We have got chairs of humanity at Lincoln, Norwich, and York; and at Worcester, a public chapel under the protection of the soldiery."

"Our brethren are about to purchase some houses at Wigan, in Lancashire."

"Our interests are advancing most powerfully."

"Fathers of our Order preach before the Royal Family, and in the principal churches."

These letters also announced the future elevation of Father Petre, the Jesuit, to the dignity of Cardinal; and the placing of Father [John] Warner, the Jesuit rector of St. Omer, about the King, as his confessor and spiritual director.

Father Petre was also sworn of the King's Privy Council, and Monsignor [Ferdinando] d'Adda [an Italian from Milan] was publicly received as Papal Nuncio at Windsor, just as Cardinal [Henry Edward] Manning was, last year, received at Marlborough House to the Prince's garden-party, at which the Queen was present.[533]

In April 1688, James ordered the Declaration of Indulgence re-read in English churches. When clergy petitioned the King to reconsider, led by Archbishop of Canterbury William Sancroft, James had them all arrested for sedition (against Rome).

Finally, James began using bribery and the altering of election districts ("gerrymandering") to pack Parliament with Catholics.

When his devout Italian Roman Catholic wife Mary gave birth to a son, threatening another generation of his policies, English Protestants rebelled. They invited Dutch Protestant William of Orange to oust James and rule in England. Making this even more appealing was that William ("Willem III") was married to James' daughter Mary, who had been raised Protestant.

William arrived in June of 1688 and, although James had superior numbers, he did not have the temperament and leadership to oppose the stronger William. He threw his Royal seal in the Thames and fled to France.

It was Dutch Protestant William of Orange who accepted German Protestant defector Marshal Frederick von Schönberg into the service of England’s Protestant military.

Louis was counting on Catholics in England rising up and causing civil war at Willem’s appearance but a revolt did not happen.

By 1693, Louis’s massive army was stretched thin and a famine choked their supplies.

France was devastated, perhaps losing as many as one million lives.

Louis was forced to reign in his aspirations.

At the turn of the century into 1700, Carlos II died in Spain without a legitimate male heir. The resulting convolutions of Royal in-breeding precipitated a war as Louis’ grandson Philippe, duc d´Anjou was one of the claimants.

The rest of Europe was so concerned with the creation of a Franco-Spanish super-state that Holy Roman (Catholic) Emperor Leopold I allied himself with Protestant William (Willem) III of England who also represented Holland as William of Orange.

The war would rage on through to the death of William and the terminal illness of Louis. Philippe did go on to become King of Spain but only by relinquishing his claim to the Throne of France. That went to Louis of Bourbon, offspring of Louis, duc´d Burgundy and Marie Adélaïde of Savoy. He ruled as Louis XV.

On September 1st, 1715, the sun set on the Sun King as a result of a host of ailments which included gout, boils and diabetes.

Retour à l´Affaire des Poisons (Back to the Affair of the Poisons)

We return to the plight, twenty-five years earlier, of Madame Marie-Madeleine-Marguerite d´Aubray, the Marquise de Brinvilliers, and the retelling of it by subtly-slanted Lady Anne Somerset.[cccxcii]

> When her room at the convent was searched a document was found headed “My Confession”. Unlike that written by Sainte-Croix, the paper was carefully preserved by her captors who saw that, provided it could be used in evidence against her, it contained extraordinarily damaging admissions. Most important, she acknowledged in it that she had poisoned her father and two brothers, and she also recorded that she had tried to poison her daughter and her husband, though in neither case had this proved fatal. In all, she had made five or six attempts on her husband's life, thinking "to make myself more comfortable" by ridding herself of him, though she had subsequently thought better of it and nursed him back to health.

Other disclosures were startling in a different way, for she detailed a history of remarkable sexual depravity. She noted that three of her five children had not been fathered by M. de Brinvilliers, for two were the product of her fourteen-year union with Sainte-Croix and another was the offspring of an unnamed cousin. She would have had more illegitimate children had she not taken drugs to induce abortion. Besides taking lovers, she had "committed incest three times a week, perhaps three hundred times" in all.[[cccxciii]] She further claimed that she had lost her virginity aged seven and that she had been even younger when she had first had impure "touchings" with her brother.[43]

One should perhaps be cautious about accepting all aspects of this confession as the literal truth. Mme de Brinvilliers herself would later attempt to discredit it by insisting that she had been of unsound mind when she wrote it and while it was obviously in her own interests to say this, parts of it invite scepticism. ...

Nowadays a different interpretation can be drawn from it for, if it was true that she was sexually abused as a very young child, this might explain, even if it cannot excuse, her extraordinary callousness and psychopathic tendencies.[534]

This admonition is a shocking, 17th century proof that, not only is power attainted through the abuse of children (what I term the "Pedocracy") but it is a system that has been in place for millennia.[cccxciv]

Somerset goes on to discuss the "controversy" over de Brinvilliers' "diary".[535]

The investigating magistrate did not accept her explanation but he was doubtful whether he could make use of her confession. If it was agreed that the document had been drawn up under the secrecy of the > confessional, then it was by definition "extra-judicial" and it would be sacrilegious to reveal its contents in a court of law. Concerned about the prospect of violating "one of religion's most sacred mysteries", Palluau[[cccxcv]] consulted a panel of senior judges.

> Several disagreed with Palluau's belief that the document was inadmissible, but the First President of the Paris Parlement*, Guillaume Lamoignon, did not deny that the matter was "highly problematic". In the end the question was referred to a group of theological experts who pronounced that, in view of the fact that no priest had been present when the document was written, it was not a confession in the religious sense. Accordingly, it was permissible to use it as evidence.*[47]

—A technicality worthy of the Sorbonne! If true, who was de Brinvilliers' Confessor? Why wasn't he interrogated as well?

This veil of Catholicism's "sanctity" blots out official investigations by "secular" justice to this very day.

On 15 July 1670, Marie de Brinvilliers was adjudicated the "mercy" of torture and then death by beheading. One possible sentence was to have her right hand cut off. She could've been tortured to death in any number of ways as well as being burned alive.

The "secular" French authorities then saw to de Brinvilliers "spiritual needs".

> It was now necessary to find a confessor to minister to the condemned woman during her final hours. The man selected for the task was a Jesuit professor of theology named Edmé Pirot. In some ways it was a surprising choice for he had no previous experience of attending prisoners on their way to execution.[536]

Apparently, there was little concern for the "sanctity of the confessional" when there were fears that de Brinvilliers was a formidable assassin whose accomplices could still be at large, waiting to topple anyone in the French Aristocracy.

Pirot saw Mme de Brinvilliers for the first time on the morning of 16 July.

As yet she had not been notified of the judges' decision, but she told him she considered it inevitable that she would be found guilty, which meant that, within twenty-four hours, she would have to undergo torture and face death.

Like the judges who had tried her, Pirot was amazed by the fact that she did not seem at all perturbed by the prospect. When she was given her midday meal she tranquilly requested that the soup served that evening should be more nutritious than usual, as the following day was likely to be "very tiring for me".[51] However, as the hours passed by, Pirot was able to penetrate her protective carapace by impressing upon her that even the vilest sinner could attain divine forgiveness through penitence. He was delighted to see "the first signs of contrition and distress" as she began to weep, declaring it was fortunate that her crimes had not gone undetected, as this afforded her a chance to escape eternal damnation. Pirot urged her to summon the judges immediately and admit everything, but though she promised she would ultimately make a full confession to the Attorney-General, she said she did not wish to do this until the following day. She realised that if she delayed it would be assumed that her admissions had been coerced from her by torture, but she said that for the remainder of the day she wished to concentrate on the spiritual guidance Pirot could offer her.[537]

Marquise de Brinvilliers was then tortured in this manner:

In preparation for her ordeal Mme de Brinvilliers was first stripped naked and then bent backwards over a wooden trestle. Her ankles were attached to a ring on the floor and her wrists fastened to rings set low on a wall. Her body was thus unnaturally distended and in a position of extreme discomfort even before the torture itself began. A cow's horn was then forced between her lips and eight coquemards of water (a coquemard was a unit of measurement equalling two and a half pints) were funnelled down her throat. After each coquemard had been administered there was a pause so that questions could be put to the prisoner and the answers noted down by the clerk in attendance. ...

After she had been compelled to swallow ten pints of water the torture entered a new or "extraordinary" phase, more severe still than the "ordinary" form which had preceded it. The trestle on which she was supported was removed and replaced by another higher off the ground, so that her body became still more arched and contorted.[538]

Despite this, de Brinvilliers gave up no new information.

Afterwards, she was given into the care of her Jesuit Confessor.

After a torture and interrogation session which had lasted a total of four and a half hours, she was permitted to rejoin her confessor in order to prepare herself for the final ordeal of execution.

For more than four hours Mme de Brinvilliers was closeted with Pirot in the Conciergerie chapel. At length, just before seven [of July 17th, 1670], the executioner indicated that the final reckoning could not be postponed any longer.[539]

Anne Somerset appears to have availed herself of Jesuit Edmé Pirot's written account[540] and the Priest also appears to have been with Marie de Brinvilliers through all of her "official" activities, from torture to execution. Somerset paints him, too, in a sympathetic light.

In the gaol courtyard Mme de Brinvilliers was loaded on to a tumbril and transported through the teeming streets to the Cathedral of Notre-Dame.

There she was required to perform a public penance: bearing a lighted torch in her hand, she had to kneel outside the church and ask pardon of "God, the King and justice" for having murdered her father and brothers "wickedly and out of vengeance and to have their wealth".[57] Then she was put back in the cart and driven to the Place de Grève.

The windows of the houses in the Place de Grève were packed with spectators who had paid high prices to observe the execution from a prime vantage point. In the square itself the crowd surrounding the scaffold was so dense that the cart driver had to lash out with his whip > to force through a passage. When Mme de Brinvilliers was finally able to mount the scaffold, a new indignity awaited her, for she had to go down on her knees while the executioner laboriously shaved her head. All the while Pirot knelt by her side murmuring prayers, but his words were often drowned out by the angry roars of the crowd.

> Having finished his preparations, the executioner indicated that he was ready to wield his sword and Pirot withdrew slightly. The blade flashed so swiftly that for a moment Pirot thought that the executioner had missed his mark, for Mme de Brinvilliers's head remained on her shoulders. Then, as he watched, the head slowly toppled sideways. Satisfied by the way he had proved his expertise, the executioner demanded complacently of Pirot, "That was a good stroke, Monsieur, was it not?"[541]

The Sun King, however, was not satisfied.

The victim had walked under her own power to the gallows; all of her limbs in good working order.

Had the torture been lenient because she was an Aristocrat?

The paranoia of poisoning far outweighed such a consideration.

Louis commissioned a Chambre Ardente (which usually presided over investigating "heretics") to search out remaining assassins.

An unusual occurrence, facilitated by a Catholic Priest, was the first to arouse suspicion in 1677.

A woman named Magdelaine de La Grange was widowed when her husband, a tax collector, was executed for receiving stolen goods. She began eking out a life as a fortune teller until she was taken in by an elderly lawyer named Jean Faurye.

After eight years with Faurye, they (supposedly together) visited a notary to register their marriage.

Faurye died shortly thereafter and de La Grange, rather than Faurye's family, received his considerable wealth.

The family lodged a complaint at the Grand Châtelet, which is the judicial and police complex in Paris. An investigation ensued and it was discovered that the man who had claimed to be her husband at the registration of their marriage was, in fact, the Priest who supposedly married them; an “Abbé Nail”.

The two were arrested and imprisoned.

In February of 1677, de La Grange wrote a letter to the Secretary of State, François-Michel le Tellier, the Marquis de Louvois, and said she had grave information that put all of France in danger.

> The involvement of Louvois was an extraordinary development, for he was one of the most powerful men in France. Born in 1639, he had since his early youth been groomed by his father, Michel Le Tellier – who himself had become Secretary for War in 1643 – to serve the King. ...
> Louvois drove himself very hard and laboured indefatigably on the King’s behalf. “I’ve never known a man [to] work so much,” the Marquis de Saint-Maurice declared in 1667. He was also a natural bully who did not consider politeness a priority. Even the King, who valued Louvois as an indispensable servant, would declare, once he was dead, that Louvois had been “an unbearable man” and among those who had less cause to be grateful to him he excited feelings of intense dislike. The King’s sister-in-law, the Duchesse d’Orléans, subsequently recalled, “Louvois made himself hated by everyone on account of his brutality and coarse speech. He had no refinement and was a detestable man.” He was physically unattractive, with a corpulent figure and jowly face, and his manners were extraordinarily brusque. Describing him as “mordant and peremptory in command, demanding complete submission to his wishes”, the Venetian ambassador noted that Louvois not only ignored the complaints of subordinates but was less than deferential to some of the principal personages at court.[2]
> Besides inspiring hostility, Louvois was ruthless about pursuing vendettas. ...

> Later it would be alleged that Louvois used the Affair of the Poisons – in which he played an active role from the start – to pursue "personal enmities" by encouraging the persecution of individuals who had annoyed him or who were affiliated to Colbert[[cccxcvi]] [542].

It was le Tellier who invented the tactic of quartering soldiers in the homes of Huguenots; le Dragonnades.[543]

The investigation was given to Nicolas-Gabriel de La Reynie, the Lieutenant-General of the Paris Police.[cccxcvii] Some considered La Reynie an unusually scrupulous and fair lawman whilst others saw him as François-Michel le Tellier's lacky.

In December of 1677, an Aristocrat named Louis Vanens was arrested for fraud involving alchemy. The sums of money involved were large enough to also arrest a small banker named Pierre Cadelan and Vanens' servant Jean Barthominat, who had been going by the name "La Chaboissière". The scam may have involved routing funds through Venice and Italy.

After his arrest, Barthominat / "La Chaboissière", claimed he, too, had information critical to the preservation of the State. He claimed that their international dealings had put him in contact with a "big cheese" who had commissioned him to take poisoned letters to the King.

An anonymous letter left in a Parisian Catholic church echoed the concern that the King might be a target of poisoning.

Then, as today, Catholic France was happy to entertain the occult and "fortune-telling" or "divining" was a trade highly sought after.

It was with great shock, then, that such a trade was found to be connected to poisoning and assassination because it was ubiquitous in Paris — an underground in plain sight, impossible to fully root out.

> The probe into Vanens's activities, coupled with the mystery of the anonymous letter, had left Louvois and La Reynie full of trepidation. At the end of 1678 a new development occurred, which convinced them that they were right to be concerned. In December a lawyer named Maître Perrin attended a dinner party given by Marie Vigoreux, the wife of a ladies' tailor.

> Now aged forty, she had at one time been a wet-nurse to members of the Aristocracy, but had abandoned that trade to set herself up as a fortune-teller.
> She had done very well at this and had acquired a sizeable clientele from every stratum of Paris society. Primi Visconti had come across la Vigoreux when the Marquise de Vassé had engaged her to tell fortunes at one of her parties and he had been very impressed by her powers. Describing her as "very knowledgeable about palmistry", he insisted that when she read his hand, the most learned of men could not have given such a well-reasoned exposition on his future.[544]

In her helpful glossary of "Principle Characters", Somerset states:

> Primi Visconti, Giovanni-Battista Italian visitor to court who arrived in France 1673. Acquired reputation for psychic powers. Wrote memoirs of his time in France.

What she fails to state, there or anywhere else, about "John Baptist" Visconti Aicardi was that he was more than just a "visitor"; he was a diplomat on behalf of the Vatican and an ordained Priest who would go on to become Bishop of Novara in the Piedmont of Italy. No doubt his warm familiarity with the occult was not only known by his superiors but encouraged.

For his part, Visconti was as good a Catholic as they come and he wrote affectionately of the Sun King's brutal tyranny.[545]

> The other guest at Mme Vigoreux's dinner party was a stout and powerfully built woman in her forties named Marie Bosse. The widow of a horse dealer, she had been briefly imprisoned for [counterfeit] coining three years earlier but had been thriving ever since her release. As the meal wore on she became somewhat drunk and astonished Maître Perrin when she suddenly declared that things were going so well for her that once she had poisoned three more people, she would be able to retire.
> Maître Perrin reported this conversation to the police, with the result that orders were given for the two women's arrest. On 4 January 1679 Mme Vigoreux and Mme Bosse (together with la Bosse's two sons and a daughter) were seized. They were taken to the Chateau de Vincennes, a royal fortress on the eastern edge of Paris. There they were confined in the fifteenth-century keep, which would be the place of custody for all suspected poisoners arrested in Paris over the next three years.

The arrest of la Vigoreux and la Bosse focused scrutiny on the numerous fortune-tellers and "divineresses" who were currently active in Paris and who for the most part had been carrying on their activities without any interference from the authorities.[546]

Catherine Monvoisin, known as "La Voisin", was the archetypical example of a "divineress" completely at home with Catholicism, necromancy, clairvoyance or conjuring demons through "spells".

LE PORTRAIT DE LA VOISIN.
Source de tant de maux maudite creature
Que par mille poisons detruisoit la Nature,
Si la parque en filant tes detestable jours
A fait regner la Mort, en prolongeant leur cours, Vn Supplice effroyable et plein d'Ignominie
A sceu trancher le fil de ton enorme vie.

Perhaps the clientele that most pushed fortune-tellers into the poisoning business were the large number of adulterers who came seeking assurance that their illicit love affairs would be allowed to blossom when their spouse was out of the picture.

“Ah, Paris!”

> A significant number of clients despaired of ever finding happiness with their husbands. Discontented wives would often want to know whether their husbands would die in the near future and it did not require a gifted clairvoyant to know that they were hoping for an affirmative answer. ...
>
> Sometimes a client would admit that she longed for her husband to die and the divineress was invariably sympathetic. A young woman called Mme Vertemart told the notorious divineress Mme Voisin that she wanted to be rid of her husband so that she could spend more time with her lover, and la Voisin assured her that this could be brought about by prayer. When Mme Vertemart said she found it difficult to believe that God would grant such a request, Mme Voisin told her that to achieve this it was “necessary to live like her and to have as much experience as she had in this kind of thing”. Mme Vertemart remained sceptical, pointing out that since her lover had a wife, she would not be able to marry him even if she were widowed, but Mme Voisin promised to take care of everything. “Don’t pry!” she chided her client, “I don’t like little women who are so penetrating; suffice to say that for me nothing is impossible … I’ve made other women happy; just bring the money.”[34] Mme Vertemart accepted these assurances but other women who came to Mme Voisin with similar problems were not content to rely on prayer alone to resolve their difficulties.
> Sometimes magic and spells were used to assist clients. Drawing on old superstitions, the divineress might perform a ritual such as “burning the faggot”, in which an incantation was chanted over a flaming log. The log was said to represent the body, blood, soul and mind of a named person, who would enjoy no peace till he had accomplished the celebrant’s desires. There were other forms of magic employed to incite love. When that doyenne of divineresses, Mme

Voisin, was requested by a M. de Prade to bring about a marriage between him and the wealthy widow, Mme Leféron, la Voisin fashioned a wax figurine of de Prade and buried it in Mme Leféron's garden.

With a woman called Mme Cottard, who wanted her lover Forne to marry her, la Voisin took a different approach. She supplied Mme Cottard with a powder to smear over her hand and said that when she next touched Cottard he would be unable to resist her.[35]

Marie Bosse believed that burying used bed sheets or samples of menstrual blood was a good way of promoting love, while urine specimens were better suited to harmful spells. Mme Voisin apparently concurred with this: when a woman called Mme Brunet applied to her in hopes that she would rid her of her husband, la Voisin instructed her to supply her with some of his urine, as well as the discarded shells of eggs that he had eaten.[36] It was only when spells using these items failed to have any effect that la Voisin adopted more extreme measures.

Pigeons' or sheep's hearts could feature in spells and sometimes even parts of the human body were used as adjuncts to sorcery. The magician Lesage admitted employing a dead man's bone in one ritual, while the formidable la Trianon went further. Not content with having a human skeleton hanging in her consulting room (when questioned about this she would claim it enhanced her piety to have an image of death constantly before her) she asked Mme Voisin to obtain the fingertips of a hanged man from her neighbour, the public executioner. La Voisin declined to carry out the errand, whereupon la Trianon herself allegedly cut the hand from a felon who had been broken on the wheel and whose decomposing corpse had been exhibited on the highway. When her house was inspected following her arrest, its contents included not only poisons such as arsenic and cantharides but also "the finger of a dried hand". [547]

As Police Lieutenant-General Reynie moved on with his investigation, one name continued to be set before him: La Voisin.

Catherine Deshayes, later Catherine Monvoisin, is one of the best examples of Roman Catholic syncretism.

Catholicism is, itself, a syncretistic mix of Babylonian, Sumerian, Egyptian and Greek paganism, draped with the nomenclature of Christianity.

It is a religion that naturally metamorphosizes into whatever is the most comfortable and pleasing to the native inhabitants and the Jesuit Order is the most adept at this process.

In fact, the Jesuits are so adept, they brought down the ire of their sister orders early on with the "Chinese Rites controversy" where Loyola's Company was so thoroughly mixing Confucianism with their religion that the rest of their practitioners could no-longer recognize it.

In Haiti, Catholicism is mixed with voodoo and known as "Vodoun".

In Mexico and Cuba, it is mixed with African spiritism and known as "Santería".

In 17th century France, Catholicism was so seamlessly mixed with demonism that Catherine "la Voisin" Monvoisin felt completely at ease with Mass in the morning and a séance in the evening.

> On 12 March 1679 Catherine Monvoisin, known as "la Voisin", was arrested as she came out of her local parish church where, as was her custom, she had attended mass. Now forty-two years old, she had been honing her skills in astrology, palmistry and physiognomy from the age of nine. Having devoted herself ever since to "cultivating the knowledge God had given her", she had pursued her calling with remarkable dedication and prided herself on providing an excellent service.[548]

As is typical with a Catholic apologist, Lady Somerset acts as if la Voisin is an aberration, not a culmination.

Further betraying her bias, she also equates (conflates) Catholicism with Christianity, despite writing about a time when the Inquisition openly persecuted, tortured and slaughtered Christian men, women and children, sometimes just for having memorized a single phrase of Scripture.[549]

> La Voisin appears genuinely to have believed in the power of magic but she combined this with an outward profession of piety. As the circumstances of her arrest suggested, she was a regular churchgoer, > and her answers to her interrogators would abound with devout sentiments and respectful invocations of the "Good Lord". When she finally began to make significant revelations she would claim that she was doing so "for the glory of God", who had commanded her to heed His will as she knelt in prayer. Earlier in her career her readiness to imply that she was in tune with the workings of providence had stood her in good stead, for clients were comforted by her apparent belief that her professional activities were compatible with Christianity*. It may be that Mme Voisin herself was scarcely aware of any contradiction. Once, having assisted at an abortion, she was said to have wept tears of joy when the midwife in attendance baptised the foetus. Far from being troubled at having terminated the unborn child's existence, she exulted in having been instrumental in securing its salvation.*[550] [emphasis added]

However, Somerset acknowledges la Voisin's popularity in a city and country made homogenously Roman Catholic by the spilled blood of "heretics".

> La Voisin's renown as a divineress had made her prosperous. One acquaintance claimed that "all the world came" to see her and Primi [Giovanni-Battista] Visconti likewise believed that "most of the ladies in Paris had visited her". Marie Bosse suggested that Mme Voisin had earned a total of 100,000 livres "from her evil dealings"; another estimate put her income at 10,000 livres a year.
> While it is impossible to know if these figures are accurate, she certainly lived in some style. Her house in the Rue Beauregard was in a suburb of Paris outside the city walls called the Villeneuve. When her clients came to visit, she saw them in a little pavilion in the garden. According to one account, she was never short of business. After noting that "la Voisin had as much money as she wanted", an envious colleague described how "before she got up every morning, there were folk waiting to see her, and throughout the rest of the day she was with more people; after that, she kept open house in the evening, with violins playing, and was always making merry".[551]

She did so well, in fact, that she was able to support her indolent husband in a time when wives paying for the household was unheard of.

One of the businesses that helped her in her success was getting rid of the evidence of incessant Parisian fornication and adultery.

> La Voisin's husband, Antoine Montvoisin, had at different times been a silk merchant and a jeweller, but his businesses had all gone bankrupt.
>
> Consequently la Voisin had to support him and all her children, and perhaps it was the pressure of having "ten mouths to fill" that spurred her into crime.
>
> When a midwife she employed had expressed qualms about performing another abortion, Mme Voisin had retorted, "You're mad! Times are too hard! How do you expect me to feed my family and children?"[552]

He, apparently, wasn't pleased with the arrangement but he clearly knew where his wife's earnings came from and took steps not to become one of her clients.

> Her husband showed scant gratitude for the way she kept him, for she complained he became vicious when drunk and treated her badly. La Voisin had never made a secret of the fact that she longed to be rid of him. One of her admirers later recalled that upon encountering la Voisin, the standard form of polite greeting was to enquire whether her husband had yet died.[14] La Voisin herself would later tell M. de La Reynie that numerous people had urged her to kill Montvoisin, while maintaining that she had rejected their advice. Abundant evidence would eventually suggest that she had, in fact, made several attempts on his life, though none had succeeded. Perhaps she had been constrained by the need for caution, for her husband was on good terms with Samson, the public executioner. He had told Montvoisin that in the event of his dying suddenly he would arrange for an autopsy to be carried out on him.[553]

Perhaps Monsieur Monvoisin was annoyed that, with all of the illicit sex going around, his not-particularly ravishing witch wife was getting plenty on the side, herself.

> Mme Voisin's marriage may have been unhappy, but an active love life afforded some solace. Despite the homely features portrayed in the only known engraving of her, she clearly exerted a powerful sexual allure. Her lovers included magicians and alchemists such as [Adam] Lesage [a key figure in the Affair of the Poisons], [alchemist Denis Poculot, Sieur de] Blessis and Latour,[[cccxcviii]] as well as the tavern keeper M. Herault, who promised to marry her if her husband died. She even had a brief affair with a member of the Aristocracy, the Vicomte de Cousserans, to whom she had given lessons in palmistry. [554]

La Voisin's partnership with the abortionist Bosse would eventually provide Paris Police Lieutenant-General La Reynie with a wedge of accusation, enabled by greed, that cut both of them.

> At one point Mme Voisin had operated in partnership with Marie Bosse and had sent clients to her when she judged it appropriate. However, no trace remained of their former friendship for, years before, they had quarrelled over money. As would ultimately become clear, la Voisin had suspected that Mme Bosse had denied her a full share of the proceeds deriving from the murder of M. Brunet, for which his widow had paid generously. The antagonism between the two women now proved helpful to M. de La Reynie, for each proved anxious to denigrate the other.[555]

Bosse and Monvoisin (remember, born "Catherine Deshayes") implicated each other in both multiple abortions and murders by poisoning.

Police Lieutenant-General La Reynie was disturbed to find more Aristocrat clients besides Marie d´Aubray, Marquise of Brinvilliers such as Marguérite Leféron, who also had her husband murdered.

She wasn't the last.

> On 22 March Mme Voisin created another sensation when she named the lady who had wanted her to produce a poisoned posy. This turned out to be Mme Françoise de Dreux, an extremely attractive thirty-year-old who lived in the Rue des Tournelles on the Île de la Cité. She was married to a Maître de Requêtes and numbered among her relations numerous other office holders and members of the judiciary. Indeed, M. d'Ormesson, one of the commissioners of the Chambre Ardente, was a cousin.[26]

The King's court was also swarming with her family and friends.[556]

Using a flower as a method of delivery for poison is resounding complex, especially for this era.

Now recall the derision Lady Somerset has (see Footnote ccxlvii / 247) for the accusation that Catherine de´Medici poisoned Jeanne d´Albret, the Protestant Queen of Navarre, with a glove.

However, the growing list of "landed nobility" that had availed themselves of witchcraft, abortion and murder through Catholic Paris' underground threatened to dramatically curtail the investigation.

*On 10 April 1679 the Chambre d'Arsenal sat for the first time. Its procedure mirrored that of normal courts of law. The judges considered the evidence presented to them by the rapporteurs [investigators] *before themselves interrogating defendants on the sellette ["saddle": witness stand]. When reaching judgement, they took into account the opinion expressed by the Attorney-General on each case, but they were not obliged to abide by it.

The trials began on 4 May 1679. In the course of that one day Marie Bosse, Mme Vigoreux and their client Mme Ferry were examined on the sellette. Two days later all were sentenced to death and the Chamber ordered that la Bosse and la Vigoreux should be tortured prior to execution.

Under torture la Bosse clarified the methods used to kill M. Brunet. In addition she made some new allegations, the most important of which was a claim that the Maréchal [François-Henri de Montmorency, duc] de Luxembourg – one of France's foremost generals – and the Marquis de Feuquières had wanted to summon up the devil. La Vigoreux, in contrast, told her examiners little of substance. This was certainly not because they handled her gently. On the contrary, the agony of her legs being crushed in the brodequins proved too much for her and at 4 p.m.

> she died from what was officially described as "an abscess of the head".[557]

The "Maréchal de Luxembourg" was another fine example of French Catholicism.

> Luxembourg was considered immoral, even in those times, but ... he was attended by the famous Jesuit Priest [Louis] Bourdaloue. ~ Wikipedia[558]

What qualifies a Jesuit for fame? Bourdaloue was entrusted with overseeing the "conversions" of Huguenots at the hands of the "Sun King".

The French Elite, however, were not particularly lenient towards the threat of assassination.

> On 10 May [1679] the executions took place. Mme Ferry, who had confessed to poisoning her husband, had her wrist cut off outside Notre-Dame and was then taken to the Place de Grève to be hanged. Marie Bosse's eldest son was also hanged for having by his own admission assisted his mother to prepare poisons. His mother's crimes were deemed so heinous that she was burnt alive, a fate la Vigoreux would have shared had she not already died. By decree of the commission, Marie Bosse's fourteen-year-old daughter was brought to see her mother perish in the flames in the hope that the spectacle would have a salutary effect on her character.[559]

But, even here, there was special consideration for the devout Catholic witch.

> For the moment, at least, Mme Voisin was spared execution ...[560]

Unlike today, anywhere in the West, Catholic France had considerable repercussions for killing unborn children (which often entailed gruesome hooks and forceps being inserted into the womb and ripping the baby out).

> At the time abortion was a capital offence, with both the mother of the aborted child and the midwife who performed the act being liable to the death penalty.[561] therefore, they shouldn't be punished.

A report to Confessors seems to convey their continued prevalence (note again the mixing of Vatican, State and "historians").

> Although cases of this kind usually escaped exposure, this did not mean there was a low incidence of abortion. Following the death of Mlle de Guerchi, senior churchmen warned Parlement that during the past year alone, 600 women in Paris had revealed in the confessional that they had rid themselves of unwanted babies.[562]

It is also interesting to note that midwives in Paris were certified by oath for the sanctity of life,[563] just as abortion "doctors" are, today.

> On 27 May, by which time she had been in custody more than two months, Mme Lepère made much fuller admissions. She acknowledged for the first time that she had the knack of "voiding" pregnant women, though she still insisted that the technique she used was not at all invasive. She explained gravely that she performed the operation with water rather than a hooked instrument and that "everything depends on the manner of syringing".[564]

To la Voisin and Lepère, they were doing a service to the Elite of Paris by allowing them to be immoral without evidence or consequences (the root of abortion today).

If the infant should have the misfortune of being born in the process, the child was duly baptized into "the Church" before dying.

According to Catholicism, the child's soul was guaranteed Heaven despite their grisly end and agonizingly brief existence.

> By her [Lepère's] own account she had profited little from these skills, for la Voisin had always fixed the price with the client and had only given Mme Lepère a small percentage. Mme Lepère even tried to make out that for many years she had been performing a public service: by saving ladies of rank from embarrassing pregnancies, she had succeeded in conserving their honour. She took pride, too, in recalling that when she performed abortions on women who were so far advanced in pregnancy that the infant showed brief signs of life she would baptise the little creature, securing its salvation. Having saved its soul, she would take the tiny corpse in a box to the local gravedigger who, for a paltry bribe, would be prepared to bury the pathetic bundle in a corner of the cemetery. It may be doubted, however, whether all the aborted infants came to rest in consecrated ground. [Catholic Witch and abortionist Marie] La Bosse had alleged that large numbers of them were buried in la Voisin's garden (there is no mention, oddly, of it being searched for human remains) and other sources claimed that la Voisin disposed of bones and waste material in a small stove in her consulting room.[565]

Disposing of tiny bodies on the premises is still common today.

More than 2,000 medically preserved fetal remains were found at a deceased abortion provider's Illinois home Thursday by his family as they sorted through his belongings, authorities said.

A lawyer for Ulrich "George" Klopfer's family called the Will County Coroner's Office that afternoon to report that the family had found what appeared to be fetal remains, the county sheriff said in a statement. Klopfer, who died Sept. 3, worked for decades at the Women's Pavilion clinic in South Bend, Indiana, and at clinics in Gary and Fort Wayne.

Investigators arrived at Klopfer's home and found 2,246 fetal remains, according to the sheriff's office. The coroner's office took possession of them. ...

Klopfer is considered Indiana's "most prolific" abortion doctor, with tens of thousands of procedures performed, the South Bend Tribune reported. The state suspended his medical license in 2016 for failing to exercise reasonable care and for violating notice and documentation requirements, the Tribune reported. The Women's Pavilion shut down the same year.

In Indiana, fetal remains must be buried or cremated. Rep. Jackie Walorski (R-Ind.) said in a statement that she would consider > proposing federal legislation related to the disposal of aborted fetus' remains. Walorski also called on state and federal authorities to conduct a full investigation into Klopfer. ~ The Washington Post[566]

As is typical of the Pedocracy's butchers, neither "justice" nor "journalism" addressed him until after he died of natural causes.

Indiana's schizophrenia on "fetal remains" is typical of the so-called "abortion debate". The unborn child isn't given human dignity until after he or she is slaughtered brutally, then "the law" requires proper "disposal" just as in Catholic France 350 years prior!

Neither was this the case for Philadelphia abortionist Kermit Gosnell who ended up killing several women along with their babies before "law enforcement" was forced to address his outrages.

> After a two-month trial and 10 days of deliberation, a jury on Monday decided that Baby A, Baby C and Baby D lived a few fleeting moments outside their mothers' wombs before their spinal cords were severed at Kermit Gosnell's abortion clinic in West Philadelphia.
>
> The way those brief lives ended didn't amount to abortion but to three acts of first-degree murder, jurors concluded.
>
> Gosnell, in a dark suit and a maroon shirt, furrowed his brow and shook his head slightly but remained stoic when the verdicts were read in a packed Philadelphia courtroom just before 3 p.m. One juror appeared to cry. Prosecutors smiled in relief and later hugged colleagues.
>
> Jurors acquitted Gosnell of third-degree murder but found him guilty on a lesser charge of involuntary manslaughter in the 2009 death of 41-year-old Karnamaya Mongar of Virginia, who died from a drug overdose while undergoing an abortion at his clinic.
>
> The jury also acquitted him of murder in the death of another infant, known as Baby E, whom prosecutors had struggled to prove was alive after delivery. Judge Jeffrey P. Minehart previously dismissed three additional first-degree murder charges against Gosnell, each involving other infants. ...

> The case, which has unfolded since early March [2013] inside Courtroom 304 here, has garnered national attention and inflamed passions on all sides of the abortion divide.
> Antiabortion activists have seized on the macabre details — from Gosnell's practice of "snipping" the spinal cords of fetuses to the dismembered remains that investigators discovered in milk jugs and glass jars inside his Women's Medical Society clinic — as a wake-up call about the potential for wider abuse in abortion facilities and the need for stricter oversight.
>
> Antiabortion groups and politicians said Monday that the case underscored what they see as the brutality inherent in abortion procedures.
>
> "Some abortionists may have cleaner sheets than Gosnell, and better sterilized equipment and better trained accomplices, but what they do — what Gosnell did — kill babies and hurt women — is the same," Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) said in a statement.
> House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said he was "praying for the lives taken by Kermit Gosnell," and Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus tweeted that "the Gosnell ordeal shouldn't slip quietly from our conscience." ~ The Washington Post[567]

Then House Speaker John Boehner is typical of Jesuit-trained (Xavier University, 1977) Catholic "Conservatives" emplaced in key positions of power: they only talk the talk, then "pray for the dead".

The Washington Post was sure to get more than one Catholic making bold, empty statements against abortion as New Jersey's Christopher Smith is, as well. Smith has been "re-elected" twenty times and held his seat for Rome for nearly forty years and counting.[568]

Then Republican National Committee Chairman Reinhold Richard "Reince" Priebus (now "Protestant" President Donald Trump's Chief of Staff) is also Catholic.[569]

Judge Jeffrey P. Minehart, who had done his best to give Gosnell as much time as possible by dismissing charges against him until too many adult women were being killed as well, is doing so admirably as a Catholic in a key position that he taught other Catholics how to follow in his footsteps at Holy Family College in Philadelphia, from 1984-1988.[570]

The Washington Post did, however, neglect some information that would've added more specifics to Gosnell's operation. For instance, he and his assistants essentially birthed live, fully-formed babies, held them in their hands, and then viciously stabbed them in the back of the neck like butchered livestock, with a pair of scissors.

> He was given two life sentences Tuesday in a deal with prosecutors that spared him a potential death sentence, and the third sentence was handed down Wednesday. ...
> Prosecutors argued that Gosnell savagely killed late-term babies born alive by severing their spines, and taught several staff members the technique. Nine former clinic workers were convicted in the case, and four others pleaded guilty to murder. ~ The Guardian[571]

Although Gosnell was still alive for his trial, the then-72-year-old had been murdering babies for several decades previously.

Also typical, Gosnell operated his human abattoir in the heart of Philadelphia's inner city, slaughtering as many minority babies as possible. The black "doctor" claimed he saw this as a "service" to his people; but the only people serviced were the Roman-emplaced Elite.

> Despite the notoriety of the case, Gosnell has seemed oddly serene in court during the two-month trial, and apparently sees himself as a medical pioneer and tireless advocate for inner-city patients.
> "I wanted to be an effective, positive force in the minority community," Gosnell told The Philadelphia Daily News in a 2010 interview ...
>
> But prosecutors said he grew increasingly reckless as he accumulated millions of dollars from his rogue clinic, which was described as a "pill mill" for addicts by day and an "abortion mill" by night. ~ The Guardian[572]

One Jewish journalist[cccxcix] has given a disturbing example from the State of Georgia.

> The inconvenient truth of "black genocide" [has] significantly decreased the potential black population of Georgia over the past fifty years. According to recent Centers for Disease Control (CDC) statistics, while African-Americans constitute 32.2 percent of Georgia's population, 62.4 percent of abortions in Georgia are performed on African-American women. By contrast, whites constitute 60.8 percent of the Georgia population, but only 24.7 percent of abortions were performed on white women. Even pro-abortion groups like the Guttmacher Institute admit that "black women are more than 5 times as likely as white women to have an abortion." ~ Goldberg[573]

Gosnell's "multiple life sentences" were not commensurate with his crimes and he was charged with only one of the adult murders though prosecutors could have added several more. The monster's "advanced age" was used as an excuse.

> The jury spent 10 days deliberating before finding that Gosnell had killed babies or had them killed. And the jury found him complicit in the death of the 41-year-old patient, a Virginia woman who was repeatedly sedated by his untrained medical assistants. He was also sentenced Wednesday to 2 ½ to five years in her death.
> Gosnell was also convicted of hundreds of abortion law violations for performing illegal, third-term abortions or failing to counsel women and teens. Gosnell was acquitted in the deaths of four other infants.
>
> Prosecutors have declined to comment on the verdict, citing a gag order ...
> Prosecutors had planned to seek the death penalty because Gosnell killed more than one person and his victims were especially vulnerable given their age. But Gosnell's own advanced age had made it unlikely he would ever be executed before his appeals ran out. ~ The Guardian[574]

Perhaps it was just good "plea-bargaining" by Gosnell's devout Catholic lawyer, Jack McMahon. McMahon has been well-trained in his trade by Rome, having gone to two separate Catholic (but public-sounding) colleges; the University of San Diego and Gannon.[575]

At every turn, people in important positions have ties to the Vatican. It gives new understanding to the "Mark of the Beast" in Revelation 13. One could easily make the case that such a mark on the forehead or right hand is nothing more than the desire to please Rome in thought, followed by action (Biblically, the right hand is often a metaphor for acting out the heart's desires).

Women who seek abortions are at a higher risk than they could imagine.

> A Kansas City abortionist is out of business after investigators discovered a grisly house of horrors at his clinic – with fetuses kept in Styrofoam cups in his refrigerator and one employee accusing him of microwaving one and stirring it into his lunch.
>
> The unsanitary conditions in Krishna Rajanna's clinic prompted legislative approval of new abortion regulations in Kansas, a bill that was vetoed by the governor. Rajanna's activities have reportedly been the subject of law-enforcement investigations for nearly two years. ~ World Net Daily[576]

"The Governor" of Kansas in 2005 was a far-Left Democrat female named Kathleen Sebelius.

It's unusual that "World Net Daily" would choose to give her an anonymous non-mention when WND's forté is to stir the anger of America's impotent minority Right. Was there a reason?

World Net Daily was founded by "Evangelical" Joseph Farah. Farah's family emigrated from Lebanon, a country so controlled by the Company of Loyola that the 29th Superior General, Peter Hans Kolvenbach,[cd] made it his home[577] (and base of operations for birthing the so-called "War on Terror").

For Sebelius and Kansas, Rajanna was just one monster of many that found safe harbor and encouragement to slaughter the unborn through all stages of development, right up to birth.

Perhaps the most infamous example was "late-term abortionist" George Tiller.

Few details are given as to Tiller's dealing in death to the most innocent of human life but occasionally an independent investigative journalist will show up on Killer Tiller, such as Jack Cashill.

Cashill is regularly published on World Net Daily and, you guessed it, he's Roman Catholic, educated by the Franciscans at Sienna. He has taught advertising, copyrighting and feature writing at Jesuit Rockhurst in Kansas City.[578]

In March of 2009, Cashill did an exposé on a Catholic teen, "Michelle Armesto-Berge" whose mother "forced" to get an abortion at 26 weeks. The teen birthed the dead baby over a toilet, however her little body fell to the floor, instead. Armesto-Berge remains traumatized to this day.[579]

This was only one of a series of articles Cashill wrote brining to the surface the dark dealings of George Tiller. Less than two months after the facts of this crime were published, Tiller was murdered.

The superficial details of the murder suited Rome suspiciously well.

Tiller was shot through the eye at "Reformation Lutheran Church" in Wichita where he was an usher.

However, the murderer, Scott Philip Roeder, was not known for being a "Reformation Lutheran". He was known for suffering from mental illness, possibly schizophrenia or bipolar disorder.[cdi]

Roeder's "trick shot" into Tiller's eye helped circumvent the body armor Tiller had been wearing for 10 years, courtesy of the FBI's concern for his health.[580]

This also betrays the crime having been well-researched and completely premeditated by an intelligent assassin(s), not the "crime of passion" of a bipolar schizophrenic.

Although Tiller was a "Reformation Lutheran", his facility worked in conjunction with representatives of the Catholic Church who counselled teens like Armesto-Berge that, despite all of the "Pro-Life" bluster, it was really okay for a Catholic to murder her unborn child.[581]

Kathleen Sebelius had a special relationship with Tiller who sent sizable donations of his blood money to her and other Democrats. Sebelius showed her support by hosting “secret parties” at the Governor’s Mansion, honoring Tiller.[582]

Sebelius is another far-Left Roman Catholic, educated at Trinity Washington University; a private, Elite Catholic college for women. Despite her ultra-radical stance on abortion up to brutal infanticide, Sebelius continues to remain in good standing with “the Church”.

Sebelius is also another example of Leftist, generational Catholic[583] control of feudal “democracy” in America. She has the distinction of becoming the female Governor of Kansas whilst her Leftist Catholic father, John “Jack” Gilligan, was the Leftist (Democrat) Governor of Ohio.

Gilligan learned his values from the Jesuits at Saint Xavier High School in Catholic-dominated Cincinnati, Ohio and he went on to learn more at Notre Dame; a school so far-Left that it has earned the ire of former college professor Eugene Michael Jones,[584] a hyper-devout “Latin-Mass Catholic” and vicious Anti-Semite.

Sebelius’ despicable extreme on abortion was exactly what the Jesuit-programmed[585] teleprompter[586],[587] of Jesuit-mentored[588],[589] President Barack Obama told him he needed in a “Health and Human Services Secretary”. Truly, Rome enjoys mocking her victims.

Mercy For The Merciless

The failure or refusal to bring heartless monsters to justice remains consistent across history because the power of Rome remains consistent.

One of Catherine (Deshayes) “la Voisin” Monvoisin’s abortionists, Catherine Lepère, was not tortured as was customary[cdii] and “advanced age” was the excuse then as it was for Kermit Gosnell in our time!

This had the effect of shielding her associates, whom she did not divulge thanks to her quick death.

> The abortionist Mme Lepère was tried on 11 August. She was convicted of “having abused her skill as a sworn midwife” by having “brought to bed before their term several girls and women … causing the deaths of the children they were carrying”.[47] The next day she was placed in the brodequins although, in a rare instance of mercy, the torture was not actually applied on account of her advanced age. The grisly charade achieved nothing and she went to the gallows without revealing anything of substance.[590]

As Paris police pressed their interrogation of la Voisin, she gave up two more names: a “magician” and a Priest.

La Voisin’s allegations ensured that attention focused more closely on [Adam] Lesage who had been arrested on 17 March [1679] after Marie Bosse had described him as a dangerous man who put “wholly pernicious” ideas in women’s minds.[4]

Initially he had been regarded as a figure of secondary importance but now this extraordinary individual assumed a much more prominent role in the inquiry. At times, indeed, he came close to dominating it.

The real name of the self-styled Lesage (“the wise one”) was Adam du Coeuret and he came from Normandy. Now aged nearly fifty, he was physically a far from imposing figure. He habitually wore grey, with a reddish wig providing the only touch of colour,[5] but his drab appearance did not detract from his charisma. He described himself as a wool merchant, but though he had occasionally invested money in speculative ventures in the cloth trade, his primary means of making a living had never been commerce.

Lesage had already had an eventful career. He had first come to Paris in the late 1660s, though at that time he called himself Dubuisson. Before long he had met up with la Voisin and become her lover, forming such a close attachment to her that he had even attempted to send her husband into a fatal decline by burying a sheep’s heart in her garden. In 1667 la Voisin had introduced him to François Mariette, a twenty-seven-year-old priest who proved a willing collaborator. For a time the trio had worked in partnership, with la Voisin providing the two men with a steady flow of customers. After a bit, however, Mariette and Lesage had decided they could make more money by operating independently. To la Voisin’s chagrin, her business began to suffer as they enticed clients away from her. Furious at this betrayal, la Voisin engaged in angry recriminations, but this merely attracted unwelcome > attention to the activities of Mariette and Lesage, and in March 1668 the pair were arrested.[591]

Lady Somerset puts all her focus on Lesage and almost none upon Mariette.

How was a Priest involved with a witch assassin?

Other sources are more specific.

> François Mariette, a young Priest of the Church of Saint-Séverin ... was also a sorcerer. ~ Wilkinson[592]

In fact, there was more than one.

Another Priest who practiced witchcraft was in their company.

> ...a Parisian of the Parish of Saint-Eustache, named Etienne Guibourg, was then about fifty-six; he described himself as the natural son of that M. de Montmorency who had been executed at Toulouse. ~ Lair[593]

That would be Henri de Montmorency II. A general for Louis XIV, de Montmorency attacked the Huguenots with the zealousness of a true Crusader.

Unfortunately for him, he decided that the King's clergyman, Cardinal Armand Jean du Plessis, Duke of Richelieu, was encroaching too much upon the Aristocracy. Montmorency sought to oust Richelieu by force with a contingent of several thousand soldiers but the gambit failed and he was taken prisoner.

Montmorency was beheaded in the Toulouse town hall on 30 October 1632, by a "guillotine-like device".[594]

Many a Christian has been executed in such a fashion by Rome all the way back to Nero. The inventor of a device to specifically carry out that task, Joseph-Ignace[cdiii] Guillotin (1738 – 1814), was both a Freemason[595] and a Jesuit[596].[cdiv]

> When He opened the Fifth Seal, I saw under the Altar the souls of those who had been slain for the Word of God and for the Testimony which they held.
> And they cried with a loud voice, saying, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, until You judge and avenge our blood on those who dwell on the Earth?"

Then a white robe was given to each of them; and it was said to them that they should rest a little while longer, until both the number of their fellow servants and their brethren, who would be killed as they were, was completed. ...

And I saw thrones, and they sat on them, and judgment was committed to them.

Then I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded for their Witness to Jesus and for the Word of God, who had not worshiped the Beast or his Image, and had not received his Mark on their foreheads or on their hands.

And they lived and reigned with Christ for a thousand years.

But the rest of the dead did not live again until the thousand years were finished.

This is the First Resurrection.

Blessed and holy is he who has part in the First Resurrection. Over such the second death has no power, but they shall be Priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years. ~ Revelation 6:9-11, 20:4-6

Father Etienne Guibourg was an accomplished Priest who had seen several "promotions" to land himself in the Court of Louis, himself.

First a Priest at Paris, then at Saint-Spire de Corbeil, then Almoner to the Comte de Montgommery in the Castle of Villebousin, we find him now at Versailles, where he officiated in the Chapel of Buisson and at Saint-Denis, as a priest belonging to the Church of Saint-Marcel. ...

Sorcerer and artistic poisoner as he was, clever at all kinds of witchcraft, having known La Boissière, one of Sainte-Croix's pupils, and even Sainte-Croix himself (the operator of La Brinvilliers) — Guibourg, friend and accomplice of la Voisin and [Françoise] la Filastre, had fallen twenty years before under the spell of another female poisoner, and had had several children by her, nearly all of whom he had made away with.[[cdv]]

> His appearance was worthy of his trade. He had a very ruddy complexion, and the most appalling squint.
> He was called the Prior, either because he had obtained the Priory of Bois-Courtilz, near Mont Saint-Michel, or, more probably, because any one, with the offer of a bribe, could start him off at once upon the most execrable prayers. ~ Lair[597]

Father Mariette also broke his vows and kept a mistress. Not only was he a sorcerer, he was an abortionist as well.

> A little younger than Guibourg, and of very good family on his mother's side, was the second of la Voisin's collaborators, Francois Mariette, Priest of Saint-Severin.
> He also had a mistress, la Leroux, a professional poisoner.
>
> His sister, named Chapelle, was not much better than he was.
>
> Mariette undertook to dispose of all inconvenient children.[[cdvi]] ...
> The trio was completed by one Lesage, called du Buisson, though his real name was Coeuret, a man of about thirty-eight, belonging to Venoix, near Caen.[1] ~ Lair[598]

Louis XIV, himself, kept many mistresses. This actually fueled the fires of sorcery and assassination when one of his most influential "concubines", Françoise-Athénaïs de Rochechouart, the Marquise de Montespan, started to lose her status to another; Louise de La Vallière.

Françoise-Athénaïs hired the Catholic clergy cabal, led by la Voisin and a clerical incantation ensued!

> From la Voisin's hands Mme de Montespan quickly passed to those of her accomplices. From chiromancy [fortune-telling] she fled to magic, and from magic to sorcery.
>
> La Voisin looked a little at the hand and much into the eyes, quickly caught up the slightest hint, and then gave love-powders. These powders were passed under the chalice by the Priest Mariette, and the magician Lesage uttered most magic words over them.

> That was very impressive, but it was nothing compared to a certain Mass which only Guibourg could say.[599]

Even Lady Anne Somerset acknowledges that Father Etienne Guibourg murdered his own unwanted infant children.

> By this time a new set of horrors was under investigation. On 29 July [1680, sorceress Françoise] la Filastre had alleged that Guibourg had sacrificed several of the children he had had by Jeanne Chanfrain, a forty-eight-year-old woman who had been his mistress for the past twenty years. Jeanne Chanfrain was accordingly taken to Vincennes and when questioned on 9 August her answers suggested that there might be some truth in this. Of the seven children she had borne Guibourg, four could be accounted for, but the whereabouts of three were a mystery.
> Jeanne Chanfrain admitted that soon after she had given birth to her third child fathered by Guibourg, the Priest had taken it away and she suspected he had murdered it. She claimed that at the time she had been so upset that she had attacked her lover, screaming, "You wicked man, you've killed my child."
>
> Guibourg had merely retorted that "it was no business of hers and she would not be burdened with the sin of it." Despite this callous rejoinder, Jeanne had not broken off her relationship with Guibourg. The twins she bore him next had also disappeared after being entrusted to his care.[600]

Françoise-Athénaïs de Rochechouart, being the "high-born Aristocrat" mistress for the Sun King rated a most zealous "Black Mass".

Normally, a "fetus"[cdvii] from an unwanted pregnancy was delivered and sacrificed. But there were no guarantees that the child would be either fully-formed or living and making an innocent, vulnerable baby suffer is the crux of enticing demonic aid.

For "Madame de Montespan", a living infant was procured.

> The Castle, a fourteenth-century building, was very well chosen for these dark incantations. Situated about half a mile from Paris on the road to Orleans, it was easy to get at. Surrounded by deep moats filled with running water, it was easy to hide in also. So Villebousin was selected as the scene of a diabolical ceremony which was finally to tear Louise de La Valliere from the heart of a king already unfaithful enough.[[cdviii]]

Le Roy, strange Governor of Pages ! was sent to Saint-Denis to make terms with Guibourg, whom he had been soliciting for more than a year.

He promised him fifty pistoles, and a premium of 2,000 livres. The despicable creature would have done his part for ten écus.

On the day fixed, he was to go to Villebousin from his side; Mme de Montespan and "a tall creature" were to go from theirs, accompanied by Le Roy and another person whose name was not mentioned, but who was to pass as one of the gentlemen of the Archbishop of Sens. [[cdix]]

There was a chapel in the Castle, well known to Guibourg.

On a day arranged by them, a young woman was laid upon the altar. According to the sacrilegious rite, she ought to have been entirely naked; but, in a last spasm of decency, she uncovered only certain parts of her body.

A turned-down hood hid her face and breasts.

When the altar was thus prepared, and the candles lighted, Guibourg entered.

He put a white napkin upon the naked body, and placed the chalice thereon.

The Mass began, and was carried out in all its ceremonies, even to the kiss given usually by the celebrant to the altar-steps, but pressed this time upon the woman's shuddering flesh by the loathsome Guibourg.

At the consecration, obscenity was replaced by horror.

Usually, they were content to offer some abortion as a sacrifice; but this time they did everything in the grand style, and it was a little living > child that the "tall creature," the Marquise's assistant, offered to the sorcerer.

>
> He had bought the little one for an écu,[[cdx]] saying to the mother — reduced to such necessity ! — that it was to be taken to another woman who was in need of an infant at the breast.
>
> The officiating Priest then delivered this incantation: "Astaroth and Asmodeus, Princes of friendship and love, I conjure you to accept this child in sacrifice for those things I would ask of you."
>
> "I conjure you, O Spirits ! whose names are in these written papers, to attend to the wishes and plans of the person for whom this Mass is celebrated."
>
> Then the woman lying upon the altar stated her desire: "I ask for the love of the King, and that I may obtain from him all that I want for myself and my relations, that all my dependants may be pleasing to him, that he may forsake La Valliere and never see her again."[1]
> The incantation over, Guibourg cut the child's throat with a penknife, and poured the blood into the chalice. ~ Lair[601]

Somerset adds the detail that the chalice filled with the blood of a dying baby was then lifted in facsimile to the "Blood of Christ" in a mundane Catholic Mass.[602]

> The innocent victim was carried away, but soon his heart and entrails were brought back to be offered as a second oblation, and then to be calcined and reduced to powder for the use of Louis de Bourbon.[3] ~ Lair[603] [emphasis added]

Somerset also states that Guibourg, himself, tore out "the butchered infant's entrails"[604] but she makes no mention of them ending up in the hands of the Sun King after la Voisin had them "distilled".

Unfortunately, the footnote of Jules–Auguste Lair (1836 – 1907) does not further clarify his astounding assertion: that Louis XIV regularly made use of powdered baby entrails (to ingest them?).

That has been erased from the history of Roman Catholic France.

It is worth noting the year; one thousand six hundred sixty-six.

> All this happened in the year 1666,[4] at the time when, in the daytime, Mme de Montespan amused the King at La Valliere's house, while in the evenings she went to tell the Queen that she had spent the morning at Holy Mass. ~ Lair[605]

Monsieur Lair considered the Black Mass effective against the bastard children of King Louis and Louise de La Vallière, although it was already a challenge for a child to live to middle age in the Middle Ages.

> * Charles died at two years old in 1665 (before the ceremony).
> * Philippe died at one in 1666.
> * Louis was born and died also in 1666.
> * Marie Anne survived and was "legitimized" with property by her father, the King.
> * A second Louis was born the year after the Black Mass, 1667, and lived to 16 when he died trying to make a name for himself in war.

Françoise-Athénaïs de Rochechouart did triumph over Louise de La Vallière, because the Court Jesuit, Louis Bourdaloue, convinced her to become a Carmelite nun.

Not surprisingly, when it came time for the judge's gavel to fall, it barely touched the Priest, François Mariette, at all. Lady Somerset felt this was clearly due to a distant cousin in government.

> At the time it is true that no one seems to have shown any interest in this statement, for no steps were taken against those named as customers by Mariette and Lesage.
>
> The two men were both found guilty, but there was a wide disparity in their punishments.
>
> Mariette was a cousin of the magistrate who had first investigated the case[7] and this family connection ensured that when sentence was passed he was condemned only to nine years' banishment.
>
> Even this was not properly enforced, for after a short spell in a corrective institute for wayward Priests he left without permission and then withdrew to the country.

> Lesage fared much worse. Lacking Mariette's influence with the judges, he was sentenced to the galleys in perpetuity.[606]

Although Catherine (Deshayes) "la Voisin" Monvoisin was condemned to be tortured and burned at the stake, she seems to have avoided most of her punishment.

> On 17 February Mme Voisin was interrogated on the sellette by the assembled commissioners.[94] After she had been led out they unanimously pronounced her guilty and on 19 February [1680] she was informed that she had been sentenced to being burnt alive. However, before going to the stake she was subjected to another intensive examination, which stretched over three days, the final stages of which were conducted under torture.
> The outcome was not entirely satisfactory.
> La Reynie later claimed that this was because the torture had not been applied with the usual rigour and thus "produced no result". This is seemingly corroborated by the fact that Mme de Sévigné[[cdxi]] heard that even on the evening of 21 February la Voisin was in remarkably robust form, despite having emerged from the torture chamber only a few hours earlier. Having eaten a hearty supper and drunk a great deal of wine, she began singing rude songs, ignoring suggestions from her guards that since her execution was scheduled to take place the following day it would be more appropriate to immerse herself in prayer.[95]~ Somerset[607]

This had the effect of leaving "la Voisin" tight as a clam as to her methods and comrades; many of them being clergy, this was fortuitous for Rome and her hand-picked confessor confirmed it.

> Despite the trouble taken to pick a reliable confessor for la Voisin, things did not go as planned... ~ Somerset[608]

This was none other than a secret representative of Pietro Vito Ottoboni, Pope Alexander VIII.[609]

The only result of her "confession" was to recant her implication of another Aristocrat woman who had used her skill to murder her husband;

Marguerite Leféron. Thanks to this connection in Rome, Leféron escaped execution and was simply banished.

In the end, Catherine (Deshayes) “la Voisin” Monvoisin abandoned all pretense of religion and completely embraced the source of her power as she violently clung to life like a demon threatened with exorcism from her host.

> At five in the afternoon la Voisin was placed in the cart that was to transport her through the crowded streets to the execution site. Agog to see for herself the celebrated poisoner, Mme de Sévigné [Marie de Rabutin-Chantal] had stationed herself in the Rue Saint-Antoine. As a result she caught a brief glimpse of la Voisin as she passed, dressed in a white smock and looking startlingly red in the face.
> In former days la Voisin had been glib in her use of Christian terminology,[[cdxii]] invoking the Good Lord while simultaneously engaging in impious practices.
> Now, however, as her horrific death loomed, she spurned the consolations of religion and when her confessor stretched out his crucifix towards her, she angrily pushed it away. On arriving at the Place de Grève she refused to disembark from the tumbril and had to be dragged out by force, swearing dreadful oaths. Even after she had been chained to the stake she continued to resist her fate, for when straw was heaped upon her to ensure that she was speedily incinerated she kicked it away in desperation.[[cdxiii]] These last grim struggles impressed themselves on the memory of the watching crowd but “at last the flames got up and she was lost from sight”. Sprightly as ever, [[cdxiv]] Mme de Sévigné commented that la Voisin had now passed from the midst of one fire to another.[99] ~ Somerset[610]

In the end, sorcery and assassination remained safe and secret thanks to the power of the Vatican which superseded even that of the Sun King of France.

Of 442 suspects only 218 were arrested. Of those, only 36 were executed.

The only reason l´Affaire des Poisons caused a stir was the revelation that so many of Catholic France’s Elite were killing each other rather than the peasantry (which would never have raised an eyebrow).

The tumult was allowed to dissipate and soon...very soon after that, Rome began killing again.

About the Author

Giovanni Augustino “Johnny” Cirucci is a veteran of the Army and Marine Corps. He has served overseas as part of the “Global War on Terror.”

His derivation is 100% Italian, 4th generation immigrants. His family settled in the Philadelphia metropolitan area, on the New Jersey side. He was raised “Conservative” and Catholic; an upbringing that encouraged him to “give back” with service in the United States military.

Johnny’s home life was difficult. His abusive father left when he was 20 and it gave him a rebellious nature that was quick to question authority.

Johnny went off to college as a non-practicing Catholic. There he began blogging and wrote columns for his University newspaper.

A conversion experience at a local Evangelical church brought him back home as a Born Again Christian.

Frustrated with the hard-Left slant of “mainstream” media, he gravitated towards “Conservative” outlets.

However, the advent of Barack Obama in general and Obama’s “killing” of Osama bin Laden, in specific, showed Johnny that “Conservative” media was just another side of the same Machine coin. Those on the “Right” refused to adequately investigate Barack Obama’s shady background. When they maintained the official story regarding the “death” of Osama bin Laden, it was the end of Johnny’s dependence upon them. He had insider information from his military connections that confirmed bin Laden’s “death” was a Psychological Operation by the United States government against American citizens.

This pushed Johnny into the realm of “alternative media” where he stayed for about 2 years.

However, Johnny eventually learned that so-called “alternative media” was just as controlled as “mainstream media”. It was completely owned by Machine agents who gave the same information day after day.

The operatives in “alternative media” presented varying levels of truth at a greater rate than “mainstream media” but were always careful not to expose “the grand scheme”.

Sometimes, however, Machine agents of disinformation got caught in their own game. One such agent helped Johnny put together the pieces of the puzzle that pointed towards Rome as the top of the “New World Order” pyramid.

An ardent researcher, Johnny quickly verified some astounding facts and found that, historically, Christians considered Rome the great Whore of Babylon and the Pope as Anti-Christ.

When one of his web site columns on the subject did very well, he knew he needed to turn the information into a book.

That was Illuminati Unmasked, published in 2015.

The following year, Johnny published Secret History, divulging the detailed background to Illuminati.

Then on September 11th, 2017, on the eve of the 500th anniversary of Luther’s Protest, Johnny disclosed the horrors of power no other author has with Eaters of Children. Though child sacrifice and sex slave trafficking have, in rarest circumstance, been broached, only Johnny has dared give the full scope.

As a passionate Born Again Christian, Johnny has doggedly searched for and disclosed the Truth. It was this obsession that helped him uncover what he calls “the Pedocracy” and his faith in Jesus Christ that gave him the courage and determination to disclose it.

Romans of Mass Destruction is meant to be the first of several volumes which show the historical precedents for Rome’s shocking crimes, all committed on (literally) a Biblical scale.

ENDNOTES

[i] Lucius Domitius, who later became “Nero”, was the offspring of Agrippina and Consul Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus.

[ii] Tiberius Claudius Caesar Britannicus should have risen to the throne to replace his father, Tiberius Claudius, but questions were raised as to whether his mother, Valeria Messalina, had sired him from an illicit affair — possibly to Senator Gaius Silius whom she married in 48 A.D. while she was still married to Claudius. Her lust for coitus was only surpassed by her lust for power and she was executed for unfaithfulness to both her husband and the Empire.

[iv] The “Devil’s Simulation” is the system of power that I ultimately ascribe to Lucifer. It is what he tempted Christ with; the kingdoms of the world (Matthew 4:8-9) — a Satanic “Sims” game in which the abuse of the innocent is the key to power, the “Pedocracy”. For the full story, read my book Eaters of Children.

[v] A British victory on French soil in the so-called “Hundred Years’ War”: a completely needless conflagration whose sole purpose was to net the Elite of either England or France even more wealth and property than they already had.

[vii] The peasants who bled and died in these wars had no stake in them what-so-ever; as is the case with all war, past and present.
Because of the maturation of the common citizen, today’s needless wars require much more disinformation and propaganda to present what Catholic doctrine labels “Just War”, [Catechism of the Catholic Church, paragraphs 2302-2317].

[viii] Such was undoubtedly the agenda behind Catholic Wall Street lawyer and Knight of Malta William Donovan using the OSS he founded to murder General George S. Patton at the end of World War II. Although, 12 years earlier, Lieutenant Patton had earned access to power as a gate-keeper who willingly rolled his tanks against unarmed WWI veterans protesting the U.S. government’s reneging of their promised bonuses for his Freemason commander, then-Major Douglas MacArthur, Patton later lost sight of his position and repeatedly tried to win the war as quickly as possible — an outcome not allowed by his masters.
For more, read Illuminati Unmasked.

[ix] Jeanne was obviously not a bumbling farm-girl. Her vow never to take a man’s life in combat was brilliantly shrewd, allowing her to participate in the “men’s game” of war without incurring the emotional reactions of men on either side. It reminds one of Martin Luther King, Jr.’s dedication to peaceful protest; a cunning tactic to ameliorate enemies in an endeavor frought with controversy.

[x] The fabrication of a tragedy by Elites in power to entice the citizenry towards harmful ends they would not normally allow; such as a fascist police state.

[xi] Permitting homosexuals to adopt children is a heinous criminal activity that guarantees abuse of the innocent, even if just in their mental and emotional development.

[xii] Technically, it wasn't direct succession. Half-black, half-Japanese politician Bruce Harrell took over for Murray who was replaced by politician and media personality Tim Burgess. Burgess was raised "fundamentalist Protestant"; values he now says were a "really distorted view of Christianity." Burgess remains "proudly loyal" to his friend, the homosexual who adopts little boys to rape them, former Mayor Ed Murray.

[xiv] No entity has tortured and slaughtered more Christians nor burned more Bibles than the military-turned-religious "City on Seven Hills" [Revelation 17:9].

[xv] Roman Catholics have elevated the "ever-virgin" Mary to Divine worship templated upon pagan goddesses, not Christians. "Atheist" homosexual Arthur Evans is either a very useful dupe or an agent of Vatican disinformation.

[xvii] This important fact has been omitted by "user-edited" Wikipedia who has Murray simply appearing in Malta, apparently, because of all the locations around the world that seemed the best place for her to advance her agenda.

[xviii] Roman Catholicism is a syncretistic mix of paganism with the outward trappings of Christianity and much of that paganism is Roman, although other traditions and myths can be traced back to the earliest civilizations that all rebelled against YHWH.

[xix] This is deceptive manipulation as it may be considered technically accurate but the connotations of the word in modern usage are decidedly inaccurate.

[xx] In quotes because the greed of English and French Catholic Aristocrats was the only cause for shedding commoner blood.

[xxi] In other words, there were no gambling resorts for the Elite, such as Monte Carlo, in the time of de Rais. Crux Anasta was published in 1953.

[xxii] Self-proclaimed pedophile survivor David Shurter is one such accuser. Although Dave has shunned me and my information (I believe out of cowardice) I do find his story and accusations plausible, if not probable.

[xxiii] "Privileged" to add the gnostic symbol of lust and sex adopted by Catholicsm.

[xxv] For more, read Eaters of Children.

[xxvi] Notice how David McGowan mentions that de Sille was related to de Rais but gives no mention that he was an ordained Roman Catholic Priest.

[xxvii] I have never before had the displeasure to read anything that was so base and depraved yet still qualified as “researched”. I wrestled with its inclusion but felt it necessary to give the shocking details as they ultimately can be blamed upon the Great Harlot who sits upon many waters (controls many people): Rome.

[xxviii] I have edited out that Slater — overtly disrespectful of all things Christian — described Prelati as a “heretic”. Really?
Florence was the city-state home of the Medici.

[xxix] Three important points can be gleened: it is common practice of sexual sadists to violate the innocent, then feel it necessary to murder them in order to cover up the crime. Secondly (and Slater — obviously a reprobate addicted to porn, mockingly mentions this) sexual deviancy feeds itself and naturally spirals out of control when fed. This is why so-called “Adult Bookstores” are epicenters of crime both related and unrelated to sexual deviancy.
Perhaps most important of all is the source of these crimes was a graphic depiction of the behavior of Roman leaders; the Pedocracy of the Devil’s Simulation.

[xxx] “Urchin”? Here Slater devolves from his feigned scholarship and shows his true colors. One wonders if he is cheering on de Rais as he mutilates and violates children.

[xxxi] Slater concludes by saying that de Rais confessed because of “extreme torture” yet that was not the case. Read on!

[xxxii] Murray goes on about “lace” equals “garter” and “garter” signifies rank amongst witches. Although I fully agree with her connecting this to Britain’s “Order of the Garter” I feel Rome had far more sway with de Rais.

[xxxiii] For more, read Eaters of Children.

[xxxiv] Although the “Wickedest Man” seemed not to believe the de Rais’ confession was given freely, all sources state that the Marshal was spared from torture and it was excommunication that pressured him.

[xxxv] The concept of a power using corruption and treason to create a danger or fear in order to herd an unaware populace into willing slavery or tyranny wasn’t the idea of German philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel but the concept bears his name. It is more commonly known as “Thesis, Antithesis, Synthesis” or simply “Problem, Reaciton, Solution”.

[xxxvii] Apparently having an Irish Roman Catholic mother checked the box for Varadkar to be slipped into power. Being homosexual and having loose connections to the Irish populace he harms with his rule fits a host of Roman agendas. It’s no surprise that such an individual would be a charging champion for the heinous slaughter of the unborn.

[xl] “Approximately”. Far beit for me to use a Latin convention and not explain it.

[xli] Daniel 2 is the dream of Babylon’s king Nebuchadnezzar; a massive statue of a man with a head of gold (Babylon), arms and chest of silver (Medo/ Persia), torso of bronze (Greece) and legs and feet of iron (Rome into Catholicism and Orthodoxy).

[xlii] We common folk use criteria like, physical attraction, vibrant personality, shared life experiences, warm, loving, giving, etc. The Elite, however, are much more cold (“Reptilian”?) in their marital choices and often make them fully intending to carry on affairs with whatever actually attracts them.

[xliii] Don’t worry, if you read “of 1 Marine Crescent” and thought, “Cool ... is that supposed to mean something to me?” — I did, too.
If you were one of “them” you’d immediately recognize the location as one where the Elite close their gates and you look on from the outside. [Crescent Houses with Fully Rounded History, unattributed, The Irish Times, 8 November 2007]
And, no offense to Mrs. ‘Bram but her status had everything to do with why you “celebrated” her “beauty”.

[xlv] NOT EXHAUSTIVE: In no way did I seek these names, they just popped up in other research, so we can assume this is a basic cross-section of a much vaster web of deceit and insurgency.

[xlvi] The assassination of President Abraham Lincoln was a massive Vatican conspiracy buried by “historians”. For more, read Illuminati Unmasked.

[xlvii] Scalise is an open Roman Catholic who was a member of the Acacia Fraternity at Louisiana State. Acacia was founded and is controlled by Freemasons and, until recently, only Freemasons could join.

[xlviii] Kutcher was born and raised Catholic and proudly sported his “Oxford Freemasons” cap at his front-row seat to Game Two of the 2016 NBA Finals.

[l] I do have to give English film-maker Guy Ritchie a mention for seeing to the casting of Robert Downey, Jr. as Holmes and Jude Law as Watson. Viserally, actor Mark Strong (the evil “Lord Henry Blackwood”) would’ve been a far more appropriate Holmes but the “fraternity brother” chemistry and relationship between Downey Jr. and Law was worth the stretch.
Ritchie, of course, can claim the dubious honor of being one of the former husbands of “Madonna”.

[li] For more, read Secret History.

[lii] Apparently, no one is allowed to know what the discarded “D” stands for as a thorough search was unavailing.
Abbreviating a first name is often akin to perhaps using a middle name as a compound surname; a gimmick of manipulation to impress you. It's okay to not like your parents' choice of first name (there should be laws against some of what parents do to their children), just drop the initial and forget it!

Author G. Augustino Cirucci (no letters) has been quoted as saying, "This annoys the sh*t out of me."

[liii] If you have no idea what "(Gelder 13, Halberstam 248)" mean, don't worry, neither do I. I guess that along with end-notes without page numbers is how Doctors are trained to give citations. Well as long as they're learning Latin to maintain as their secret trade language to confuse you with...

[liv] Ah, I think we should look into exactly how Stoker's Protestantism was "confirmed".

[lv] This is no joking matter as tomorrow's Crusaders are being conditioned with this kind of twisted mythology to dehumanize their victims. You can do almost anything to a vampire and they just won't die.

[lvi] "Stratford-upon-Avon" is roughly the center of England in the land-locked county of Warwickshire, about an hour north of Oxford.

[lvii] Not to mock Dr. Gordon (who, in her paper, lists her name as "Heightsman [no hyphen] Gordon") but if the man is centuries-ago dead and of questionable identity it'll be pretty darn tough to get the "authorized biography".

[lviii] This is actually a double-negative implying that it's the truth!

[lix] Certainly, when "academics" have "consensus" we are to immediately shut down all critical thought and defer our existence to them!

[lx] Rightly does Arnold Matthew draw attention to this. Being ordained by legendary Jesuit Cardinal Robert Bellarmine is a sure sign that Tobie Matthew was meant to be used powerfully by the Company as an agent of insurgency in Protestant England and he was!

[lxii] For more, read Secret History.

[lxiii] All seats of power are called "capitols" after one of the "seven hills of Rome", Capitoline Hill. [Revelation 17:9] When this became too obvious, it was slightly obfuscated with the alternate spelling "capital".

[lxiv] Calvert should've pulled a Tony Blair and waited until the expiration of his office to publicaly declare of his "joining the Catholic communion." Perhaps he knew Charles wouldn't think too harshly of it.

[lxv] From the vestments to the liturgy, from the "Saints" to the "Virgin Mary", there is little between the "Church of England" and the Church of Rome save nuance and nomenclature.

[lxvi] Note how Wikipedia explains a "Protestant Anglican Chapter": According to both Anglican and Catholic canon law, a cathedral chapter is a college of clerics (chapter) formed to advise a bishop and, in the case of a vacancy of the episcopal see in some countries, to govern the diocese during the vacancy.

[lxvii] Baron Hugh de Camoys died childless in 1426 and the title was shared by sisters Margaret and Alianora afterward. It is held today by The Right Honourable Lord Camoys, Ralph Thomas Campion George Sherman Stonor, GCVO PC DL.
I think we can call the Catholic insurgency of England a complete and total success.
The name of the current Baron of Camoys not only honors an English Jesuit insurgent but an American one as well; William Tecumseh Sherman who was adopted by a family of devout Catholics. He would go on to marry his foster sister, Ellen and sire a boy who would become a Jesuit Priest; Thomas.
Sherman's slash-and-burn treatment of Southerners during his march through Georgia and the Caronlinas should've earned him the gallows but, instead, then Commanding General and later President Ulysses S. Grant made him his "Secretary of War" in 1869 followed by "Commanding General of the United States Army" — a position he held until 1883.

[lxix] Elbows, shoulders, hips and knees are all slowly dislocated and if the strain eventually rips tendons, ligaments and muscles the appendages are rendered permanently useless.

[lxx] The kindling is specifically moistened so that the victim burns as long as possible without dying: the lovely "science" of torture by the Catholic Church.

[lxxi] —a powerful and brilliantly Biblical critique of the Catholic Mass which claims that Jesus Christ is repeatedly sacrificed when Scripture clearly states otherwise. [Romans 6:10, Hebrews 10:1-18]

[lxxii] As the saying goes, "Rome neither forgives nor forgets" and she exercises the "mercy" of her master, the Devil.

[lxxiii] How much were the previous nine also edited?
As Jesuit manipulations go, this one was rather clumsy. Campion's propaganda was titled "Decem Rationes", not "Novem Rationes".
Then again, when you hide behind the language of Rome (as lawyers, doctors and politicians do), it's not that hard to fool people.

[lxxiv] The actual quote in Act III, Scene ii, is from "Queen Gertrude" regarding the insincere over-acting in a play (yes, a play within a play) written by Hamlet to indict his uncle in the death of his father, the King of Denmark; "The lady doth protest too much, methinks."
This is the same Act where Hamlet accuses Ophelia of being too forward for a woman and cries out, "Get thee to a nunnery!"
How is his father's ghost able to speak with him? — He's in Purgatory, murdered by his brother before he is able to confess his sins!

> I am thy father's spirit,
> Doom'd for a certain term to walk the night,
> And for the day confin'd to fast in fires,
> Till the foul crimes done in my days of nature
> Are burnt and purg'd away. ...
> Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand
> Of life, of crown, of queen, at once dispatch'd,
> Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
> Unhous'led, disappointed, unanel'd,

No reck'ning made, but sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head. ~ [Hamlet, Act I, Scene v]

Conservative Catholics best take this to heart; especially those for whom abortion is dearly important.
Your Church will never let you win...anything.

[lxxvi] Of course far-Left Kennedy corrupt-o-crat Teddy preferred being "advised" by other Leftist Catholics. Litmus tests like these shed important light upon the "Mark of the Beast" in Revelation 13:7.

[lxxvii] Even forty years ago the Jewish Sulzbergers who run the Times knew this obscure Romanian needed coverage? Perhaps we should say "Who run the Times for their Roman overlords..."

[lxxviii] To know anything about what this monster did to thousands of innocent men, women and children and write that is offensive beyond description.

[lxxx] Unless Papa Radu pissed off his Prime Minister, I'm thinking this was either unnecessary or being played up by the Times for propaganda as Nazism is as Catholic as Communism (which means "very"). There's plenty in all three of my previous books on that; Illuminati Unmasked, Secret History and Eaters of Children.

[lxxxi] Did he take any classes from sexual pervert, deviant and criminal Alfred Kinsey? He was there at the right time. For more read Eaters of Children.

[lxxxiii] With two billion Catholics world-wide and the most powerful infrastructure anywhere — dwarfing any Western government, including the United States — one would think a supposed foundational agenda like preserving unborn life would be as scarce as smallpox yet the most Catholic nations allow full and unfettered slaughter of the unborn through all three trimesters. Foolish Conservative Catholics are kept on the reservation by substance-less media outlets like LifeSite that chronicle their endless string of losses for them.

[lxxxiv] This unusual title convention is meant to remind you that Cardinals are equal to Lords (Alfred Lord Tennyson, etc.) and Popes are equal to Kings. Both Popes and Kings rename themselves upon succession to their "thrones" to impress upon you that they have the same "right" to rule over you as their numbered predecessor.

[lxxxv] Porn is a $100 billion industry of poison pouring into the populace. "Adult" theaters and "bookstores" are epicenters of crime. The depravity on screen encourages those addicted to emulate it.

On the rare occasions that government intervenes, a higher authority stops it. The State of Ohio shut down an "adult theater" because the film shown was grossely obscene. The porn industry sued and the Supreme Court sided with them in the 1964 Jacobellis v. Ohio. Asking, "If the French Roman Catholic Louis Malle film 'Les Amants' wasn't obscene, what was?", Supreme Court Justice Potter Seward answered, "I know it when I see it."

Given that Seward got naked in a coffin and likely committed a lewd act with a corpse as part of his Skull and Bones initiation one doubts he would.

Exempli gratia: Peter Acworth. Acworth is the founder and CEO of "Kink.com"; a porn hub for the depraved.

Specializing in sado / mashochistic themes, Acworth has 60,000 subscribers who pay his 70 employees $30/month for access to material guaranteed to create the next Jeffrey Dahmer.

Acworth started his endeavor while working his PhD at Columbia. He dropped out and moved to the "fetish capital", San Francisco where he was able to purchase the 200,000 square foot State Armory and Arsenal for $14.5 million.

What instilled the perversion in Acworth to this Satanically - successful end?

— His father was a Jesuit Priest.

The New York Times' Jon Mooallem explained, "Even as child, Acworth told me, he liked seeing people bound. 'I would get an erection while watching a cowboy-and-Indian movie where somebody was getting tied up,' he said, 'which I didn't really understand.'"

[lxxxvi] The fact that such an individual is eligible for "Taoiseach" is a testimony to the corruption of Irish politics.

[lxxxvii] As a Sovereign City-State, thanks to the 1929 Lateran Treaty of the Vatican's agent, Benito Mussolini, Rome has her own police, jails, currency, stamps and internet domain address: vatican.va.

[lxxxviii] Jesuits are now spinning parish Priests as "pastors".

[lxxxix] Overt dedication to Satan has never been good for recruiting.

[xc] I'm not hawking my books, I'm just finding a cut-off point to tell you I've written about this before! In this case, again, it's my book Secret History.

[xcii] In the language of Rome (Latin) that's 1,000 years, half of which being 500.

[xciii] This estimate of mine is low. Ottoman casutalites are listed at around 47,000 casualties with Arab casuatlies being largely "unknown". It is a foregone conclusion that rag-tag Bedouins suffered greatly under British leadership and Ottoman machine guns.

[xciv] Simply, an area ruled by a Byzantine despot. Yeah, it has a specific name but if you were as smart as a Jesuit college professor you'd know that.

[xcv] In the very next chapter we will learn of the irony behind this statement: to defend the Papacy of Rodrigo "Alexander VI" de Borgia but abandon Giovanni "Leo X" de´Medici as indefensible.

[xcvi] Only the head of the Catholic Church could personally offer a ritual "Mass" to honor Jesus Christ as a prelude to the terrifying slaughter of animals as "sport". As today, many of these animals were wounded and escaped only to suffer a lingering, agonizing death.

[xcvii] From 1309 to 1377, a weak Vatican was under the control of France and relocated to Avignon. You guessed it: for more, read Secret History.

[xcviii] Catholic “historians”, “authors” and “journalists” have cunningly thrown the onus of Rome’s crimes upon all Christendom so that “Crusades” and “Crusaders” are invariably called “Christian” and not Catholic. Given how Christians suffered as terribly if not worse than any of the Vatican’s victims, this is a shocking success of inverse-reality “gaslighting”.

[xcix] Did the highly-erudite professors misspeak? “Tyrannicide” is the death of tyrants.

[c] Good thing that was only a short “age” in Italian or even human history ... not.

[ci] King Solomon and his Temple play a critical role in the mythology of Freemasonry. Freemasons concede that the Templars are their forebearers while ignoring the Templar role as Vatican shock troops. The web of Freemasonic power serves the Pope as surely as the Templars or Jesuits and gives the added deniability screen of being “at war” with “non-Catholic” and even “Protestant” Masonry.

[civ] An unconscionable under-statement! The Papacy influenced all major “temporal” (military/political) power and controlled most of it.

[cv] As I mentioned previously, using lower-case for “church” is deceptive manipulation, as it is for any Catholic title whether “pope” or “Priest”. The Catholic Church is a centralized organization with a distinct, global network that is even more political (and tyrannical) as it is “religious”.

[cvi] If the agenda is to force an entire religion to become subject to the authority of Rome, “healing the schism” is the language an Inquisitor uses just before he pops your arms out of their sockets.

[cvii] Exactly how does Tommaso “Nicholas V” Parentucelli forcing all rivals to concede reassert “the authority of Saint Peter”? Only a Jesuit Professor can tell you.

[cix] Not to be confused with “Hitler’s Pope”, Eugenio Pacelli, Pius XII. As it became more obvious that the Vatican had completely manipulated and enabled the rise of the Third Reich (to punish Luther’s homeland), Pius XII was re-written as the pawn of Hitler when, clearly, the reverse was true. Pacelli was perfectly placed as Papal Nuncio (Vatican Ambassador) to Prussia from (1926-29) and to Germany (1917-30) to see it done. I cover him in all three of my previous books, particularly Secret History.

[cx] “Christians” who elevate the Shakespearean confusion of the “Authorized King James Version” need take this to heart, as well as the fact that, despite it’s basis on the superior Textus Receptus. It does today’s common citizen no good to read the Bible free of the modern confusion and contradiction (usually inserted by agents of the Papacy) if it’s written in a language half a millennium old and fabricated by Freemason Francis Bacon (who also edited the KJV), especially when Bacon’s handler was Jesuit Tobie Matthew.
And, you guessed it, for more on Luther, read Secret History.

[cxi] Voivode: warlord — the tyrant who had enough brutes wielding swords for him to force his will upon his neighbors

[cxii] Stephen I (István Király) of Hungary was given Roman Catholic sainthood because he required that one out of every ten towns build a church and pay for the clergy.

[cxiii] At least that is honestly clarified!

[cxiv] A tyrant is never “great” unless the Elite tell you so, for instance Catherine “the Great” was a Prussian usurper who murdered her husband so that she could rule Russia. When the Jesuits were suppressed, she gave them safe harbor with led to the manufacturing of the bloody “October Revolution”.

[cxv] —Her idea, surely...unless it was a powerful Catholic who ransomed a 10 year old girl’s innocence to gain a region by the conversion of its tyrant.

[cxvi] Because Cathars were wiped out by the Catholic Church, modern explanations of their beliefs are suspect (the winners write the history). According to controlled sources like Britannica and Wikipedia, Cathars were “dualist heretics” who divided YHWH into “good” and “bad”.

[cxvii] In the case of the Albigenses and Waldenses, trace accounts still remain that depict these valley dwellers (Vaudois) as sincere, Bible-believing Christians, persecuted and nearly erased from existence by Rome only for that reason. For more, read Secret History.

[cxviii] Is this a hypothetical? The Papist puppets in the United States government routinely commit crime by colaboarting with “organized crime”, from so-called “Operation: Underworld” (supposedly using the Mafia to fight the Nazis) to Operation: Fast and Furious where machine guns, .50 caliber sniper rifles and explosives were simply given to the Sinaloa drug cartel ostensibly to “trace” them until they were all “lost”.
As usual with these clandestine criminal operations, no single government official was tried, fired, censured, yelled at nor frowned upon. In fact, good Catholic agents of espionage like the ATF’s Deputy Directory, William McMahon, was granted paid leave courtesy of the American taxpayer, to wait out the flap while simultaneously making 6-figures at JP Morgan.

[cxx] Just like “the ends justify the means,” “kill ‘em all and let God sort ‘em out,” was coined in the process of Roman Catholics doing what they do best.

[cxxi] — Praetorians: the brutes granted exclusive access to weaponry who enforced feudal tyranny for the Elite.

[cxxv] This “heresy” was Biblical Christianity; our Professors betray the bias that gets them published tenure.

[cxxvi] By “rebel” is meant “Christians who dared to respond to the fires of the Inquisition with armed resistance.”

[cxxvii] Such societies, then or now, use secrecy to screen their heinous practices from the common citizenry (who would be outraged if they knew) and to provide the initiates with access to power no one else has. Today, such societies claim the ludicrous excuse that they need secrecy to conduct philanthropy which is, itself, just a cover for their crimes against humanity.

[cxxviii] Though it may seem impossible to judge whether his father was a true Christian or a cagy pagan, he was not one for ostentatious displays of pride.

[cxxix] "Julius Cæsar: the story of the frightened fisherman being encouraged by the assurance that he was carrying 'Cæsar and his fortunes' is universally known."

[cxxx] "Claudius, who devoted himself in the Gothic war."

[cxxxii] This is the New American Standard Bible, to which I have added some capitalization. For instance, there is only one "Earth" but there is lots of "earth" under your feet.
Studied, loyal Adventists usually have a good understanding of passages such as these. The Smiths Falls (Ontario, Canada) Adventist Church blog states the three horns are the Heruli, the Vandals and the Ostrogoths.

[cxxxiii] Strategic port city, critical to trade goods, import and export, etc.

[cxxxiv] By recycling the names of previous tyrants for their brood, current tyrants give the fruit of their loins "legitimacy" to take up where they left off.
I did a quick search and found nothing on why Warlord Alexandru of Moldavia was "Good"; probably because he felt he was and required everyone to call him that.

[cxxxv] A failed siege by Catholic (I edited out "Christian") Crusaders, hampered by the arrogance and division of their forces. As a result of their ineptitude, Bulgaria was lost to the Ottomans.

[cxxxvi] Why did countries need Latin to discuss how they interacted? —For the same reason that still exists today: because Rome has ultimate oversight.

[cxxxvii] Usually defined as "in the national interest" but actually manipulative double-speak for "in the interest of the Ruling Elite". For some reason, the Boston College Professors chose to neither translate nor explain.

[cxxxviii] The sequestered quarters of a Sultan's harem.

[cxxxix] You probably have no idea why the word "minions" is used but we will cover this further when we learn of the homosexual Medici King of France, Henry III. A "minion" was the king's sexual play-thing and, therefore, just as attracted to young boys, themselves.

[cxl] Such sensitive, Liberal, Boston College scholars!
Quran 4:16 "If two men among you are guilty of lewdness, punish them both. If they repent and amend, leave them alone."
Although Florescu and McNally imply that this was just an aberration of Mehmed II's, it was standard in any "Royal Court" that the Elite can indulge in any sexual deviancy that pleases them (even the Commissioner of the "Authorized Bible", King James, himself).

[cxli] If they kept the boy with the harem, it's obvious what he was meant for.

[cxlii] "Lover"? "Succumbed to sensual pleasures"? Seriously? A young captive boy was lusted after for sodomy by his Turkish captors. He had no choice but to allow himself to be violated.
I sure hope you didn't send your kids to a Jesuit school thinking, "Well, at least they'll get a great education."

Again we see the mention of “minions” without explanation; I will explain it for your shortly and then you’ll see why the Jesuit Professors didn’t bother.

[cxliii] SPOILER ALERT: they both ended up the same way.

[cxliv] However our two Jesuit college Professors make the untenable claim that the fall of Constantinople shocked poor Nicholas V into finally taking the Muslim hordes seriously.

[cxlv] The only way a 25-year-old could become dictator over a nation (and, soon, a monster of literally historic porportions) is if the citizenry were mentally enslaved to his “Divine Right” of blood succession to rule over them.

[cxlvi] Although Professors Florescu and McNally recount Dracula’s “Salvation-by-works” theology and how it contributed to his brutality, they erroneously ascribed it only to Orthodoxy.

[cxlvii] Now look again upon how many Supreme Court Justices are Opus Dei and know for certain that Rome thoroughly controls and dominates United States government. If ever there were a critical choke-point of tyranny without the slightest responsibility for or fear of the American people it is the United States Supreme Court which erroneously dictates “law” happily free of citizen accountability.

[cxlix] “Saint Louis” was Louis Capet Number IX (1214 – 1270). His “sainthood” was bestowed upon him by the Catholic Church because he “reformed” French “justice”. Not surprisingly (but unknown to almost all “educated” Americans), “Saint Louis, Missouri” was founded by French Roman Catholics in 1764 and has remained a Catholic city every since.

[cl] I must tell you that abuse of the innocent in this fashion is nothing short of Satanic; right in line with the heinous procedures of abortion.

[cli] This was the Impaler’s way of bragging to his Crusader brethren that he was no-longer a Muslim vassal; assuring them that he would not sell his loyalty to the Ottomans as he and many other Eastern European kings had done previously, including his father.

[clii] It offends me to see the word “Americans” applied to this outrage. At best they were unwitting mercenaries (as I was in my military service).

[cliii] Eisenhower was so devoted to his “Mamie” that when the war was over, he left his “mistress” Kay Summersby in Europe.

[cliv] If you know anything about combat in any era, you know that being wounded in the back has nothing to do with bravery or lack thereof.

[clvi] “ — the good news”?

[clvii] Less than a century ago, this was the case.

[clviii] The reason why Google has “secret off-shore” barges likely stems from the same reason the CIA and U.S. military “detain” prisoners in a foreign country said to be America’s enemy, Communist Cuba; or why pedophile providers like Jeffrey Epstein have their own island: to avoid the unheard-of event that “law enforcement” enforces domestic laws.

[clix] Both the Jesuits and the CIA have the nickname of “The Company” and both are vicious, criminal insurgencies that manipulate for Rome.

[clx] Apparently, there were no qualified native Princetonians for the job.

[clxi] Unfortunately for Leftist Catholic Barbara Boggs-Sigmund, she lost the 1990 Gubernatorial race to Leftist Catholic Jim Florio, who had already spent twenty years as a State and National Legislator. Florio did finally leave politics but maintains a very lucrative private life, to include being on the Board of Directors of Trump Entertainment Resorts, founded by “Conservative Republican” Donald Trump. Today, Trump is the “Protestant Christian” President who spent two years under the Jesuits at Fordham before adroitly transferring to the “public” University of Pennsylvania for his degree.

[clxii] The Begich family religion is not well covered but I did find a source on Mark Begich’s Catholicism: Did Hale Boggs Drop From The Sky? Johnny Cirucci, Johnny Cirucci.com, 8 May 2018

[clxiii] Blavatsky can’t be called a “Luciferian” because she claimed the Devil didn’t exist. Hope that worked out for her.

[clxiv] However, I absolutely agree with the assertion of Saussy in his critically-important work Rulers of Evil that the Jesuits, themselves, engineered their suppression. No sovereign, especially of a Catholic nation, would willingly expel the Order that served Rome perinde ac cadaver, as obedient as a corpse.

[clxvi] Whether Roderigo de Borgia’s father was Jofré Llançol or Alfonso de Borgia, he was still the product of incest.

[clxviii] “Priest”, “Bishop”, “Cardinal” and “Pope” are titles in the Roman Catholic hierarchy that denote both political and religious power. Using lower case for those titles is a subtle form of manipulation to down-play that power.

[clxix] Remember, these are all “humble disciples of Jesus Christ”.

[clxx] Again, subtle manipulation. Only Rome claims that the dialogue between Christ and His disciples, in which Peter courageously calls Him the Son of God, and Christ replys by stating that “upon this rock shall I build My ekklésia” (fellowship, following), establishes a monstrous new religion. This is especially dubious when Peter never held an official title and only Catholic tradition has him going to Rome and helping Paul establish a “church” there.

[clxxi] Irony abounds! It was actually Julius Caesar who first claimed divinity belonged to the Emperor and de Borgia was supposedly becoming the ultimate “humble” representative of Jesus Christ.

[clxxiii] The most powerful. Kings and Queens of old, Presidents and Prime Ministers of new all bow before the Pontifex Maximus [Revelation 17:2] and often don’t consider serious decisions without Papal approval.

[clxxiv] Rome was and is the undisputed suppressor of Christianity and the Word of God. [Revelation 6:9-10, 17:6]

[clxxv] The use of Vatican influence for political, "temporal" exploitation has always been Rome's agenda.

[clxxvi] Every Western colonial power answered to the Papacy until Clement VII denied Henry VIII his divorce from Catherine of Aragon forcing Henry to create his own miniature version of Catholicism in England and putting Great Britain ever-so-briefly at odds with Rome.

[clxxxi] Charles II was the Catholic son of "Anglican" Charles I, whose outrages against the citizenry and warm relations with Rome caused the English Civil War. The result was the briefest reign in history of a Protestant ruler, Puritan Oliver Cromwell. Upon Cromwell's death, his successor (his son Richard) was forced to resign and Charles was quickly restored from exile in Catholic France.

[clxxxii] Again, we immediately discern the bias with the use of "amazing" whilest more accurate adjectives would be "perverse", "murderous" or "ruthless".

[clxxxiii] —had sex with his sister and sister-in-law and then murdered her husband, his own brother. Many more human beings died by poison or poignard from this Cardinal and General. "Dazzling"? "Meteoric"?

[clxxxiv] "Saints of the Church". The very phrase admits deep influence from Rome.

[clxxxv] None but an agent of Rome calls becoming a Pope "ascending the throne of St. Peter".

[clxxxvi] If his father was truly Jofré Llançol, then he should've called himself "Pedro Luis de Llançol y Borja", as is the Spanish fashion. Notice that is the name Sabatini uses but neither Pedro nor his brother carried the Llançol name.

[clxxxvii] What is important to note about this list is that it spans "opposing" forces such as both Democrats and Republicans. Also, note that famous Knights are often famous because they were Roman Catholic Knights of Columbus. Yes, "Babe" Ruth was an accomplished hitter but his affiliations gave him the home run of approval for propaganda. Yes, Floyd Patterson was an accomplished boxer but his Catholicism helped elevate him to prominence as a successful black athlete in the 1960's (Rome revels in racial division).

[cxc] Although all of the "educated Elite" play this game with references — "if you don't know what I'm talking about you're not as smart as me", I don't: The House of Medici: Its Rise and Fall, Christopher Hibbert, William Morrow Paperbacks (May 19, 1999).

[cxci] That's "Anti-Pope John XXIII" who competed with Angelo "Gregory XII" Corraro for pre-eminence, not to be confused with Angelo Giuseppe "John XXIII" Roncalli, (1881 – 1963) who was Pope from 1953 until his death.

[cxcii] When it comes to "tithing", Christians take their queue from Abram giving 10% to the Priest / King Melchizedek. [Genesis 14:20] Melchizedek is well known as a "type" or presaging of Jesus Christ. [Hebrews 7] Truly, all Popes are the "boastful small horn" who brags blasphemously. [Daniel 7:8]

[cxciii] —the thermal springs resort in Tuscany. This adds irony as Piccolomini enjoyed the "perks" of his Papacy, he shot off a letter to Borgia to "reign it in a little".

[cxciv] Completely accurate! On the surface, this is a pious elder attempting to scold an unruly underling. In reality, it's a mob boss to a lieutenant telling him he's letting the "cat out of the bag"!

[cxcv] This gives credence to the accusations that Roderigo de Borgia had sex with his own daughter and that he sired sons like Cesare who did the same.

[cxcvi] —as opposed to today where clergy incessantly and repeatedly rape your children and their superiors carefully move them to a new diocese where they can rape even more.

[cxcvii] "Unnamed spinster" means the "cardinal" (lower-case to distract from the official position or power) wasn't particularly picky and a woman of that status had little to gain by resisting the Borgia's lust.

[cxcviii] The maîtresse-en-titre was the chief mistress of the Roman Catholic King of France, not to be confused with his wife, the Queen. It was an open secret and even entitled the lucky wench to special status.

[cxcix] Again, if you have no idea who "Infessura" was you must be a dolt! Stefano Infessura (approximately 1435 – 1500) was a forgettable lawyer who kept a diary about the goings on in Rome at his time.

[cc] "similar treatment of", in other words, "an eye for an eye".

[ccii] Achieved by the corruption of nepotism.

[cciii] Do you think these meticulous historians were really just too lazy to convert the specie of ancient Italy into something their audiences could understand or were they counting on the lack of conversion to shield their subjects from outrage?

[cciv] I'm pretty good at sleuthing Aristocratic obscurity. When one of their scribes like Sabatini simply writes "Volterra" you're supposed to show how educated and erudite you are by knowing who that is. Don't worry, he actually stumped me with that.
Volterra is an ancient, fortified mountaintop town in the Tuscany region of Italy, not a person. The closest I can come is the artist Daniele Ricciarelli who was born in Volterra and was later known as "Volterra" but he lived just before the time in question (circa 1509 – 1566) and he wasn't a writer per se so I guess I'm not as informed as Sabatini assumed.

[ccv] Again we see the outrage of the Luciferian Elite spending their ill-gotten riches to immortalize their wives, daughters and whores as "Christian" (Catholic) icons.

It was Alessandro Farnese, Pope Paul III, who saw the usefulness of gnostic mystic Ignatius Loyola's Knights of the Virgin Mary and consecrated them "the Society of Jesus" on September 27th, 1540 — a date memorialized with the birth of the dominate search engine "Google" whose algorithms so conveniently marginalize information on all things Roman.

[ccvi] Those who have named themselves ideals like "Pius" and "Innocent" have produced some of the worst examples of hellish debauchery and vicious Christian persecution. If it weren't so offensive it would be Hilarious.
Sorry. He was Pope (and "Saint") from 461 to 468.

[ccvii] The tactic of rulers not having ties to their subjects is critical to how the Elite control by tyranny and treachery.

[ccviii] It was an easy-enough undertaking as Cesare had spilled blood many times before this.

[ccix] As anyone familiar with human anatomy knows, this was posturing no less blatantly deceitful than Pope Sixtus IV granting Cesare "dispensation" from proving the legitimacy of his bastard birth by nothing less than a Papal Bull.
Some sources claim that the "rumors" of Lucrezia being seduced by her brother and father came from Giovanni Sforza. If true, it means that she was violated by incest at 13 or younger by her Roman Catholic clergy family.

[ccxi] The Aragons are Spaniards.

[ccxii] Apparently, a previous child was lost but details are not given and anything, unfortunately, is possible.

[ccxiii] This should be a stark warning to all who seek to be empowered by drinking of the Cup of Her Fornications; a Roman bargain is never worth the price paid.

[ccxiv] Not only was the Cardinal an Orsini, but he was named after John the Baptist which indicates that his family were Johannites like the Templars; worshipping the Baptist as the "true" Messiah and despising Jesus Christ as a pretender.

[ccxv] After the Borgia Pope and his murderous bastard son Cesare had Lucrezia's second husband, the young Alfonso d´Aragon, brutally stabbed on the steps of St. Peter's Basillica (then later even more brutally strangled in his recovery), Pope Alexander VI arranged for his bastard daughter to marry Alfonso d´Este, the Duke of Girolamo Savonarola's home town, Ferrara

[ccxvii] Allow me to remind you that usury banking is a Roman enterprise where key Jews were later installed to take the blame for the industry's crimes.

[ccxviii] Many innocents perished in the ensuing bloodlust.

[ccxxi] Savonarola foolishly reveled in this which only made him a bigger target, much as Joseph reveled in his visions: Now Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age. Also he made him a tunic of many colors. But when his brothers saw that their father loved him more than all his brothers, they hated him and could not speak peaceably to him.
Now Joseph had a dream, and he told it to his brothers; and they hated him even more. So he said to them, “Please hear this dream which I have dreamed: There we were, binding sheaves in the field. Then behold, my sheaf arose and also stood upright; and indeed your sheaves stood all around and bowed down to my sheaf.”
And his brothers said to him, “Shall you indeed reign over us? Or shall you indeed have dominion over us?” So they hated him even more for his dreams and for his words. ~ Genesis 37:3-8

[ccxxiii] It is quite pragmatic to require a minimum age for life-experience and maturity and a stark contrast to the Popes who made their sons and relatives Cardinals before reaching puberty.

[ccxxiv] By now, and for some time previous, Girolamo Savonarola had developed one fatal, critical flaw: he was “believing his own press”. He was relying too heavily on the assurance that his visions were both clear and directly from Almighty God and he was too vocal in capitalizing off them from the religious but fickle citizenry.

[ccxxv] The convention of taking the names of a pervious “ruler” and applying a new Roman numeral to it for the next “ruler” is to instill upon the enslaved their “Divine Right” to rule over you. Most noteworthy is how this is used in identical fashion by Roman Catholic clergy, no different from “royalty” with Cardinals as “lords” and Popes being above “kings” as kings require Papal approval of all major decisions, including the ability to divorce their queen (which was the reason why Henry number VIII created his own mini-Catholic religion in England; see Secret History).

[ccxxvii] There are no well-publicized examples of this having positive results. Nearly all accounts are biased, thanks to negative propaganda against Girolamo Savonarola, to instantly consider this a cult-like practice.
However, I can find no reports of the Friar abusing this authority. In fact, his army of children was unstoppable with him at the helm, as long as any who would question them had reverence for the Christian righteousness he represented.
Unfortunately for Savonarola, we shall see a more determined opposition soon rise.

[ccxxviii] One would think that such a story was a scandalous coup that would be re-broadcast throughout “mainstream media” but the Post got the story because it’s female “journalists” were attendees and no other outlet carried the “festivities”.
You can bet that Maher and Paltrow were carefully selected as the “expendible” notables to mention with the more delicate names being carefully redacted.

[ccxxx] Given Maher’s features it is understandable that he would gravitate towards Satanic orgies that require a mask.

[ccxxxii] "Bonfires"; there were more than one.

[ccxxxiii] Items used as enticements towards raucous and deviant sex.

[ccxxxiv] The influence of a Jesuit education is astounding. When you take the time to check upon the education of prominent people, you will find a disproportionate amount of them have been Catholic or Jesuit-educated.
The number grows even larger when you factor in those who begin with the Jesuits but transfer to get a "public" diploma like Donald Trump, or simply fail to graduate like Donald Rumsfeld from Georgetown Law in 1956.
However, when you add the number of Jesuit-educated educators who instruct or run "non-Catholic" universities you can accurately say most everyone is "Jesuit-educated"!

[ccxxxv] The only time "Christian" is appropriate in a Catholic context!

[ccxxxvi] Can you say, "Ironic projection"??

[ccxxxvii] Also known as "Trial by Ordeal" or "Trial by Fire" in which the accused is subjected to some terrifying event or even torture whereupon "the truth will out". In this case, fire was likely involved, perhaps walking across hot coals which was a common "Trial".

[ccxxxviii] It is not unduly biased to state that few men were ever greater patriots. The statement is even more emphatic in light of the activities of the previous "rulers" of Florence, the Medici.

[ccxxxix] If "Humanist exuberance" ever existed over the Canonization of Ignatius Loyola it is a testimony to how thoroughly the Jesuits infiltrated and assimilated their enemies. Given the far-Left ideology of "Humanism" today, it is a foregone conclusion.

[ccxl] Johann Adam Weishaupt, the converted Jew and founder of the "Illuminati" was also a Jesuit Professor at Ingolstadt.
The "Illuminati" were a temporary secret society used to fill the void of overt influence during the suppression of the Jesuits beginning in 1773. Once the Jesuits were reinstated in 1814, the group melted away.
Today, "Illuminati" is a buzzword and smokescreen used to hide the hand of Rome when she was the one who founded the society in the first place!

[ccxli] I have sources that prove U of PA is covertly controlled by Jesuits.

[ccxlii] For an in-depth report that includes Anthony Bourdain's "suicide", see my article When Laughing Pedophiles Lead You To Corrupt Cops at JohnnyCirucci.com

[ccxliii] The rabbit-holes on these two could fill a completely separate work. Kutcher's first wife, Demi Moore, was almost 20 years his senior and was filmed soul-kissing a 12 year-old soap opera co-star during a party. Kutcher has loaded his resumé with all he could, from Catholicism to Judaism to Freemasonry. When the FBI can't track pedophiles (because they're calling the shots at the Bureau), Kutcher is their man to go before Congress. Kunis dated child star Macaulay Culkin who was almost certainly abused but laughs about it via his satirical band "Pizza Underground".

[ccxliv] Explanation on some dating it the day before to follow!

[ccxlv] Whether or not Cesare was a Cardinal at the time had no change upon his lusts. If anything, it enflamed them.

[ccxlvii] A similar 24-hour supplanting is the insistence that Luther nailed his 95 Theses to the doors of All Saints Cathedral on the 31st when, in fact, it was on All Saints' Day; November 1st. Even "Anti-Catholic" "Baptist theologians" like James White promote this slight. White's sister, Patty Bonds, is a devout Roman Catholic. In 2009, Bonds told Marcus Grodi for EWTN's "The Journey Home" that their father (also a "Baptist minister") sexually abused his children.

[ccxlviii] Just as the CIA ignores restrictions against conducting crimes inside the borders of the United States, the FBI regularly does the reverse.

[ccxlix] If I should be blessed to continue this series, we'll cover a lot more on both these monsters of Magisterial mayhem.

[ccl] Another "John Baptist".

[ccli] "Thus always to tyrants" — the motto of the State of the Virgin ("land of the Virgin", found next to her sister State, "Mary-land") and the phrase supposedly uttered by John Wilkes Booth as he murdered Abrham Lincoln. For the secret history behind the Lincoln assassination such as who the conspirators were and how they survived prosecution, read Illuminati Unmasked.

[cclii] The very words of the Jesuit "Fourth Vow of Extreme Unction" or "Blood Oath"!

[cclv] This was the inspired work of William Tyndale who translated ἐκκλησία (ekklésia) as "assembly" or "congregation" instead of "church" or "Church", in order to undo the centralized bureaucracy of Catholicism that Christ had already put to the Cross, but was resurrected by Rome as a weapon of control and slavery. Christians have but one Mediator, Jesus Christ (I Timothy 2:5) but the religion of the Dragon insinuates her clergy to intercept and enslave souls.

"'Therefore thus says the Lord God: "Behold, I am against your magic charms by which you hunt souls there like birds. I will tear them from your arms, and let the souls go, the souls you hunt like birds. I will also tear off your veils and deliver My people out of your hand, and they shall no longer be as prey in your hand. Then you shall know that I am the Lord!"'"
"'"Because with lies you have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and you have strengthened the hands of the wicked, so that he does not turn from his wicked way to save his life. Therefore you shall no longer envision futility nor practice divination; for I will deliver My people out of your hand, and you shall know that I am the Lord."'" ~ Ezekiel 13:20-23

[cclvii] — a special court established for the trial of anyone who rebelled against Catholicism ("heretics") in France during the reign of Francis I.

[cclviii] "Let it be" or "hands off"; usually in regards to business or commerce.

[cclix] Imagine the heads that would roll all around the world were we able to convict and sentence the insurgents of Rome today!

[cclx] How ironic that Cranmer the Protestant saved Wolsey from the gallows despite Wolsey having used every means possible to kill both Protestants and the Bible. Yet no Catholics would give Cranmer such consideration when Bloody Mary went on her rampage.
Also note that none of William Tyndale's enemies were killed by any Protestant sovereigns. There are several Biblical precedents such as the Egyptian Pharaoh (thought to be Ahmose, 1550-1525 B.C.) who ordered Moses and all Hebrew boys be drowned in the nearest river and the very baby who was spared grew to be the instrument through which a subsequent Pharaoh (Ramses II, 1279 – 1213 B.C.) was drowned with his army in the Red Sea.
When the Agagite (Amalekite) Haman sought to have Persian King Ahasuerus' favored Jew, Mordecai, framed and executed, he was discovered and judged for treason. He and his entire family were killed on the platform meant for Mordecai.
King Saul in his jealousy sought to kill young David as the youth played music for him but David escaped. Later, in battle with the Philistines, Saul was cornered and chose to fall on his own sword rather than be taken alive.

[cclxi] A "false flag" is a tragdedy or significant event engineered by those in power in secrecy and then blamed upon their enemies of convenience.
Today, in America, false flags (usually "mass shootings") are occurring at least once a month, sometimes once a week.

[cclxii] Christianity flourishes at its lowest levels. In the time of Christ and immediately thereafter, the best gatherings were of friends and family in their homes. The centralization of "Christianity" made it easy to conquer and corrupt.

[cclxv] Imagine the strength of will to be burned alive rather than to confirm just one tenet of Catechism.

[cclxvi] Woodroofe, a vicious Inquisitor, served as Sheriff for only one term and was forced from office by a stroke which paralyzed his body. However, he remained an Alderman until 1560 (Rome preferred to hold the position with a lifeless Papist rather than a live Protestant).

[cclxvii] The 39 Articles of Religion were commissioned by Thomas Cranmer to define England's break with Rome and her customs. They were added to the Anglican Book of Common Prayer.

[cclxviii] I'm recalling a scene from Thor: Ragnarok and laughing sardonically.

Ago, and First Translated Into English, in 1549, Ratramnus (monk of Corbie), B. Griffin, 1687

[cclxx] There are a couple here that I'm unable to track down for you; "Dr. Stafford" is one and "Dr. West" I didn't have a prayer for! I always find it greatly annoying whenever an author assumes you already know who they're talking about; even the great John Foxe who has had his work re-written by many an incognito Roman Catholic.

[cclxxi] Could be John Aylmer, of which the Encyclopaedia Britannica states:

John Aylmer, (born 1521, Tivetshall St. Mary, Norfolk, Eng. — died June 3, 1594, London), Anglican bishop of London in the reign of Elizabeth I, known for his vigorous enforcement of the Act of Uniformity (1559) within his Church of England diocese. His harsh treatment of all ... who differed with him on ecclesiastical questions caused him to be attacked in the anti-episcopal Marprelate Tracts (1588–89) and to be characterized as "Morrell," the bad shepherd, in Edmund Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender (1579).

[cclxxii] At this time, Humanism was a discipline that looked to higher authority than flawed humans, either Popes or Kings. To give you an idea, Erasmus and Calvin were true Humanists. It has been completely subverted so that today, "Humanism" is synonymous with "Secular Humanism" which is so far-Left it's not hyperbole to consider it Communist and Luciferian.
For more, read Secret History.

[cclxxiii] Again we see a devout agent of the Papal insurgency sent from a foreign nation to "serve" where he would have little compassion for the natives.

[cclxxiv] Like stormtroopers from a foreign army of invasion; which they were and are!

[cclxxv] All that remains of the Huguenots are distant relations.

[cclxxviii] "Futurism" is Jesuit eschatology now taught in all "Protestant" sects of Christendom (save strict, orthodox Adventism) which cunningly erases the Pope as Antichrist and Rome as the Great Harlot, the Fourth and Final Beast of Daniel and Revelation.

[cclxxx] Here again, we see the covetous and often incestuous intermingling of the "black nobility". To this day these elites band together to maintain their feudal control over a humanity largely oblivious to their very existence.

[cclxxxi] In light of the abuse and perversion that goes on in convents (especially towards children and teenagers), this is an odd, disturbing thing to note.

[cclxxxiii] "from her beloved convent"? Is there any doubt just who is doing the "editing" at "user-edited" Wikipedia? It gets better.

[cclxxxiv] A tremendous amount of information has just been glossed over here! The Medici Pope proceeded to arrange a marriage for his niece to another wealthy, ruling elite, in order to augment his power, and that of his banker family, like any other king of his day.
"Vicar of Christ", indeed.

[cclxxxv] This was true of any Medici as they banked and bought their way into power but, again, "user-edited" Wikipedia is manipulating empathy for the Serpent Queen (another epithet that I didn't come up with, her subjects did!).

[cclxxxvi] Understand that this perversion and deviancy is standard for any Luciferian Elite that has or is ruling over you: whether Popes, Princes, Prime Ministers or Presidents. As I explained in Eaters of Children, it is the gateway to power.

[ccxc] Pierre de Bourdeille. "Seigneur de Brantôme" is his aristocratic title that you are supposed to be awed by. He helped France slaughter Protestants in the "Wars of Religion" but was haunted by the truth of their Biblical doctrines.

[ccxcii] Francis III was only 18 and this was the first case ever of death by tennis.

[ccxciii] Only a Roman Catholic Elite could have such intolerant arrogance!

[ccxciv] As many as one thousand, five hundred Heugenots were slaughtered and hung about the Château d´Amboise in Blois for attempting to overthrow the duc de Guise and his brother the Cardinal of Lorraine. They all received viciously harsh treatment. The assumed leader, Godefroy de Barry, was "drawn and quartered" (ripped apart by horses) and what was left of him was hung on the city gates.

[ccxcv] How perfectly accurate!

[ccxcvi] Let no one deceive you by any means; for that Day will not come unless the Falling Away comes first, and the Man of Sin is revealed, the Son of Perdition, who opposes and exalts himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped, so that he sits as God in the Temple of God, showing himself that he is God. ~ II Thessalonians 2:3-4

[ccxcvii] Given the notorious ruthlessness of any king, not least of which a man who readily gave his very sons to his enemies that he might maintain his power, I find this story less than believable yet all "historians" claim its veracity. Even apparent critics like the less-than-professional Anne Thériault (whom I've been citing above) claim that this display put the King, himself, into tears.

[ccxcviii] The experience of "war" was radically different for Princes, either France's Henri then to England's Harry now, than for the common soldier of any time.

[ccxcix] How telling! Here these “doctors” avoid the very issue of “unicorn” reality in the same way they skirt other vital issues of common sense either because they are knowingly fostering disinformation upon their audience or because they, themselves, are incapable of true critical thinking.
Unbelievably, this inherent brain-washing is the norm amongst “experts” and should shock you into never believing anyone simply because they’re in a lab coat; from medical doctors to car mechanics.

[ccci] Causation of possession, demon summoning, etc. and it’s relationship to sickness.

[cccii] Notice, even in the Middle Ages, the propensity for “doctors” to hide their trade from the masses via the language of Rome! This is true of other high-profile, lucrative and often corrupt “professions” such as “law”.

[ccciii] Was it wrong to do so? An excellent circumstantial case can be made for an interdimensional realm we might define as “spiritual” being inhabitated by positive (“angels”) and negative (“demons”) beings.

[cccv] Make sure you follow that and pick up on the sarcasm: a mental invalid was found in the abandoned village. The soldiers demanded a ransom. The ransom was paid and the handicapped man was murdered anyway.

[cccvi] Remember, these are “Christian”, Catholic Crusaders to their true Christian victims; “ — deny Christ or die!”

[cccviii] Just as a refresher: Catholic clergy and Royal Aristocracy take the names of previous clergy and Aristocracy who have ruled over you as a sign that they can continue to rule over you.

[cccx] “Calvinism” is nothing more than French Christianity. Agents of the Papacy ceasely feed the myth that Jehan Cauvin (“John Calvin”) was a progenitor of “heresy” even to Bible-believing Christians. He is deeply hated for having come from such a devoutly-Catholic country.

[cccxi] — a Dominican assassin who was able to use his order’s privielages to get in close to the King and murder him because it was feared Henri III would give freedoms to the Huguenots.

[cccxii] “The delicate innermost membrane enveloping the brain and spinal cord.”

[cccxiii] You guessed it: read Eaters of Children.

[cccxiv] If ever a threat to Catherine de´Medici could cut her to the quick, that was it and rest assured, the Superior General of the Jesuits knew it.

[cccxvi] " — in this tower." Luther had been kidnapped by his benefactor, Frederick the Wise, Elector of Saxony because his life was at risk to Vatican assassins. For more, read Secret History.

[cccxvii] One such web site misspells Loyola's name as "Lie-ola" in a fashion that not even a teenager would find amusing.

[cccxviii] The "Spiritual Exercises" are the culmination of Loyola's extremes to "destroy self" in favor of a "higher calling". However, bodily deprevations easily disrupt congnitive thinking and allow any "spirit" to do the "calling".

[cccxix] Ignatius of Loyola; Francis Xavier; Peter Faber; Alfonso Salmeron; Diego Laínez; Nicholas Bobadilla; Simão Rodrigues.

[cccxx] This is an important part of Gnosticism and any esoteric secret society. The Freemasons, in particular, make great use of the inversion from black to white and vice-versa.
The ultimate agenda of all such groups is malignant ("evil"); hence the secrecy as no-one needs secrecy to do good.
This can be a dampner upon membership even if the "prize" is an inside track to promotion, fame, fortune, etc. Therefore, initiates are immediately hit with the indoctrination that the society's goals are actually good but they must still swear fealty unto death.
By the time they realize their organization is evil, they have been compromised to commit evil and believe they can never break free.
However, should any member truly wish to have their soul back at all cost, it can be returned to them! A contract agreed to in dishonesty of offer is not a valid contract (especially before Jesus Christ).

[cccxxi] In the Latin, "perende ac cadaver", the phrase quoted from the legendary "Jesuit Fourth Vow", "Blood Oath", "Oath of Extreme Unction or Induction", etc.

[cccxxii] This sheds new light on the origins of "Muslim honor-killing"! For more on how thoroughly the Catholic Church has manipulated and controlled Islam, see Secret History, Chapter 3: "The Scimitar Forged From The Crucifix".
Also, more than one source attests to a Jesuit "theologian" named "L´Amy" who also went by the pen-name "Amicus" proclaiming murder to save the honor of the Society was entirely lawful. [A History of the Jesuits, Volume 1, John Poynder, Baldwin, Cradock, and Joy, Paternoster Row, London (1816), pp. 235-239]

[cccxxiii] The convention of insurgency where agents of the Vatican don't originate from their host nation (insulating them from empathy towards their victims) also works in the reverse!

[cccxxv] The 2016 film Silence, by Italian Roman Catholic Writer and Director Martin Scorsese, is focused on the "persecution" of Jesuits in Japan around the year 1637. But what the film neglects to show is how the Jesuits had been found to have undermined Japanese authority and been guilty of insurgency and espionage. As a result, they were banished from the Land of the Rising Sun which they ignored, went underground and continued on with their efforts of undermining the Emperor and his vassals.
In perfect gas-lighting fashion does Scorsese call his Japanese villain who tortures the poor "Christian" insurgents, "the Inquisitor"!

[cccxxvi] The Habsburg thaler of 1486 was 31.93 grams of silver. Based upon that, the modern equivalent in U.S. dollars would be $755,200.
The next question is, how did the Bishop of Clermont have three quarters of a million dollars in "ready money" to seed the Jesuit insurgency of France?

[cccxxvii] This aptly-named Jesuit was already evidencing what the Society puts all its effort into; infiltration. A great many key figures in all walks of life are ordained Priests unbeknownst to all around them; often taking wives and starting families, utterly immersing themselves in their "cover".

[cccxxviii] —because, certainly if there was a family that held themselves in check, it was the Medici, especially when elevated to Pope or Queen.

[cccxxix] Elisabeth was a Habsburg but she was also the daughter of Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian II of Spain. All that mattered was that the incestuous and inbred "Divine Right of Kings" was maintained over the rabble peasantry, which, today is you!

[cccxxxii] I furthermore promise and declare that I will, when opportunity presents, make and wage relentless war, secretly or openly, against all heretics, Protestants and Liberals, as I am directed to do, to extirpate and exterminate them from the face of the whole earth; and that I will spare neither age, sex or condition; and that I will hang, waste, boil, flay, strangle and bury alive these infamous heretics, rip up the stomachs and wombs of their women and crush their infants' heads against the walls, in order to annihilate forever their execrable race. That when the same cannot be done openly, I will secretly use the poisoned cup, the strangulating cord, the steel of the poniard or the leaden bullet, regardless of the honor, rank, dignity, or authority of the person or persons, whatever may be their condition in life, either public or private, as I at any time may be directed so to do by any agent of the Pope or Superior of the Brotherhood of the Holy Faith, of the Society of Jesus. ~ From the Jesuit "Fourth Vow of Extreme Unction" or "Blood Oath"

[cccxxxiii] Another bastard Papal offspring gifted with a Cardinalcy. In typical fashion of "Royal intrigue" he was charged with a mission only he could be trusted with: co-ordinating the massacre of French Protestants. Remember, Popes consider themselves, not just kings, but above kings.

[cccxxxv] There was a gold "scudo" and a silver "scudo" and they are tricky to get exchange information on but this could be close to $1,000,000 in current U.S. A University of Tulsa "cheat sheet" helps me put it at $982,500.

[cccxxxviii] Actually this is still the standard for Rome through all her treasonous proxies with the United States government at the top of the list!

[cccxxxix] "You belong to your father, the devil, and you want to carry out your father's desires. He was a murderer from the beginning, not holding to the Truth, for there is no truth in him. When he lies, he speaks his native language, for he is a liar and the Father of Lies." ~ John 8:44
I actually like the Nearly-Inspired Version here. Capitalization added.

[cccxl] "We ruling Elite do need to stick together. There's so darn few of us as it is!"

[cccxlii] Neither for the first nor the last time did Papal agents in "law enforcement" pretend to do their jobs whilst actually giving cover to Catholic criminals.

[cccxliii] Note the use of Swiss Guard mercenaries here in France. This is the same elite "Swiss Guard" that protects the Pope (unless the Superior General says otherwise) and are almost certainly reconstituted Templars as they escaped to Switzerland after their suppression.

[cccxlvi] Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter! ~ Isaiah 5:20 King James Version (KJV)

[cccxlvii] Notice again the reverential "Catherine" used to describe the Serpent Queen.

[cccxlviii] "Historian" Robert Jean Knecht (1926 —) is the Vatican's kind of "Protestant". His Master's thesis at "public" King's College, London was on devout Papist Archbishop of Caterbury, Cardinal John Morton (1420 – 1500). He's an arch Francophile; a British citizen with two French parents. To him, Huguenot attempts not to be slaughtered should be called "rebellion".

[cccxlix] The convention of calling an Elite by their title or lands and not their name is telling. It also keeps things confusing as this title appears to be held by Valois / Medici offspring Henry III but would later fall to Hercule François.

[ccclii] This was Henri's name in Poland.

[ccccliii] The Ruling Elite of Rome are no different today! Rudolph "Rudy" Giuliani was the Federal prosecutor who saw to it that the pedophiles who raped the children of soldiers at West Point during the 1980's went unpursued. This proved he was a reliably corrupt gate-keeper and he was gifted with Mayor of New York City for the false flag outrage of 9/11. During his reign of Mayor, alone, the Christian Brothers-trained Catholic dressed in women's clothing publicly no fewer than four times and one of those times in 2000 was with then-property magnate Donald Trump who thrust his face into Giuliani's fake breasts on camera for the Mayor's "press roast". At this writing, Giuliani has been retained by Trump as one of his personal lawyers.

[ccccliv] All Catholic cathedrals and basilicas house the dead bodies of those highly revered by the Vatican. It is a practice that is in no-way "Christian" any more than gathereing every Sunday morning for “liturgy” is. It is resoundingly pagan and Luciferian. For more, read Secret History.

[ccclvi] Cracknel: a biscuit shaped like a bagel but thin with a larger hole in the middle.
Pray? Prayer is used in worship but “magic” is used in summoning.

[ccclviii] Rest absolutely assured that Jesuit-controlled Rome has kept meticulous records on torture and its effects as well as general demographics on any human being of note; friend or foe. The real driving force behind the modern “Big Brother” “Surveillance State” is Rome.

[ccclix] “Transcribed in Latin” — doubtless for the same reason the Bible was: to keep it out of the hands of the uninitiated.

[ccclxi] —because when the police and the most powerful “law enforcement” office in the world (FBI) are stimeyed on how to stop child trafficking, you need a comedian to explain it to Congress.

[ccclxii] This association is no coincidence. Mozart sought out Süßmayr because he was a devout Catholic, raised in a Benedictine monastery.

[ccclxvi] Alcohol, like any other commodity greatly desired by the masses, seems just as controlled by Rome and her minions; Freemasons, select “Papal Court” Jews, sexual deviants or all of the above.

[ccclxvii] Tomás de Torquemada was a Dominican but he had other ideas of what to do with Christians.

[ccclxviii] Remember this the next time the frauds in “journalism” froth you up about Muslim “child brides”; the inbred Ruling Elite, especially Italian Roman Catholic Elite, own this perversion.

[ccclxix] “Shady” is Dash’s descriptor and unnecessary to an honest narrative. It is part of the Jesuit “Blood Oath” or “Fourth Vow” to ingratiate one’s self into the confidence of the powerful and this was obviously an agenda of any “Father Confessor” Priest.

[ccclxx] “The Priest, in turn, passed it on to a trusted female servant ...” Were there other assassinations seemingly carried out by the Tofana / Spara gang that were initated by a “shady” Priest but conducted by a female go-between?

[ccclxxiii] Feminine of “Marquis/Marquess”: just another title conferred upon “nobility” for the extreme amount of wealth and land they have appropriated. “User-edited” Wikipedia proclaims it is

“of high hereditary rank”.

[ccclxxiv] Somerset states that Gobelin had an annual income of 30,000 livres, d´Aubray brought a dowry of 150,000 livres and an inheritance of 50,000 livres from her grandmother. I attempted to convert that by weight of a pure gold livre which is probably inaccurate but gives a ballpark. The couple was worth over $500,000,000. It is not unusual for Catholic Aristocracy in France or anywhere, then or now, to live so well.

[ccclxxv]Some folks are born made to wave the flag
Ooh they’re red, white and blue
And when the band plays Hail to the Chief
Ooh, they point the cannon at you It ain’t me, it ain’t me
I ain’t no senator’s son, son
It ain’t me, it ain’t me
I ain’t no fortunate one Some folks are born silver spoon in hand
Lord, don’t they help themselves
But when the taxman comes to the door
Lord, the house looks like a rummage sale It ain’t me, it ain’t me
I ain’t no millionaire’s son,
It ain’t me, it ain’t me
I ain’t no fortunate one Fortunate Son, Creedence Clearwater Revival (1969)

[ccclxxvi] What I’ve edited out is Somerset’s criticism of what she calls “wild exaggerations” regarding the capabilities of Italian poisoners. She directly mocks the accusation that victims could be killed by topical poison left in gloves — the very method thought to be used by Catherine de´Medici to murder Jeanne d´Albret, the Protestant Queen of Navarre.
An objective author would not make a value judgment and state, instead, “These accusations seem exaggerated by ignorance and superstition but they are still plausible given the unkowns of advanced Medieval poisoning.”
Another reason I believe Lady Anne Somerset is biased in Rome’s favor.

[ccclxxvii] Remember, this convention of name-cloning, whether Kings or Popes, is meant to instill for you to “Meet the new boss...same as the old boss.”

[ccclxxviii] Putting “Cardinal” after the first name is another convention of the Ruling Elite like “Alfred Lord Tennyson”, a.k.a. “Alfred, owner of Aldworth (and all its inhabitants), Barony of Tennyson in the County of Sussex”.

[ccclxxix] Prior: Priest in charge of a chapel or cathedral, usually of religions significance.

[ccclxxx] As usual, that means clergy insinuating themselves in the lives of rulers, Elites and key people of power and, therefore, dictating even the lives of common citizens as well.
What the Confessor whispered to the King is immediately felt but the subjects.

[ccclxxxi] Translation: the “Golden Age” of France is so-defined because a single tyrant held his power for over 7 decades and immersed himself in record-setting, sickening opulence.

[ccclxxxii] The elaborate process of dressing the copious and effeminate hair of a Royal Elite. In contrast, English Puritans found such manes were useless and even dangerous when conducting daily chores and kept their hair cut short and tidy resulting in the nickname of “Roundheads”.

[ccclxxxiii] Notice how these powerful Cardinals like Richelieu and Mazarin not only co-ruled France but were completely at ease with the extreme sexual deviancy that was part-and-parcel "at Court" as they often partook in it, themselves.

[ccclxxxiv] Each year more letters get added to this protected group but they are pawns in a much larger game ruled by the ultimate deviants in Rome.

[ccclxxxvi] Nomenclature steeped in the religion of Rome!

[ccclxxxvii] The Vatican is the most aggressive, malignant foreign Sovereign in existence and her agents of insurgency are the most insidious. They come in all shapes and sizes. They attain fanatical dedication in the subversion of their host nation as they believe their very souls depend upon their treason being accomplished.

[ccclxxxviii] Passed by Parliament in 1701, it stated that only Protestant Sovereigns could rule in either England or Ireland.

[ccclxxxix] "User-edited" Wikipedia claims there was friction between James II and Benedetto Odescalchi ("Pope Innocent XI") as James pushed for Odescalchi to make Petre a Bishop but the Pope "obstinantly refused".
As we'll soon read, Robert Montagu, however, showed Petre rising to a Cardinalcy.

[cccxc] Charles Stewart Parnell (1846 – 1891): touted as an "Irish nationalist" politician. He was Leader of the Home Rule League from 1880 to 1882, Leader of the Irish Parliamentary Party from 1882 to 1891 and a Member of Parliament ("MP") from 1875 to 1891. "User-edited" Wikipedia notes that "his party held the balance of power in the House of Commons during the Home Rule debates of 1885–1890." How advantageous.

[cccxci] History of the Counter-Revolution in England, for the Re-Establishment of Popery, under Charles II. and James II.

[cccxcii] Somerset does present a thorough recounting of an erased period of history but she wouldn't have been published without her pro-Vatican bias.

[cccxciii] Somerset is unclear as "incest" is sex with a family member, usually immediate family. One can only assume this means that de Brinvilliers was regularly abusing her own children.

[cccxciv] More precisely, it is the willingness of someone to commit any heinous act to aggrandize themselves. The abuse (particularly taking pleasure in making the victim suffer) of the innocent and vulnerable — child, animal, etc. — is usually some of the worst.
If you dare, it's all in Eaters of Children.

[cccxcv] Somerset gives "the investigator's" first initial as "M."

[cccxcvi] Jean-Baptiste Colbert, the Controller-General of Finance.

[cccxcvii] Note the militarization of "law enforcement" in Catholic Medieval France is identical to the same aberration all over the world today. Modern Police are ancient Praetorians whose true job is protecting the criminal Elite and enforcing feudalism.

[cccxcviii] According to Somerset, a “stone mason”. In this company we wonder if this is a trade or code for Freemasonry or both as often the guilds of masons provided access to the secret society of the same name.

[cccxcix] Even those who promulgate the Truth are only allowed to do so if they fulfill a requirement set by the Great Whore of Babylon.

[cd] Kolvenbach was Dutch, showing just how far the Netherlands has come since whole-heartedly embracing Luther’s Protest five centuries ago.
It is standard policy for Priests (especially Jesuits) to be sent where they have no affinity for the existing population. It is easier to commit crimes against them by insurgency.
Kolvenbach went to his judgment the day after Thanksgiving, November 26th, 2016.
Whether he was truly thankful, I can’t say just yet.

[cdi] Did this make Roeder susceptible to suggestion?
Was he on prescription medication?
Was the medication tampered with?

[cdii] It is still customery in modern Catholic-controlled governments. “Waterboarding” is only one example though it’s genesis through centuries of the Inquisition is obvious.

[cdiii] Named after the founder of the Jesuits.

[cdiv] He apparently didn’t know he was supposed to be at war with himself.

[cdv] Infants that the Priest murdered, probably in sacrifice to Satan as this was his specialty.

[cdvi] He, too, was a Priest who slaughtered his unwanted infant children to Satan.
You might have empathy for someone who kept a “mistress” because he couldn’t maintain a vow whose purpose is to overwhelm the participant with lust but it takes a monster to murder his own infants.

[cdvii] Speaking of “language used as a weapon” (see the Preface), this word is designed to dehumanize the unborn child, which is why I have it in quotations.

[cdxi] Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, the Marquise de Sévigné, French Aristocrat and chronicler.

[cdxiv] Does watching someone be burned alive make you “sprightly”?
The only thing worse than an Aristocrat is an Aristocrat sycophant.
I’ll remind you again that the woman’s name is “Marie de Rabutin-Chantal”, her title is “Marquise (Madame) de Sévigné". Calling an effete Elite by their title instead of their name manipulates the audience into automatic deference and respect though it is almost never warranted.

National Geographic was owned by 21st Century Fox and managed by Fox CEO James Murdoch, son of Knight of Malta Rupert Murdoch (500 years later Romans are still installing their progeny to rule over us) until it was purchased by the Disney Corporation, also managed and run by Irish Catholics like Christine McCarthy and Papal Court Jews like Bob Iger.

[271] The amount of propaganda and disinformation surrounding this fact of history is staggering. It is impossible to find any current sources on the internet as Jesuit-run search engines like "Google" populate page after page with Leftists claiming the slogan had no place in the American Revolution. Knox and Calvin made this a central tenet of the Reformed, Presbyterian movement and I found just such a reference in the treatise History of the United Presbyterian Church by Reverend Professor John Eadie compiled in The Religious Denominations in the United States by Israel Daniel Rupp, published by Charles DeSilver, Philadelphia (1859). The digital format rendered it as page 808 of the entire compendium but it was page 130 of the section titled History of Religious Denominations of England and Scotland; Containing Authentic Accounts of the Different Creeds and Systems of the Various Evangelical Denominations.
For this reason, alone, it is absolutely intuitive that Revolutionaries — especially Presbyterians — would indeed resurrect this slogan and reuse it against George III.
I still acknowledge Saussy's assertion that the Revolution was a Papist plot but it was clearly accomplished unwittingly by American Protestants believing that they were rebelling as their Scot, Irish and English forebears had done in the 16th century.

That's not me using hyperbole, that's this documentary. On the other hand, they played up how Catholics were supposedly horrified by Mary's Inquisition (haven't seen any evidence of that anywhere) and accented Thomas Cranmer's recantation but not his reversal nor the courageous way he burned off his own hand for writing the denial of his faith.

This quote is hard to nail down. On the rare occasion that it is cited, it is claimed to come from Tischreden (The Table Talk of Martin Luther) but neither my copy nor several I have searched online have this.
I have to say, however, that Luther's characteristic acerbic wit seems at play where he purposefully calls "astronomer" Copernicus (who else would he be talking about) an astrologer.
This may have been fabricated as further proof of how "backwards" Bible-believing Christians are but, in fact, it is excellent proof of the reverse so I'll take it!

Editors' Dedication

This book is dedicated to our parents and respective in-laws, Daniel Perskin (1920–2005) and Muriel Harris Perskin (1923 and still alive and kicking); and to James R. Noblitt (1923-1994) and Joanne Marion Noblitt (1924–2004). They were the greatest generation and did their best to love, encourage, and support us on our own journeys.

This book is dedicated to our children, children-in-law, and grandchildren, both known and unknown. You are our future and testament to the fact that we can do better as parents and as guardians of our children's health, safety, and happiness. Thank you Danielle and Jay, Lilly, Jake and Number 3; and James and Danielle, Leo and Riley for the love and joy you've given us.

This book is dedicated to advocates for survivors everywhere. Among those who are not contributors to this volume but who are nonetheless valued members of the advocacy community are Claire Reeves, Connie Valentine, Helen McGonigle, Ann Earle, Jackie McGauley, Dale Griffis, Jerry Simandl, and Eileen King. There are many more, and we appreciate you all.

This book is dedicated to pioneers in the field—people who staked their professional and personal reputations, and sometimes lost, trying to shed light on this perplexingly controversial phenomenon: Bennett Braun, David Calof, Valerie Wolf, Judith Peterson, Gary Lefkof, Roland Summit, Catherine Gould, Mike Moore, and many others who paved the way.

Finally, this book is dedicated to the survivors. They have endured much, shared much, overcome much. We all owe you a debt of gratitude for your perseverance, commitment, and strength of character.

Having written the definitive book on cult and ritual abuse, Cult and Ritual Abuse: Its History, Anthropology, and Recent Discovery in Contemporary America, Randy and Pam Noblitt follow with a Reader which, in my view, will help settle the most destructive response to this brutal and aberrant behavior: namely, the denial of its reality.

The pages of this Reader are for the unconvinced as well as those knowledgeable of the veracity of these behaviors. Some of the writers are survivors and in their stories, as a child or adult, the reader can find the evidence that affirms the existence and practice of ritual behavior imitative of social representations of evil, most probably, in all cultures throughout the world.

Eight years ago, many countries signed a UN declaration in a special session on behalf of children, victims and survivors of every kind of inhumane abuse imaginable. There was The African Common Position, The Beijing Declaration, The Berlin Commitment, The Katmandu Understanding, The Kingston Consensus, The Panama and Rabat Declarations. Each of these proclamations promote, recognize, build upon, develop, give priority for, encourage and support a global movement that heralded a child-friendly society. Yet children today still remain defenseless. So why is it that we do such a poor job of believing what is true about this world?

A further value in this collection is that the editors, wisely, provide no single answer to the many questions raised by the contributors to the book. Among them: How do reactions to ritual abuse differ from those seen in persons diagnosed as schizophrenic? Is the so-called False Memory Syndrome a real or fabricated disease? How does a child heal from such overpowering fear? Is “terrorism” part of the crime? Is this a Western anomaly or a global tragedy? How do perpetrators initiate a state of dissociation and how widely spread is this phenomenon?

What we find here are the best bets among the possibilities for healing the wounded and innovative methodologies framed for further research. This volume offers those interested in mental health a sound reassurance that ritual and cult abuse is indeed real, and sadly, all too prevalent.

Introduction

Randy Noblitt

Editing this book, which represents the collective effort of an international, multidisciplinary team of authors, has been a labor of love. Their dedication, knowledge and ethical commitment guide us toward a clearer understanding of ritual abuse as it occurs in modern times.

The task of both telling and reading these stories is challenging. Here we must deal with accounts of terror, loss, betrayal and sadness. The process of understanding these stories is complicated. Sometimes there are external sources of corroboration for particular claims of ritual abuse, but often there are not. We know that child abuse is typically perpetrated in secrecy, and that in most cases of proven child abuse there is no physical evidence. However, we cannot ignore the compelling case for the reality of ritual crime (Rascke, 1990), the growing body of criminal cases with convictions for ritual crimes, and the other empirical evidence (Noblitt & Perskin, 2000).

That being said, why should we consider ritual abuse as something unique or otherwise different than other kinds of abuse? Ritual abuse appears to cause significant disturbances in memory and identity. Survivors of ritual abuse may be debilitated by these traumas and they frequently require specialized psychological services that are not available or affordable in their communities. The legal prosecution of these cases is often complex and challenging although, as mentioned previously, convictions do occur.

The first chapter is a paper that I presented at the 106th Annual Meeting of the American Anthropological Association in 2007. “Rituals: The Good, the Bad and the Ugly” challenges anthropologists and others to address the many cross-cultural reports about abusive rituals and ordeals that seriously damage people and sometimes result in the loss of life. Pamela Perskin Noblitt’s “Redefining the Language of Ritual Abuse and the Politics that Dictate It” is the 2nd Chapter. It helps us navigate the confusing language of this field, encouraging us to work toward greater clarity and uniformity of the terminology that we use. Pam and I also edited the entire volume and I am grateful to her for her tireless work, supportive attitude and persistent commitment to this project.

Chapter 3 presents “Exploring Commonalities Reported by Adult Survivors of Extreme Abuse: Preliminary Empirical Findings” by Carol Rutz, Thorsten Becker, Bettina Overkamp and Wanda Karriker. It provides an intelligent and informed discussion of the literature regarding international reports of ritual abuse. The authors also provide us with new data from their large-scale Internet survey that helps us understand the magnitude of the problem and the specific reported characteristics of this extreme form of abuse. Wanda Karriker is also the author of Morning Come Quickly (2003), a fictional account of the experiences of a ritual abuse survivor.

Ellen Lacter and Karl Lehman identify a particularly confusing question of diagnosis, offering us “Guidelines to Differential Diagnosis between Schizophrenia and Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress” in Chapter 4. In the 5th Chapter, Michael Salter presents “Out of the Shadows: Re-envisioning the Debate on Ritual Abuse” where he shows how the evolution of thinking about ritual abuse allegations has been confounded by social processes including ethnocentrism, denial and general misunderstanding. He demonstrates how these narratives have naturally occurred within patterns of pervasive international sexual exploitation.

What about the backlash against the abuse survivor movement? How does that figure into popular and scholarly interpretation of ritual abuse allegations? In the 6th Chapter, Carl Raschke eloquently accounts for “The Making of an Academic Urban Legend” where he explains how misinformation about ritual abuse (e.g., under the aegis of false memory syndrome) has been widely disseminated and often uncritically accepted. Carl Raschke is the author of numerous publications including Painted Black, the definitive book on Satanic and ritualistic crime. Martin Katchen contributes his views in “Interrelated Moral Panics and Counter-panics: The Cult Brainwashing Panic and the False Memory/ Ritual Abuse Moral Panic” in Chapter 7. Martin Katchen previously authored a Chapter, “History of Satanic Religions,” that appeared in the book Out of Darkness (1991).

In Chapter 8 German author Thorsten Becker discusses ritual abuse as it relates to crime and terrorism and challenges the uncritical tolerance of religious or other groups whose activities may include crimes against humanity. He coins a new term, ideologically motivated crimes, and explains how it accounts for acts of ritual violence as well as terrorism. Therapists and EMDR specialists Frances R. Yoeli and Tessa Prattos expand on the discussion of terrorism and ritual abuse in “Terrorism is the Ritual Abuse of the Twenty-first Century” in Chapter 9. They also add their unique international perspectives as psychotherapists from Israel and Greece, respectively.

Sandra Buck informs us about “The RAINS Network in the UK” in Chapter 10. The RAINS Network provides support to ritual abuse survivors. She explains the history of this network, what it has accomplished, and some of the obstacles that survivors continue to experience, e.g., a criminal justice system that sometimes fails to appropriately investigate and prosecute these crimes. Another English author, Carole Mallard, writes about her experiences with ritual crime, particularly in London, as a law enforcement officer in "Ritual Abuse—A Personal Account." She describes some of the obstructions that commonly occur in attempting to work effectively with these survivors in Chapter 11. In Chapter 12 we find "The Orkney 'Satanic Abuse Case:' Who Cared About the Children?" Sarah Nelson tells us poignantly about the complexities and obstructions that occurred in this perplexing criminal case in Scotland. Ulla Fröhling reveals the story of a woman with dissociation of identity as a consequence of ritual abuse in "Our Father Who Art in Hell: A Factual Account" in Chapter 13. She updates us with the moving narrative from her book, Vater unser in der Hölle [Our Father Who Art in Hell]. In Chapter 14 we find "Where Are We Now? Ritual Abuse, Dissociation, Police and the Media," by Valerie Sinason, Graeme Galton and David Leevers. These authors provide details of ritual abuse as they conceptualize it and have found it in the United Kingdom. Valerie Sinason is the editor and principle author of Treating Survivors of Satanist Abuse (1994). In "A Therapeutic Relationship: Shifting Boundaries in the Service of Healing" Lorna Joan Brown discusses her findings working with a ritual abuse survivor in Chapter 15. This qualitative study served to meet the requirements of her doctoral dissertation. She is now a psychologist in South Africa.

Tom Ball reflects on his Christian perspective on ritual abuse in Chapter 16. In "Prayer for Inner Healing of Memories and Deliverance with Ritual Abuse Survivors" he makes specific recommendations and provides examples of his spiritual approach. Alison Miller describes considerations for therapists who work with individuals who were abused by organized groups where control was established through a combination of abuse and training. Her valued contribution to this book is found in Chapter 17, "Recognizing and Treating Survivors of Abuse by Organized Criminal Groups."

The last three chapters are autobiographical narratives by survivors. "Ritual Abuse Survivors: Diverse, Yet Similar" by Jean M. Riseman, editor of Survivorship, is Chapter 18. Trish Fotheringham wrote "Patterns in Mind Control: A First Person Account" for Chapter 19. And Jeanne Adams presents Chapter 20, "Case Studies of Ritual Abuse Survivors: From Abuse to Activism." Jeanne Adams is the author of Drawn Swords: My Victory over Childhood Ritual Abuse (1999) and Childhood Ritual Abuse: A Resource Manual for Criminal Justice and Social Service (2000). We are honored to have the Foreword written by Dana Raphael, a medical anthropologist and student and colleague of the late Margaret Mead. Dana Raphael proposed the term doula in her book Breastfeeding: The Tender Gift to mean “one or more individuals, often female, who give psychological encouragement and physical assistance to the newly delivered mother” (1976, p. 172). Her seminal research on breastfeeding and reproduction led her to conclude that a history of child abuse was a significant risk factor working against the complex process of reproduction.

It has been an honor and a privilege to work with this talented and dedicated team of authors. As we edited this work, Pam and I decided to make minimal changes regarding the uniformity of format style, so that we did not inadvertently modify any author’s intended style of communicating his or her material. We want to fully respect the diversity of perspectives that these authors provide. We hope that this book helps to raise awareness about the problem and that there will be future efforts to recognize the seriousness and magnitude of these crimes and their consequences. We also ask that there be a continued dialogue among survivors, researchers, therapists and law enforcement professionals regarding the important questions that have been raised.

Rituals: The Good, the Bad and the Ugly

Randy Noblitt

The term ritual appears in popular language and media and in diverse academic contexts. Anthropology has contributed much to what is known about rituals. My own discipline, psychology, has also made use of this construct. In a recent search of the PsycINFO data base using the word ritual, I found 4,972 entries. Attempting to master this vast literature from a merely psychological perspective would be a daunting task. Attempting to integrate the literatures of anthropology and the other social sciences, as well as religious studies and philosophy could keep a team of dedicated doctoral students quite busy. With sincere humility and some sound judgment, I will not attempt that task. Instead, I will focus on my own professional work as a clinical psychologist. My own clinical practice has primarily been with adult survivors of child abuse. For these individuals, ritual acts are often a component or defining characteristic of their abuse.

Are there common themes in how rituals are construed?

The prevailing literature in the social sciences portrays rituals as positive events within various cultures that define milestones in the lives of the individual and community. There are rituals for almost every aspect of life from mating, to marriage, to birthing, to burial. Each has a tradition of healing and communal bonding. Each has a language, an organization, and a liturgy that forms societal and individual values and aspirations. Rituals give meaning and help to establish normative behaviors and reinforce specified hierarchical relationships. Rituals may defuse social tensions and act as a catalyst for the resolution of conflicts.

We all know that rituals sometimes include momentarily painful activities, such as those associated with some rites of initiation and other ordeals. Even these practices may be construed as temporarily harmful, but in the long term, they are intended to provide meaning and strengthen defined social relationships and roles.

Some rituals may harm the individual for the presumed benefit of the community. Criminal trials are highly ritualized events wherein the prosecution and defense present their cases and the judge and jury deliver a judgment. Rituals that result in exile, excommunication, or shunning are present in many cultures and communities. Sacrifice is a common ritual that sometimes elicits hardship or worse for the victim, yet is sometimes perceived as a social imperative.

But a more malignant side of ritual exists, one that has been visited on the social conscious in recent decades. The ritualistic elements of the Nazi party served to enforce their vision of a pure race and justified the extermination of those whose existence flew in the face of master race: the mentally impaired, homosexuals, gypsies, and Jews. The Holocaust literally means “sacrifice by fire.” The ritualized extinction of these groups created a bond between the party’s philosophy and its followers. Another example can be seen in the Ugandan child soldiers who are indoctrinated in coercive rituals to kill with impunity. Female genital circumcision is ritualistically performed to the detriment of women’s health in response to some religious and cultural traditions. The suicide bombers engage in their ritual homicides in the sure knowledge that their sacrifice will be rewarded in the next life. Such ritualistic enactments leave lasting wounds on its survivors that forever alter the course of their lives.

Yet another category of ritual should be considered. Generations of men and women report victimization by ritual abuse perpetrated on them from early childhood. Inevitably, these informants also have severe dissociative experiences that interfere with their ability to engage in gainful employment and perform activities of daily living. Victims report that the rituals are designed to produce introjects or alter personality states who engage in various behaviors against the conscious will of the victim. Their narrations include examples of torture, deprivation, and deception, allegedly used to condition victims for use in pornography, prostitution, and other deviant or illegal activities.

In a recent online survey[1], survivors of extreme abuse were invited to respond to a number of items designed to delineate the range of abuses, characteristics of the abuse, psychological and physical sequelae, and impact on education, employment, revictimization, and interpersonal relationships. Almost 1,500 individuals from 30 different countries responded to the invitation to participate. These respondents identified their abuse experiences as including (1) incest; (2) child pornography and prostitution; (3) sexual abuse by multiple perpetrators: (4) being caged; (5) starvation; (6) bestiality; (7) buried alive; (8) electroshock; (9) sensory deprivation; (10) sleep deprivation; (11) forced cannibalism, (12) secret government-sponsored mind control experiments. Of those respondents who reported suffering extreme abuse in childhood, 55% reported abuse in a Satanic cult. Of the 257 respondents who reported secret mind control experimentation, 69% also reported having been ritually abused in a Satanic cult.

In the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, South America, Canada, Australia, and in other countries, ritually based crimes or crimes with elements of ritual abuse have been reported and prosecuted. Despite a backlash that denies empirical evidence of ritual abuse, author Michael Newton (1997)[2] accumulated data on convictions where ritual child abuse was a component feature. Of the 145 defendants who were sentenced, only 17 (11.7%) were reversed on appeal. Newton reported that these reversals did not necessarily indicate that the defendants were innocent of the accusations. In some instances the decisions were reversed based on legal technicalities and offered no opinion as to whether the crime occurred. In one of the more notorious trials involving allegations of ritual abuse, the case of the McMartin Preschool in Manhattan Beach, California, the majority of the jurors polled at the end of the second trial ending in a hung jury reported that they believed defendant Ray Buckey was guilty, but that the State had not proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

In Cult and Ritual Abuse: Its History, Anthropology and Recent Discovery in Contemporary America (Rev. ed., 2000), Pam Perskin and I defined ritual abuse as maltreatment "that occurs in a ceremonial or circumscribed manner for the purpose of creating or manipulating already created alter mental states" (Noblitt & Perskin, 2000, p. 47–48). Of the more than 300 patients I treated who reported such abuses, I learned that in many instances, destructive rituals representing a variety of different cultures, belief systems, and traditions were employed independently and concomitantly such that it was sometimes impossible to identify the specific orientation of the perpetrating individual or group. I therefore encourage individuals who report ritual abuse to avoid making specific identification of the orientation of the perpetrator(s) and instead, identify the themes associated with the rituals. The common links between these reports of victimization are (1) the ritualistic nature of the abuse and (2) the traumatizing psychological effect of the abuse.

Although rituals are often portrayed in a positive light, there is a malignant side that should be recognized. We cannot address social problems when we do not acknowledge them. Thus while some rituals may benefit the participants, others may be a vehicle for victimization and exploitation. We need to better understand how rituals can be both helpful and harmful and how they impact the individual and society. Such considerations will help us to develop a broader conceptualization of what is meant by ritual.

Redefining the Language of Ritual Abuse and the Politics that Dictate It

Pamela Perskin Noblitt and Randy Noblitt

Several years ago, we wrote that the language of ritual abuse should be universalized, as is the language of history, mathematics, or any subject that has meaning and application throughout the world. Our call for action was in response to the continuing media bias that is directed toward allegations of ritual abuse, and the disrespect shown by the professional community for those who advocate for survivors. The media's reaction to reports of ritual abuse tend to either veer in the direction of incredulity about the reality of ritual abuse and likening such reports to alien abduction; or to exploit the event, looking for sensationalistic aspects to encourage the public's horror. Both approaches lead to discrediting the victims and their advocates. What we had hoped for was a serious discussion about the reports of ritual abuse, its psychological sequelae, and the development of a language consistent with the values of science and academia such that it would reflect the victim's experience without sensationalism. What we got was a competition for the control of the language.

One central problem in the development of a viable language to describe the experience and symptoms of survivors of ritual trauma is the ambiguity often inherent in the language of psychology. For every possible symptom, diagnosis, and treatment modality, there are countless theoretical alternative interpretations. With so little agreement between mental health professionals in general, the lack of a cohesive language to address this specific subgroup is not surprising. And it is possible that the imprecise nature of the language of psychotherapy in general is at the heart of the public's mistrust of psychology that has fostered the creation of backlash organizations such as the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. We have all heard the complaints regarding the use of psycho-babble and the lofty language applied by the psychotherapy community to the most mundane of human experiences. What is needed is the development of clear, precise, and objective definitions to meaningful terminology in order to clarify communications between professionals, patients, and the public. However, with various individuals and schools of thought jockeying for positions of supremacy within the profession, such a unifying solution is unlikely. Yet, the area of diagnosis and treatment of ritual trauma is relatively new and sufficiently small to allow for the establishment of a common language while it is still in its infancy.

The process of investigating, diagnosing, and treating ritual abuse is difficult and problematic. Psychiatric patients reporting or demonstrating symptoms consistent with the experience of ritual abuse frequently allege that family members abused them in childhood. They are sometimes too psychiatrically disabled to work. They are sometimes caught up in destructive relationships. They may be poverty stricken and without sufficient financial resources to provide for adequate psychological care. They can be self-mutilatory, suicidal and sometimes, homicidal. Their challenging symptoms and subsequent life difficulties may be overwhelming to their supporters and health care providers to the extent that the patient is under the constant threat, real or imagined, of abandonment. Given the complexity of their psychiatric symptoms, their emotional fragility, their typical financial hardship, and their societal impact, these individuals represent one of the neediest groups of psychiatric patients. Yet it is for these very reasons that they are frequently denied the most basic services. The lack of a vocabulary sufficient to address the allegations made by this population contributes to the controversy within the mental health professions surrounding allegations of ritual abuse made in the context of psychotherapy.

Mental health professionals who regularly work with individuals who report ritually abusive experiences in childhood and beyond have long advocated for a separate diagnostic category that accurately reflects the special etiological and symptomatic elements. Considering that (1) a large number of mental health professionals perceive ritual abuse to be a genuine problem experienced by some patients, (2) these patients exhibit many common characteristics, and (3) there is often some external corroboration for the patient’s allegations, it is clear that objective empirical criteria warrant a diagnostic category relevant to this phenomenon.

There are, however, other reasons that warrant a separate diagnostic category for ritual abuse. It should be noted that although the phenomenon of ritual abuse shares features and characteristics with other established diagnoses, no single category within the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of the American Psychiatric Association (DSM) or International Classification of Diseases of the World Health Organization (ICD), nor any combination of DSM or ICD labels, completely accounts for it. In order to provide reliable clinical diagnoses and advance clear research outcomes, objective diagnostic criteria are needed. Some skeptics maintain that the current allegations of ritual abuse are mere fabrications of therapists' and patients' fantasies; or they are simply delusional material; or are part of manipulative or attention-seeking interactions. If this is the case, then clear diagnostic criteria will aid in determining the extent to which ritual abuse claims are in fact genuine phenomena versus features of factitious, delusional, or other disorders. Such distinctions are not only important for appropriate clinical diagnosis and treatment, but also lend further clarity to the growing number of legal cases in which mental health professionals are asked to provide forensic evaluations. The lack of distinct, empirically validated criteria for distinguishing genuine ritual abuse from other diagnoses could result in courts failing to remove children from abusive environments or in innocent defendants going to prison in misdirected criminal cases.

In order to formulate accurate diagnostic criteria, it is essential that a vocabulary be established that is responsive to the data, sensitive to the survivor community, and an accurate depiction of the current clinical understanding. Likewise, the language of ritual abuse must pass a litmus test that guarantees its universal understanding and application by the helping professions, the courts, and law enforcement. Failure to develop a consistent and congruent language to communicate aspects of ritual abuse and its consequences creates a host of problems—clinically, forensically, and academically.

Unhappily, backlash interests have taken early control of the language employed in the courts and media as it relates to ritual abuse. Organizations such as Victims of Child Abuse Laws (VOCAL) and the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (FMSF) have effectively wrested control of the language and subsequently extended their influence over the direction in which criminal and civil investigations are conducted and resolved. A vocabulary established to cast doubt on the credibility of victim allegations and helping professionals' ethical aspirations and professional standards has become firmly entrenched in the media and the courtroom, although it should be acknowledged that no scientific or legal standards have thus far been applied to these concepts. Terminology that includes phrases such as false memory syndrome, parental alienation syndrome, and recovered memory therapy, are readily employed in any discussion of ritual abuse or ritual crime. However, little vocabulary that relates to the phenomenon of ritual abuse has been introduced by the alleged victims of these traumatic experiences.

People who identify themselves as survivors of ritual abuse are often at a loss to describe their experiences because there is no specialized vocabulary that corresponds to their unique perspectives. Their abuse occurred as an element of their childhood and was, insofar as they are concerned, a normal experience. However, with the apparent correlation between ritually abusive childhoods and the development of serious and chronic psychological conditions, it is increasingly clear that ritual abuse is not an aspect of normal development and is not a presence in the lives of most children. Development of a language specific to ritual abuse is further complicated by reports that much of the abuse occurs during early developmental stages of childhood, often in advance of language development. Without adequate language, it is impossible for survivors to clearly identify their experiences.

The term ritual abuse was introduced by Michelle Smith in her memoir of a ritually abusive childhood in her book, Michelle Remembers (with Lawrence Pazdar, 1980). She specifically called her experience Satanic ritual abuse. Over time, it has become evident that ritually abusive scenarios other than Satanic ones are frequently employed by perpetrators of such acts.

A few other words have crept into the vocabulary of ritual abuse as it relates to what appears to be the underlying motivation for these acts. Survivors speak of being programmed to respond to triggers that cause them to dissociate to alter mental states, alters. They appear to be referring to a kind of psychological conditioning in which stimuli are paired with certain acts to produce predictable consequences, e.g., dissociation of identity. These individuals refer to mind control as the ultimate goal of ritual abuse.

Mental health professionals must rely on the existing language of psychology to evaluate, diagnose, and treat this population of survivors. However, the existing terminology has been inadequate to the needs of the clients or to others including managed care, insurers, attorneys, and law enforcement agencies. The resultant inadequacy of the language has been partly responsible for the underestimation of the presence of ritual abuse as a mitigating factor in the development of some mental disorders as well as unfavorable outcomes in criminal, civil, and administrative law venues. Clearly, it is in the best interests of all concerned to develop a language in response to the reports of ritual abuse that reflects the enormity of the problem and meets the standard of science. Furthermore, this language must be universally applicable and applied in order to convey the agreement of professionals who work in this area as well as the clients they serve. This is a daunting task.

The first step toward the establishment of universally acceptable definitions is to provide for an objective and scientific environment in which to frame our language. Free of the influences of cultural and religious values and dependent primarily on empirical evidence, this setting would provide the laboratory in which we could develop and incorporate ideas about how to best express the experiences victims describe. Unfortunately, no such environment exists. There is no way we can completely disconnect ourselves from our history, nature, culture, and beliefs.

However, we can emulate the scientific model and apply scientific principles to minimize the biased interpretation of the reports and the psychological and behavioral ramifications we observe.

There is some disagreement within the mental health community regarding the legitimacy of the term ritual abuse. Some believe that the term is too emotionally charged, religious, and unscientific. Using the term ritual connotes religious context for many. Some have proposed alternate phrases such as organized abuse, sadistic abuse, extreme abuse, or structured abuse. Sarson and McDonald coined the term, ritual abuse torture (RAT). The term preferred by many in the mental health and survivor communities is ritual abuse for two reasons. Firstly, that is the term introduced and used by many of its victims. Secondly, it is more accurate and less ambiguous than the alternatives. In the book, Cult and Ritual Abuse: Its History, Anthropology and Recent Discovery in Contemporary America (Noblitt & Perskin, Rev. ed., 2000), ritual abuse is defined as abuse or maltreatment that occurs in a ceremonial or circumscribed manner and where the abuse causes traumagenic dissociation and/or establishes or reinforces control over dissociated states already in existence. This definition appears to satisfy in concrete terms what its alleged victims and perpetrators report. The term, ritual trauma, does not assume or make the judgment that the experience was abusive. There is an assumption that the experience was traumatic, but voluntary and not abusive and would include ritual events such as initiation ceremonies. Ritualistic abuse may be defined as being like ritual abuse, but not all the above criteria can be proven or demonstrated; for example, there may be evidence of a ritualistic killing where only the body is found. The possibility that dissociated states may have been created or controlled during the criminal act is unknown.

Some ritual abuse may occur within a cult or cult-like setting. There are a variety of cults, most of which are likely not abusive. The following is a useful classification of destructive cults (Noblitt & Perskin, 2000):

1. Destructive religious cults are associated with a particular religious practice, belief or system of rituals and may be further subdivided as follows:
   - a. Destructive apocalyptic cults promote fear and paranoia along with unfounded predictions that the world is about to end. Destructive apocalyptic cults may be distinguished from apocalyptic religions in that the former utilizes abuse, exploitation and mind control methods. Examples would include the Branch Davidians, Order of the Solar Temple and Aum Supreme Truth.
   - b. Destructive pre-industrial cults meet the criteria for destructive cults and also embody the traditions of pre-industrial cultures (e.g., African and New World vodoun and Santeria sects). Although some such religions may be considered destructive cults, one should not automatically assume that all are. Again the criteria of abuse, exploitation, and mind control are essential to defining a cult as destructive.

c. Destructive demonic cults meet the criteria for destructive cults and also promote the worship or reverence toward a malevolent deity, spirit or principle (e.g., Satanism, Luciferianism) or those cults which use others' fears of demons to manipulate or control them.

2. Fraternal organizations which meet the criteria for destructive cults. These groups are often secret and may also espouse particular philosophic, religious, or sociopolitical ideals (e.g., the Bizango of Haiti, the Egbo, or Leopard Society of West Africa, and various subgroups within Masonry and other quasi-Masonic groups may meet these criteria).

3. Destructive sociopolitical cults would include the Ku Klux Klan, Aryan Brotherhood, and Neo-Nazi groups. We would include the Christian Identity movement here even though technically it is a religion. However, it is not clear that the religious aspects of the Christian Identity movement are as cultish as are their racist values and politics.

4. Organized crime groups which function as destructive cults exist for the primary purpose of supporting criminal activities where there is a need for utilizing mind control procedures because of the nature of the crime (e.g., child prostitution and pornography may require such mind control procedures if the perpetrators are to produce children who appear to be enthusiastic about the sexual activity which would normally be aversive to them). Even though coercion is presumably commonly used in criminal groups we do not think it would be appropriate to categorize all crime organizations as cults. However, when there is evidence of trauma-induced dissociation and programming, we would classify such a group as a destructive cult.

5. Government and intelligence-related destructive cults refer to the alleged organized use of cult mind control procedures surreptitiously conducted by individuals within government agencies (e.g., CIA) to further their purposes of intelligence gathering and the facilitation of other secret operations. Unfortunately, the United States government has allowed itself to become enmeshed in a complex organization of secret information and procedures which would allow unethical or illegal activities to occur without the knowledge of the general public (e.g., the Iran–Contra affair, the Watergate break-in, the use of United States citizens as guinea pigs for radiation research, etc.). Furthermore, because of the existence of what is called Sensitive Compartmented Information within the various national security and intelligence agencies, it is possible to have secret information and operations to which other individuals with Top Secret security clearances have neither access nor the capacity to scrutinize. Essentially the intelligence community is "dissociated" because of the way in which information has been "compartmented." Given this network of government enforced secrecy it may be difficult or impossible to fully or accurately assess many of the complaints of abuse made by survivors. Nevertheless, these reports should be seriously investigated.

6. Experimental destructive cults are groups that conduct coercive mind control research, typically without the victim's consent. An example would be the work of Donald E. Cameron, M.D., a past president of the American Psychiatric Association. Donald Cameron conducted experimental mind control research on unsuspecting psychiatric patients in Canada that was funded by the CIA.

Cult abuse can be defined as any abuse perpetrated by a cult. Cult abuse is similar, but not identical, to ritual abuse. The differences between these two definitions are that cult abuse does not necessarily cause dissociation of identity, and ritual abuse is not necessarily always carried out in a cult. (pp. 215–217)

Because of the nature of ritual abuse and its frequent incorporation of occult symbolism and theology, there may be a tendency to misidentify it as a religious or spiritual issue rather than a criminal one. Ritual abuse is often popularly referred to as Satanic ritual abuse, an expression that implies assumptions that sometimes cannot be substantiated and thus create obstacles to appropriate scientific or criminal investigation. It is necessary to recognize that when we hear the term, satanic, we may not know whether this term refers to a religious doctrine (Satanic) or a broader descriptive term (satanic). This is an important distinction because we are expected to respect the choices of others. It is only when such belief systems are coercive and abusive in a manner that violates the law that we have a duty to intervene.

To maintain scientific objectivity in this matter, it is necessary to exercise a position of religious and spiritual neutrality. Our legal system demands accuracy, and language that deviates from literal and supportable fact may seriously damage an otherwise reasonable legal argument in a court of law. Therefore, identifying this type of abuse as being Satanic may create impediments to successful prosecution unless it can be proven that the abuse was indeed perpetrated by a Satanic group. There is no evidence that all ritual abuse is based on Satanic principles. In fact, there is no proof that any ritual abuse is specifically Satanic. Individuals who identify themselves as Satanists frequently declare that their belief system does not include non-consensual abusive activities or involve children.

Also, those who identify themselves as victims of such abuse sometimes deny that Satanic principles are at the foundation of the ritualistic components. Some elements associated with Satanism may be present in some cases of ritual abuse. In such instances, it would be more accurate and correct to refer to these occurrences as ritual abuse with Satanic themes. Such terminology clarifies that the alleged ritual abuse survivor describes the abuse as having Satanic elements but does not necessarily imply that either the survivor or the interviewer blames the abuse on a Satanic cult. On the other hand, if there is evidence that a Satanic cult is involved in the abuse of an individual, that should be clearly stated.

In order to accurately address the unique problems associated with ritual abuse victims, we must establish a unifying language that transcends disciplines and agendas. We must speak the same language if we are to be able to truly speak to the issue. Unfortunately, soliciting agreement between even colleagues within the same profession is a sometimes insurmountable task. Crossing boundaries between different professions is an even more daunting assignment. As in any other mission, the first step is to be open to change, to be willing to negotiate and to compromise, so long as this does not represent the abandonment of principles, duty, and professional standards. If there is a shared commitment to truth, justice, recovery, and advocacy, a shared language is not only possible, it is imperative. However, both internal and external politics have obstructed constructive dialogue and have made negotiations regarding the development and application of the language of ritual abuse problematic.

For reasons that defy logic, there is significant resistance within the mental health community to adopting a universal language. On the one hand, this is not entirely surprising given the breadth of psychological theory and practice. However, there is more at play here. Despite the controversy surrounding the theme of ritual abuse, there is nevertheless a play for power over the language because whoever controls the language controls the direction the study of this phenomenon will take. The survivors themselves are conflicted. Many of these individuals meet the diagnostic criteria for psychological conditions ranging from post-traumatic stress disorder to dissociative identity disorder. Many of these folks report exacerbation of their symptoms when they attempt to address the ritualistic elements of their abuse histories and feel constrained to keep the secret. Others attribute mythic powers to their perpetrators and fear they are under constant surveillance and vulnerable to revictimization. Still others have spoken candidly of their experiences without restraint and the subsequent disbelief engendered by their claims has fostered mistrust of anyone outside the survivor community.

Among both survivors and helping professions, spirituality is sometimes considered a component of recovery and religious doctrine is frequently incorporated into psychotherapeutic interventions. This position has subsequently created new schisms within the community of survivor advocates. Finally, there are those personalities among both the survivor and professional communities who are deeply invested in self-promotion to the exclusion of the best interests of science, justice, and society. The factions jockeying for position may all be motivated by the best intentions, but the end result has left the survivor advocacy community divided, divisive, and diminished. While the backlash is united in both their language and resolve, the survivor advocacy community is fragmented.

The politics of ritual abuse within the traditions of the helping professions, law and the media are even more confused. Traditionally, journalists gravitated toward the underdogs and championed the causes of peace, civil rights, feminism, and other social movements that ultimately shaped society. However, in the case of allegations of ritual abuse, these professions have demonstrated a bias that actually favors the backlash community. By adopting their language to inhabit ritual abuse allegations with a sense of hysteria and channeling their sympathies to the questionable population of falsely accused, the professional communities have influenced law, medicine, psychotherapy, and media representations of crimes with ritually abusive features. Survivors and their advocates face the dual challenge of overcoming bias as well as trauma.

If we are to apply scientific reasoning to the study of ritual abuse, we must apply a universal vocabulary that fosters an environment that eschews personal bias, self-promotion, or religious agendas, and instead is goal directed and sensitive to the realities faced by survivors. We cannot afford to spend the time and energy that has thus far been wasted in an effort to shape the language of ritual abuse to meet personal or political ambitions. Rather, we have an obligation to survivors, future victims, and society to meet the challenge of defining ritual abuse and its component features in order to develop a dialogue with survivors, helping professions, law enforcement, and the media in an effort to identify, understand, and address its many destructive aspects. Will we do our duty to survivors, science, society, and the holy grail of justice? Will we abandon those who have already been betrayed on the most fundamental level? Will we protect future generations from unspeakable acts and their crippling consequences? The answers lie not in the words we have written, but in the response of the reader.

Exploring Commonalities Reported by Adult Survivors of Extreme Abuse: Preliminary Empirical Findings

Carol Rutz, Thorsten Becker, Bettina Overkamp, and Wanda Karriker

"Nothing is perfect, nor does practice lead to perfection. However, practice does lead to more knowledge and we all need that a lot."[1]

Introduction

More than two decades ago, professionals in the mental health field were calling for proof that clients' accounts of extreme abuse, specifically ritual abuse and its associated mind control programming, are based in fact. As part of a panel of extreme abuse survivors and advocates at a conference sponsored by the United Nations, co-author Karriker (2007) recalled:

> 1988. I attended a conference in Chicago that is focused on dissociative disorders. First time I'd ever talked with any non-skeptical colleagues about my work with ritually-abused clients. In an ad hoc group, therapists from across North America sit around in a circle. They talk about similar stories of ritual abuse that they have heard from clients. The leader calls for calm. He cautions that we as therapists should not make this phenomenon public until we have research to back it up.

In 1989, Kluft addressed the polarization in the dissociative disorders field over the subject of ritual abuse. He observed that "Clinicians in many parts of North America and in European countries as well are hearing remarkably similar accounts of ritualistic abuse from many patients" (p. 191) and recommended serious study of the phenomenon stating, "Even as I advocate an open-minded but cautious circumspection as a scientific modus operandi, I appreciate the difficulties (and at times the ethical and practical impossibilities) involved in such a stance" (p. 192).

At a Chicago conference addressing dissociative disorders in 1990, a heated topic of informal discussion was an article (Ganaway, 1989) in which a psychiatrist questions the reality of ritual abuse and the credibility of repressed memories. He reports that some sociologists have categorized accounts of ritual abuse as 'urban legends' and asks,

> To what degree do these vividly re-enacted experiences represent purely factual accounts of multigenerational cult activities with actual human sacrifices as described, versus fantasy and/or illusion borrowing its core material from literature, movies, TV, other patients' accounts, or unintentional therapist suggestion? (p. 211)

Two years later, the ritual abuse controversy was discussed during the town meeting at a professional conference on multiple personality in Alexandria, Virginia. As had Kluft, some experts called for more scientific data to support the existence of ritual abuse. At this same conference, Hammond (1992) described his beliefs about mind control and programming:

> When you start to find the same highly esoteric information in different states and different countries, from Florida to California, you start to get an idea that there is something going on that is very large, very well coordinated with a great deal of communication and systematicness [sic] to what is happening.

Co-author Becker (2007) asserts that the controversy over the reality of ritual abuse reached its peak in 1997 when prominent therapists in the dissociative disorders field were charged with civil and criminal actions. In a civil suit, Burgus vs. Braun et al., the plaintiffs claimed that false memories of ritual abuse had been implanted in a woman and her sons by Dr. Bennett Braun. Without Dr. Braun's agreement, his insurance company paid plaintiffs 10.6 million dollars to settle the case out of court. (Defendant has filed a lawsuit against his insurance company for this breach of contract). In a case that went to court, Dr. Judith Peterson faced criminal charges in connection with "false" or "recovered" memories of ritual abuse. All charges were dismissed in March 1999 before the defense was heard, ending the case in a mistrial. Becker writes that after these cases were settled, "The debate, the controversial discussion as well as the publishing of books and articles on ritual abuse seem to carry on a very much lower level of profile."

Using the term "ritual abuse," our search of the PsycINFO data base confirms Becker's observation that publication of journal articles has decreased since 1999. From 1988 to 1998, 87 articles were published. From 1999 through June 2007, only 15 were published.[2]

The International Society for the Study of Dissociation (2005) addresses this controversy over the existence of ritual abuse. Offering no scientific data to support or refute their claims, the authors of "Guidelines for Treating Dissociative Identity in Adults (2005)" write: "There is divergence of opinion in the field concerning the origins of patients' reports of seemingly bizarre abuse experiences such as involvement in organized occultist 'ritual' abuse and covert government-sponsored mind control experiments." The guidelines specify three opinions held by therapists: (1) clinicians who believe patients' reports of organized abuse; (2) clinicians who believe patients' reports of other types of sadistic events are misremembered as "ritual" abuse and mind control; (3) clinicians who believe patients' reports can be explained "as contagion, unconscious defensive elaborations, false memory, delusion, or deliberate confabulation."

Two empirical studies in peer-reviewed journals (Bottoms, Shaver, & Goodman, 1996; Schmuttermaier & Veno, 1999) indicate that the majority of surveyed therapists who have treated at least one alleged survivor believe their clients' claims of ritual abuse. From the final results of a stratified random sample survey of clinical members of the American Psychological Association, Bottoms et al. conclude that, "Overwhelmingly, our respondents believed their clients' claims, even in the absence of corroborative evidence" (p. 25). Schmuttermaier and Veno report that none of the counselors in their Australian study believe that their clients intentionally fabricated claims of ritual abuse.

In reaction to those who argue that most or all claims of ritual abuse and/or mind control (RA/MC) programming are fabricated, Hal Pepinsky (2005), a professor of criminal justice, counters:

> If these narratives are essentially fabricated, they must have been fabricated in many different ways at once. It would require a more elaborate "conspiracy" to account for how similar narratives could be falsely implanted in so many survivors' minds in so many different ways (e.g., "memories" that arise before therapy in some cases and after therapy in others, in childhood in some cases and only long afterward in adulthood in others) than to account for how so many cults and mind control programmers could operate essentially in secret, with impunity. (p. 1371) Ritual abuse is an international phenomenon. Van der Hart, Boon, and Heijtmajer (1997) describe reports of ritual abuse in the Netherlands, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Norway, Spain, South Africa, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and the United States; Kent (1997), in Canada; Schmuttermaier and Veno (1999), in Australia. An Australian organization, Advocates for Survivors of Child Abuse (2006), includes France, Finland, Russia, and New Zealand and points out that "Increased attention is now being paid to ritual abuse in Nigeria, India, Ghana, Zimbabwe, and Zambia and its role in the trafficking of women into Europe" (p. 16).

Mind control is also an international phenomenon. Some of our colleagues have heard reports from their clients about mind control programming in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Germany, Norway, Sweden, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, France, Israel, Russia, Tibet, Afghanistan, India, Lebanon, Italy, China, Belgium, and Japan (personal communications, December 6, 2006).

Marks (1979), Ross (2000), co-author Rutz (2001), and Scheflin and Opton (1978) reviewed declassified documents proving that secret mind control experiments were conducted on thousands of unwitting subjects in CIA programs such as Bluebird, Artichoke, and MKULTRA. Ross writes, “The major goal of the Cold War mind control programs was to create dissociative symptoms and disorders, including full multiple personality disorder” (p. E). Gould and Cozolino (1992) contend that ritual abuse survivors with multiple personality disorder may have personalities deliberately created by cults that have been programmed [a mind control term] to perform specific functions for the cult. Thus, victims could have had mind control tactics used on them even if they were not subjects in government-sponsored mind control experiments. Conversely, government-sponsored mind control subjects could have been ritually abused in experimental settings.

Pepinsky believes that hearing directly from RA/MC survivors shapes his “understanding a lot more than talk or literature about them” (p. 1373). Agreeing with Pepinsky’s observation, the authors pooled our various skills, knowledge, and experiences to develop a means to bring the existence of extreme abuse like that suffered by RA/MC victims to the attention not only of mental health professionals, but also to the media and to individuals and organizations from around the world who are in positions to expose this “hidden holocaust.”

Relevant Research

Using data bases covered by Academic Search Premier, CINAHL, Health Sources: Nursing/Academic Edition, PsycINFO, and PubMed and using the search terms “ritual abuse,” “ritualistic abuse,” “satanic abuse,” “satanist abuse,” “sadistic abuse,” “ritual abuse and mind control,” “mind control programming,” and “mind control experimentation,” we found 325 citations from peer-reviewed journals. Those classified as comments, editorials, book reviews, abstracts, letters, etc. were eliminated from our search, leaving 165 full articles with one or more of the search terms in the title or as a subject or keyword.

The majority are position papers addressing controversies in the mental health field regarding the reality of ritual abuse, false and recovered/delayed memories, and suggestive therapy techniques. Forty seven articles are classified as empirical studies and can be grouped into the following categories:

11 Child victims of ritual abuse
7 Clinical adult case studies
6 Surveys of mental health professionals
4 Analyses of clinical/archival data on multiple adult survivors

4 Psychometric studies with adult survivors
3 Simulation studies using university students as subjects
3 Prevalence studies of adult and child victims
2 Surveys of child agency workers
2 Historical case studies
2 Groups of adult RA survivors compared with other groups
2 Miscellaneous studies
1 Group of RA adults interviewed

In only one study did researchers directly interview a group of ritually abused adults about "the nature of the abuse and its perceived impact on interpersonal, occupational, and spiritual development" (Shaffer & Cozolino, 1992, p. 188). In addition to the Shaffer and Cozolino study, only two studies (Bottoms et al., 1996; Young, Sacks, Braun & Watkins, 1991) display descriptive data provided by therapists regarding types and sequelae of ritual abuse. No studies involving survivors of mind control experimentation were found.

Bottoms et al. (1996) constructed a prototype of 386 cases from the decade of the 1980's based on the particular features of abuse that clinical psychologists had heard from their clients. They found the following:

> The most common feature of ritual cases was "forced sex." The next most common was "repeated practices."…Also common, however, were abuse by a member of a cult-like group; abuse related to symbols associated with the devil; abuse involving sacrifice or torture of animals; abuse involving excrement or blood; and abuse involving knives, altars, and candles… The least common features of ritualistic cases were abuse related to the breeding of infants for ritual sacrifice, abuse involving cannibalism, child pornography, and amnesic periods or preoccupation with dates. (p. 10) From most to least reported, presenting symptoms of clients were depression, suicidal ideation, excessive fears and phobias, somatic complaints, insomnia, sexual acting out, social withdrawal, inappropriate aggression, substance abuse, obsessive compulsiveness and inappropriate toilet behavior. Forty nine percent of clients reporting ritual abuse had been diagnosed MPD; 28%, PTSD.

Young et al. (1991) describe 37 adult patients, all diagnosed with multiple personality disorder (MPD) or dissociative disorder not otherwise specified, who reported similar abuses by satanic cults. Apparently, most of the data were collected while the patients were in treatment with the authors. The article lists ten types of ritual abuse and the percentage of subjects who reported each type: sexual abuse (100%), witnessing and receiving physical abuse/torture (100%), witnessing animal mutilation/killings (100%), death threats (100%), forced drug usage (97%), witnessing and forced participation in human adult and infant sacrifice (83%), forced cannibalism (81%), marriage to Satan (78%), buried alive in coffins or graves (72%), forced impregnation and sacrifice of own child (60%). They propose a clinical syndrome representing psychiatric sequelae common to their sample: severe post-traumatic stress disorder (100%), dissociative states with satanic overtones (100%), survivor guilt (97%), indoctrinated beliefs (94%), unusual fears (91%), sexualizations of sadistic impulses (86%), bizarre self-abuse (83%), and substance abuse (62%).

Shaffer and Cozolino (1992) interviewed 19 women and one man who reported types and aftereffects of ritualistic abuse consistent with those reported by Young et al. All subjects reported witnessing the murder of animals, infants, children and/or adults. All reported suicidal ideation and half reported suicide attempts. The majority reported severe and sadistic forms of abuse by multiple perpetrators. Some reported continued recontact/revictimization into their adult years. Fifty five percent reported repeated psychiatric hospitalizations during the initial and middle stages of psychotherapy. Several survivors experienced religious/spiritual conflicts stating that “the most destructive aspect of the ritualistic abuse had been the negative effects that it had on their spiritual selves” (p. 190). The majority said they believed in a higher power, but only half of that subgroup was involved in an organized religion. The majority considered participation in support groups as a necessary adjunct to psychotherapy. All considered the uncovering of memories as the primary focus in therapy and felt that “their therapists’ beliefs both in the reality of the abuse they reported and in their capacity to recover were necessary preconditions to their ability to deal with these very difficult therapeutic issues” (p. 189).

Methodology

An Online Survey

The primary objectives of this study are to gather preliminary descriptive data to obtain indications of the nature and extent of extreme abuse like that suffered by RA/MC survivors and to use our findings to give survivors voice, validation, and visibility. We decided that the most practical way to reach a sample of this population and hopefully to generate a large number of responses from different geographic locations was to announce and conduct a study online.

Granello and Wheaton (2004) state that one of the advantages of using web-based surveys in the counseling profession is the ability to access individuals who are not in the mental health system but have mental health concerns. They cite studies to suggest that “self-disclosure is increased when people communicate using web-based surveys as compared with traditional paper-pencil surveys” (p. 389).

Riggle, Rostosky and Reedy (2005) who conduct research with the bisexual, gay, lesbian and transgender (BGLT) populations have found the online mode effective in reaching “subpopulations that are not easily identifiable, are decentralized, or are rare in the general population” (p. 2).[3] In their research they consider trust, which involves the assurance of confidentiality and anonymity, as one of the most important issues. They believe that for hard-to-reach populations, “the opportunity to personalize contact may be the most important element for ensuring participation and valid responses” (p. 16).

Survey Development

To accomplish our goals, we developed an extreme abuse survey (EAS) titled “An International Survey for Adult Survivors of Extreme Abuse.” Offered in English and German, the EAS consists of six sections: (0) Demographics, (1) Memories, (2) Possible Aftereffects, (3) Personal Experiences, (4) Healing Methods, (5) Categories of Abuse.[4] Sections 1–3 contain closed-response questions.[5] Section 4 is made up of Likert-type items. The memories, aftereffects, other experiences, and healing methods listed in sections 1–4 have been noted in the literature or have been reported by survivors in therapy with one of the authors, at survivor and professional conferences, on websites, or in support and study groups made up of therapists or survivors. Section 5 offers respondents an opportunity to self-select the category of abuse that best describes their experiences as survivors: (1) RA, (2) MC, (3) RA and MC, (4) Other EA.

We invited a panel of survivors to pretest the instrument to assure that the directions were clear and to point out confusing or ambiguous terms. In addition to offering suggestions for additional items, the panel confirmed that all items have face validity, i.e., the questions make sense in regard to personal experiences that survivors have reported.

Population and Sampling

Because it would have been impossible to select a worldwide random sample of extreme abuse survivors, we used convenience sampling. In her announcement letter, co-author Rutz asked fellow survivors and their advocates to do the following:

> Forward this email announcement to other RA/MC survivors whom you know, email lists of survivors, and all professionals you know who work with survivors and ask them to forward to others and ask others to forward to survivors and to professionals (including therapists, physicians, clergy, deprogrammers, researchers, law enforcement, attorneys and others who have worked with RA/MC survivors) literally sending the announcement around the world.

Thus, the target population for our study is defined as all adult survivors of extreme abuse including, but not limited to, ritual abuse and mind control who saw or heard about the announcement of the EAS made by Carol Rutz to her fellow survivors and their advocates on December 31, 2006. Initially sent to 139 survivors, six survivor lists and 50 therapists/clergy/helpers, Rutz's letter stated the rationale for the survey and provided a live link to the URL where it could be accessed (http://extreme-abuse-survey.net). The announcement letter was also posted on the EAS website for benefit of those who heard about the survey but did not receive the announcement email. Including her email address in the announcement made it possible for persons who had questions about the project to reach her. Midway through the online posting, February 14, 2007, Rutz sent an email reminder of the survey to her contacts.

To accommodate survivors who did not feel comfortable taking the survey online, the instructions for the EAS gave them the option of printing it out or requesting a pdf file to complete and return to one of the researchers by postal mail or email. Email addresses were posted on the website in both German and English for survivors who had questions and comments for the survey developers.

Technical Problems, Solutions, and Attacks on Our Efforts

Online surveys are often used by companies to obtain feedback from customers and by universities to conduct social science research. Without the resources of these types of organizations, implementation of the large scale EAS was a significant challenge. In the early stages of planning, we addressed several questions:

1. What are possible obstacles to a successful completion of our mission?
2. What types of technical assistance do we need?
3. What technology do we need to collect, store and analyze the data?
4. What will the project cost and how will we pay for it?
5. How do we publicize the survey?

6. How would alleged perpetrators of the abuses highlighted in the EAS react to their crimes being exposed through survey results? Would the website be attacked? Would attempts be made to hack the data on the server? Would alleged perpetrators try to spy on the users?

Before we could go forward with the survey, it was imperative that we find answers to these questions and resolve the issues they presented. Consultations with webmasters and small service providers made us aware of potential problems that could undermine our goals if not remedied.

Possible Obstacles

A primary concern was that we had no means to estimate the number of extreme abuse survivors who would participate; therefore, we could not predict the server capacity required to store our data or the amount of online traffic that would be generated—essential determinants for Internet provider costs. There was also the risk of a denial-of-service attack which meant that the server would be swamped with requests from the Internet and lose bandwidth to the point that the survey would no longer be accessible.[6] This could also affect other websites hosted by the provider such as reported by Kossel & Koetter (2007). Another major concern was that a positive response on one of the questions—"I was forced to murder a baby."—indicated the violation of a criminal law and could possibly garner the attention of law enforcement, thereby increasing the risk of our provider being raided and his equipment confiscated.[7]

How to gain the trust of survivors and assure them that their participation in the survey would remain confidential was discussed at length. Since each connection on the web is between the sender (online user) and receiver (the addressed web server), both sender and receiver can be identified by an IP number which can be traced through the server either online or in storage.[8] Anonymity of the respondents could not be guaranteed under these circumstances.

At this point in our planning discussions, it became clear that we needed a rather unconventional solution for the problems mentioned above. Because broadband Internet enables persons to run web servers in their own homes, we decided that the best approach was to be our own provider through the auspices of David Tommasi. In addition to minimizing all the above mentioned risks, this arrangement offered immediate offline access to the data and hardware, allowing for concurrent backups and efficient maintenance.

Technical Assistance

We could not have conducted this project without the assistance of two external teams working in the background: (1) the questionnaire programming team and (2) the IT team. Members of the questionnaire programming team (who desire to remain anonymous) took over the tasks of programming the questionnaire and collecting the data. Employed by a German media publishing company, they specialize in working with the Microsoft.NET Framework which is used for small web questionnaires developed for contact with customers and surfers who visit the websites of their company's various magazines. Using this technique, there is no need for a database, i.e., all data are stored in xml-coding and accessible without specialized tools or software programs. This process does not require sophisticated, expensive hardware. The IT team took over the task of hosting the website.

Aside from these teams, several support persons helped with various tasks involved in getting the EAS and two subsequent surveys online.[9] Altogether, a staff of 15 volunteers supported the surveyors. Not one of these people charged for their services.[10]

Technology

Under German law, every website hosted in Germany must have an "Impressum" displaying contact information for the website. S.P.ORG.-Consulting e.V.,[11] a non-governmental organization located in Lueneburg, Germany, took responsibility for the EAS website using the office address of co-author Becker. The domain, Extreme-Abuse-Survey.net, was registered to David Tommasi who hosted the project.

Our online provider worked as a relay station and directed all requests to a private broadband telephone account connected to this provider by a script which handled the Dynamic Name Server (DNS) and updated IP addresses. The script ran on a web server with a LINUX operating system[12] which served as a proxy for the server which hosted the survey. This server ran under Microsoft Windows 2000 and Microsoft.NET Framework 2.0.

A script which sent out an incremental backup of the survey data to each of our two email addresses was also running on the LINUX server.[13] Data were sent via compressed and encrypted files. The LINUX server also functioned as a relay for two support email addresses (one in English and one in German language) through which participants could contact the surveyors.

Costs

We purchased three used Fujitsu-Siemens Scenic D[14] computers on eBay and added memory and hard disks that we had on hand. All three computers were set up identically with one placed as a backup close to the primary location and another as a backup at co-author Becker's home. Although this hardware could be considered outdated, it served our purpose well.

Our expenses were approximately 120 Euros for hardware. Software licenses were sponsored by friends. No one connected with the project received any compensation for their expertise or time.

Publicity

The EAS went online on December 31, 2006 at approximately 6:00 p.m. MEZ. Shortly afterwards, co-author Rutz sent her email announcement of the survey (see above). The same night Jean Riseman, editor of Survivorship, announced and endorsed the survey with a special newsletter to subscribers. During the next few weeks, the survey was announced on several other survivors' and therapists' mailing lists, on survivor websites, and in other survivor newsletters.[15]

The website had an extended use of Meta Tags by the choice of relevant keywords; consequently, the survey gained high ranking at Google and AltaVista almost immediately. It was also listed in several online address books. Incidentally, one provider banned the link to the survey due to the use of the term "child pornography" in the Meta Tags, even after we had explained the purpose of the survey. When the provider was asked why this decision had been made, he replied, "We don't want to have anything to do with child pornography."

Attacks

On the evening of January 2, 2007, the server faced an intense amount of port scans at the high and low ports and also attempts to access non-existing server pages by checking a variety of filenames. For a few days afterwards, the nameserver was addressed with several requests[16] carried out on a large scale. This used an enormous amount of bandwidth, rendering the server at stake due to this loss. In the first weeks, our provider's own web projects had an unusually high amount of traffic suggesting that unknown people wanted to learn more about those working on this survey.

Fortunately, the attacks gradually diminished and after three weeks almost ended. In early March, there was another attempt to hack the server by someone trying to connect to the Microsoft Frontpage serverports which are part of the Microsoft Internet Information Server. Since we did not use these ports, this attack failed.[17] Parallel to these incidents, third parties made several attempts to obtain the private data of some surveyors and technicians.

Apparently because of discussions about the EAS on survivor Internet forums, both David Tommasi (Internet provider) and co-author Becker were extensively and aggressively flamed by emails for offering this survey and conducting it in a way that was “not responsible.” On one German Internet forum moderated by a professional mental health carer, a detailed description was posted detailing ways to attack the survey.

We were criticized because we did not use SSL[18] encryption, a technique used by online shops to transfer credit card data. The critics’ rationale was that without SSL, there was great potential for respondents to be spied upon. They did not understand or acknowledge that an SSL connection stores the IP addresses of both senders and receivers and if used would breach the anonymity of those who participate in the survey.

Although the technical aspects of our project received negative criticism from some members of the mental health community, our work received positive reactions and support within the LINUX Internet community and related discussion forums. For example, there had been a celebration with many congratulatory emails when our LINUX server was updated to the Red Hat Enterprise Linux.[19] This remarkable difference in tone between the friendly LINUX community and the German critics of the survey within the mental health community was gratifying.

On March 31, 2007, at the end of day (in all time zones), the EAS was taken offline. For a financial cost of approximately 120 Euros and with the volunteered help of 15 technical support persons and numerous survivors and therapists from around the world who helped publicize the survey, we succeeded in overcoming the obstacles (including attacks on our server and personal attacks on the surveyors) that could have prevented a successful completion of our mission to give extreme abuse survivors from around the world voice, validation and visibility.

A Prepublication Backlash Against Our Methodology

As developers of a preliminary survey designed to address one of the most controversial issues ever to engage the mental health field and spill over into the public arena, we expected to receive rigorous methodological scrutiny when we published the results. We did not anticipate that less than two weeks after the EAS had gone online, we would be inundated with attacks on the validity of our potential results. Without benefit of seeing the assumptions and limitations that we had acknowledged in our research plan, self-appointed critics on at least six professional lists accused us of being both unethical and unscientific. In addition to pointing out most of the limitations discussed below, they judged our methodology as flawed, even before the majority of participants had entered their answers into our data base.

One clinician asked why a study like this was needed since there is no evidence that ritual abuse and mind control experimentation on children have ever occurred. We were accused of having violated the ethical principles of research involving human subjects because we did not provide informed consent for potential participants[20] and because our study was not approved by an institutional review committee.[21]

Criticisms centered around three issues: (1) the risk that clients might take the EAS and unconsciously incorporate events that didn't happen to them into their memory systems;[22] [23] (2) fear that mere exposure to the items might provoke intense anxiety in fragile, unhealed clients and cause them to decompensate;[24] and (3) concern about the "uncontrolled distribution" of the survey directly to survivors who were asked to forward it to other survivors and persons who were not therapists who could not discern which survivors could tolerate the survey. P. Perskin addressed the above-mentioned survey issues:

> The criticism leveled at the Extreme Abuse Survey seems to ignore the value of this pioneering effort. Ritual abuse and other forms of extreme abuse are frequently reported by individuals diagnosed with dissociative disorders. Gaining a better understanding of the experiences these individuals share and their reactions to these experiences fills an enormous gap in the therapeutic process. We cannot know what experiences are true or fabricated (by the perpetrator or the victim). But we do know that the psychological sequelae can be disabling and create lifelong problems that may never be overcome. We owe it to these people to do all we can to recognize and respect their stories and to work with them to find a way of mitigating their symptoms and distress. (personal communication, January, 2007) Offering support for our efforts during the heat of this discussion, S. Oz from Israel (personal communication, January, 2007) wrote, "It seems to me that all this concern about 'saving' adult survivors of evil from a questionnaire that can validate their sanity is inappropriate." K. Downing from California (personal communication, January, 2007) said that because she had been cautioned by her colleagues that the questions were horrendous and that survivors might destabilize if they read the questions, she had tried to dissuade a client from taking the survey. When she told her client that other therapists were afraid to tell their clients about the survey, the client shouted: "A survey? They're worried about a friggin' survey? After what we've been through?" So Downing wonders: Exactly what is it about the survey that could destabilize the survivor? The questions provoking > overwhelming flashbacks? Or the threats that the perps have instilled in their victims: not only “If you tell you die,” but also, “If you ever remember these things you will have to kill yourself.”

Co-author Rutz replied to Downing:

> When I was new in therapy, the “don’t tell” programming and fear associated with telling was overwhelming. I too felt all of the things your clients have indicated. It’s good to be reminded how vulnerable and fearful survivors can be. Once they tell and find none of those horrid things happen, then it will be easier to tell and tell and tell. I would say this survey may provide a key element in their ability to move forward in their healing.

A study by Cromer, Freyd, Binder, DePrince and Becker-Blease (2006) should allay some of the anxiety of therapists who ask their traumatized clients to participate in social science research. This study compared the risks in asking trauma history questions (including questions about rape and incest in one sample) with asking other personal questions. The researchers conclude that “trauma questions cause relatively minimal distress and perceived greater importance and greater cost-benefit ratings compared to other kinds of psychological research in a human subjects pool population” (p. 359) and that “trauma research that asks participants to anonymously disclose their trauma histories either in paper and pencil or in online reports may also be classified as minimal risk” (p. 359).

Cromer et al. (2006) made it clear that trauma survivors in their study appreciated having the opportunity to participate in trauma research. This attitude was echoed by survivors from around the world who took the EAS. For example, a survivor from the United Kingdom wrote, “Heartfelt thanks for all your efforts. I believe that the twenty-first century will bring truth to the world because of all of us, survivors and supporters, who will lead the way. We have not survived in vain” (personal communication, January, 2007).

Assumptions and Limitations

Results of our study provide descriptive data obtained from a single online administration. We did not have access to a group of extreme abuse survivors to pretest the instrument for test-retest reliability for individual items or sections of the instrument. We are aware of no instruments which measure the constructs under investigation, making it impossible to have offered both the EAS and another instrument in a pilot study to compare results for convergent validity. Neither do we know of an instrument that has been shown to have no correlation with the construct of RA/MC; therefore, we had no way to assess discriminant validity. As Riggle et al. (2005) acknowledge, “Limitations on the external validity of the results drawn from online surveys are unavoidable” (p. 3).

A major limitation, one which is inherent in all anonymous surveys, is that we could not control the sample; neither can we guarantee that participants always told the truth or that all are survivors of extreme abuse. However, because survivors of torture sometimes report bizarre-sounding types of violence (some of which may have been staged to deceive small children), we could not come up with any survey items to rule out “fakers.”

Since we decided to place the issues of anonymity and confidentiality above a need to require each person who logged in to use a password and identify himself or herself, it is possible that participants could have taken the EAS (or parts of it) more than once. Because of the length of the survey and the intensity of many of the questions, we believe few, if any, survivors would have been motivated to embellish the survey results by taking it multiple times. As with all anonymous surveys, there was no way to keep ineligible participants from responding.

No widely accepted definitions appear in the academic or survivor literature for the terms “ritual abuse,” “mind control,” or “extreme abuse.” We did not operationally define those terms for the EAS, rather we made the assumption that respondents would define the terms within their own frames of reference. Except for the scant quantitative data we gleaned from the studies discussed in the “Relevant Research” section, the list of variables investigated by the EAS is primarily based upon previous knowledge and assumptions of the authors and cannot encompass all memories, aftereffects, experiences, or healing methods that individual survivors report.

We chose to offer no open-ended questions because we were concerned that we would not have the resources to adequately judge a large number of responses. Even though this limited participants in their ability to include everything they might have wanted to report, it is possible that not using open-ended questions led to higher incompletion rates.[25]

Parts 1 and 3 of the EAS are designed to collect information on remembered occurrences of past events; however, we realize that relying on memory presents challenges of forgetting, confabulating, embellishing, dissociating, denying, etc. Also, anecdotal evidence suggests that adults who were subjected as children to ritual abuse, mind control, and other forms of extreme abuse are likely to have been programmed to “not remember” or “not tell” (under threat of death in some cases) the horrendous things that they endured.

A few respondents reported technical difficulties on their first attempts to take the survey including a power outage, a computer freeze-up and failure of a dial-up connection. We assume that motivated participants tried a second time to participate.

Due to the traumatic background of survivors of extreme abuse, we were cognizant that some of the questions could be triggering, possibly causing various levels of post-traumatic stress reactions. For this reason, the instruction page of the EAS includes a warning: “Some of the responses may be triggering [emotionally upsetting] to survivors. You may stop at anytime and you do not have to complete it.”

We assume that those who chose to respond would in some respects be different from those who chose not to respond, but we cannot ascertain how they might be different. Neither can we determine if the 55 respondents who chose to take the survey offline and mail it to one of the researchers to input onto the EAS website are different in significant ways from persons who took it online.[26]

We cannot generalize results beyond the sample who actually responded. As with any self-report survey, EAS results do not provide evidence that events reported by respondents occurred; however, we believe that the participants have provided valuable information that is consistent with what we have heard personally and professionally from persons who identify themselves as survivors of extreme abuse. For its limited purpose, we assert that our approach is consistent with acceptable descriptive social science research. It is a starting point from which other researchers can decide if further investigation is warranted.

Results

Fourteen hundred seventy-one (1471) participants from more than thirty countries[27] answered at least one of the 248 questions on the EAS. Responses were exported from the web server into a spreadsheet format where macros were used to analyze over 351,000 cells (or pieces) of data to develop the survey results for statistical analyses. The following numbers of participants answered questions in each section. Note that the majority of dropouts occurred after the first section.[28]

Demographics 1430–1451

Possible Aftereffects 1034–1118

Personal Experience 956–1013

Self-selected Abuse Category 987

Frequencies of responses for first and last questions for those who took the survey in English and those who took it in German were compared. For the English version, the percentage of those who answered the last question (categories of abuse, n = 825) is 75% of the number who answered the first question (gender, n = 1097). For the German version, the percentage of those who answered the last question (n = 162) is 47% of the number who answered the first question (gender, n = 343).

Of 987 persons who self-selected the category of abuse that best describes their experiences, 19% chose ritual abuse; 7%, mind control; 52%, ritual abuse and mind control; 22%, other extreme abuse. Listed below are the five most frequently reported “yes” responses for the memories, possible aftereffects, and personal experiences sections.

Memories

Receiving physical abuse from perpetrators

Sexual abuse by multiple perpetrators

Other abuse(s)

Being threatened with death if I ever talked about the abuse

Witnessing physical abuse by perpetrators on other victims

Possible Aftereffects

Sleep problems

Painful body memories

Post-traumatic stress disorder

Unusual fears

Beliefs indoctrinated by perpetrator(s)

Personal Experiences

I have a spiritual belief system.

I was subjected to RA/MC at ages 3 through 6.

I was subjected to RA/MC at ages 7 through 13.

I have been diagnosed with DID (dissociative identity disorder/ formerly multiple personality disorder).

I had memories of incest before I sought therapy/counseling.

The five most frequently reported healing methods that were checked either "much help" or "great help" are:

Individual Psychotherapy/Counseling

Supportive Friends

Creative Writing

Personal Prayer/Meditation

Journaling

Relevant to the controversies over the reality of ritual abuse, government-sponsored mind control experimentation, the credibility of repressed memories, and claims that therapists implant false abuse memories in their clients, our data show that 64% of 985 respondents reported memories of incest and 48% of 977 respondents reported memories of ritual abuse before they sought therapy. Sixty-nine percent of 257 respondents who reported secret mind control experiments used on them as children also reported having been abused in a satanic cult.

There are numerous ways to statistically analyze this massive amount of descriptive data depending on which research questions are asked. For this chapter we answer the following:

1. Are there significant differences in the ways respondents from different countries categorize their abuse experiences when asked to choose either RA and MC, RA, MC, or Other EA? (See Table I)
2. Are there significant differences among the percentages of EAS respondents who report specific types of abuse in a satanic cult and the percentages of patients who reported similar types of abuse in the Young et al. (1991) and Bottoms et al. (1996) studies? (See Table II)
3. Are there significant differences among the percentages of EAS respondents who report possible aftereffects of abuse in a satanic cult and the percentages of patients reporting similar types of sequelae in the Young et al. (1991) study? (See Table III)

In planning the survey, we had no estimate of how many survivors would respond or from which countries they would come. Fortunately, the response rate was high and we were able to set up seven countries or groups of countries, each with the number of respondents large enough to allow for use of the chi-square test. [29] To answer the first question, we developed a contingency table to analyze the association between countries of residence and self-selected categories of extreme abuse. Using the chi-square test, we compared observed responses of each group with those that would be expected if there were no association between countries and categories of abuse. (See Table I).

To answer the first research question, we conclude that with a chi-square (18, N = 987) = 91.70, p ≤ 0.001, there are significant differences in the ways respondents from different countries categorize their abuse experiences when asked to choose either RA and MC, RA, MC, or Other EA. It should be noted, however, that half of the contribution to the chi-square (45.95) comes from one cell (Germany/ Other EA).

We reconstructed the contingency tables and performed two more chi-square tests to see if one or both of those variables were responsible for the significant distribution. When “Germany” is excluded as a research variable and “Other EA” is included, the distribution is not significant: chi-square (15, N = 849) = 21.14, p < 0.20. When “Other EA” is excluded and “Germany” is included, the distribution is not significant: chi-square (12, N = 773) = 16.48, p < 0.20. Therefore, if we use only three categories for comparison (1) RA and MC, (2) RA, and (3) MC, there are no significant differences across countries in how respondents classify their ritual abuse and mind control experiences. Further examination of German responses on specific survey questions may help determine why survivors from Germany differ from survivors from other parts of the world in the percentage of those who chose the category “Other Extreme Abuse.”

Only two studies in the peer-reviewed literature (Young et al., 1991; Bottoms et al., 1996), neither of which surveyed subjects directly, provide sufficient data with which to compare some of our results. We had incorporated all types of satanic ritual abuse and its sequelae reported by Young et al. and some of the ritualistic features reported by Bottoms et al. into our list of survey statements although we had changed some terminology to make questions for the EAS clearer.

Three statements in the Young et al. study were two statements in one and these were divided for the EAS. To compare the proportions of responses on these studies with the proportion of responses on the same or similar items on the EAS, we used the z-statistic. (See Tables II and III) The answer to the second research question is easily discerned by looking at Table II. It shows that for nine out of ten types of abuse, there is no statistical difference in frequencies of responses between the Young et al. patients and the EAS respondents. This means that 90% of the Young et al. findings were replicated in our study. Although 100% of patients in the Young et al. study reported "Witnessing animal mutilation/killings," only 86% of EAS respondents remembered this as part of their abuse history. When frequencies of listed responses on the EAS are compared with frequencies reported on the Bottoms et al. (1996) study, there is a highly significant difference on each item (p. <0.0001).

We can only conjecture why the Bottoms et al. (1996) findings are incongruent with the EAS and Young et al. (1991) findings. Perhaps the answer lies in the methods in which the different population samples were chosen and/or the ways the data were obtained. Bottoms et al. relied on reports of clinical psychologists to supply features of ritual abuse they had heard about from their clients; whereas, Young et al. reported information obtained from their own patients collected from ongoing clinical interviews over a two-year period. In contrast to the Young et al. criteria that all subjects carry a diagnosis related to dissociation, Bottoms et al. reported that only 62% of their sample exhibited dissociation with 49% diagnosed as MPD. For the EAS, we relied on self-reports of the 543 respondents who answered "yes" to the question, "I was ritually abused in a satanic cult."

Regarding research question #3, Table III clearly shows that except for one variable there are no significant differences between the percentages of EAS respondents who report possible aftereffects of abuse in a satanic cult and the percentages of patients reporting similar types of sequelae in the Young et al. study. In developing two questions to measure the sequelae that Young et al. refer to as "sexualizations of sadistic impulses" it is possible that we did not accurately reflect what the previous researchers meant by this symptom. If so, this could account for the difference in response rates on this item.

Discussion

The instrument used in this study was developed for survivors. We believe it appropriate to discuss salient findings of this project from co-author Carol Rutz's perspective as a survivor who understands first-hand the importance of "breaking the silence." Below we include excerpts from her speech, "The World Will Know," to a group of fellow survivors and their advocates at the "Tenth Annual Ritual Abuse, Secretive Organizations and Mind Control Conference" (Rutz, 2007).

Let me assure all of you that I understand how dry and meaningless statistics can be if they are devoid of humanity. I hope you will find my presentation full of the human spirit that allowed us all to survive and brought us together today. As a ritual abuse and mind control survivor, I was thrilled to join my esteemed colleagues and enlist fellow survivors' participation in the first ever "International Survey For Adult Survivors of Extreme Abuse." In an effort to show the world how large our numbers are, 1471 survivors from more than 30 countries responded. They chose to make their voices count, thereby lending credence to the reality of what they have truly endured.

Over the course of the last six years, I have become a public advocate for these silent masses. Being able to provide validation and voice to this population is one of the greatest gifts I will ever be given. For example, male survivors I have communicated with feel very alone. Our statistics prove otherwise. Approximately 18% of the respondents are males; 1% are transgendered.

If survey results generalize to all survivors of extreme abuse, we are a highly-educated population with approximately 32% reporting some college; 58% reporting a college or graduate degree. It seems that the still small voice within each of us, which our perpetrators tried to silence, sought solace in knowledge. Not surprising, as knowledge leads to power and that is something that all survivors had taken from them.

In announcing the survey I stated:

> Thousands of persons who survived Ritual Abuse and/or Mind Control and as a result may have developed DID[30] have been ignored too long and further injured by their inability to find quality mental health providers who will recognize and treat them. The survey is your opportunity to prove that Ritual Abuse, Mind Control and Government Experimentation are not "Urban Legends," fantasy or implanted memories. We can show a skeptical public that our numbers are beyond their wildest imaginations and that regardless of their belief or non-belief we need recognition and respect for having survived the most atrocious events known to humankind, hidden behind a mask of secrecy and disbelief. We also hope to make others more aware of the existence of RA/MC, the aftereffects of extreme child abuse, and the resiliency of the human spirit. Your voice will not be silenced or altered by anyone who has tried to discredit your experiences.

Breaking the silence imposed by their perpetrators is likely one of the most difficult things for an extreme abuse survivor to do. In a speech to therapists, Hammond (1992) noted that handlers want to make sure that victims don't consciously remember their programming and will make suggestions of amnesia and self-destruction to them such as, "If you ever remember anything… you will go crazy. You will become a vegetable and be locked up forever… and it will be easier to just kill yourself than have that happen to you, if you ever remember it."

Consistent with Hammond's clinical observations, 57% of 997 who answered the related question said that they had self-destruct programming installed in the event they began to remember their programming. Seventy-seven percent of 1159 had been threatened with death if they even talked about the abuse.

This anonymous survey proved to be a safe way for survivors to be heard and believed. What a testimony to the human spirit that these individuals could step forward and break those bonds.

Another difficult aspect for extreme abuse survivors to process involves memories of murder. Their suffering is so real and raw, especially when faced with any of the following situations reported by survey respondents.[31]

	N	% "Yes"
Forced participation in murder by perpetrators	1095	46%
Forced to murder (or made to think I had murdered)a baby	1111	50%
Forced to participate in animal mutilations/killings	1110	53%
Witnessing murder by perpetrators	1102	54%
My own child murdered by perpetrators	1088	24%

A recurrent theme in private emails to me was participants' amazement at seeing the types of abuse/violence/tortures they had been subjected to as questions on the survey. Having no idea they shared commonalities with hundreds of others, many had believed for years that their experiences were unique. They had kept silent, fearing no one would believe them because of the nature of the horror they had endured.

In analyzing reports of survivors' memories, I joined the "Shocked and Awe" group above. I had believed I was the only survivor who had watched a person be flayed until I noted that 32% of 964 survivors who answered that question indicated they had witnessed the same thing. That's 307 people who will have this image burned into their brains for the rest of their lives.

Imagine for a moment that you are among the following groups of respondents who had endured only one of the horrors listed below, let alone the gamut of them.

	N	%“Yes”
Sexual abuse by multiple perpetrators	1125	79%
Being caged	1121	53%
Starvation	1098	48%
Forced cannibalism	1109	44%
Bestiality	1122	52%
Buried alive	1118	45%
Electroshock	1119	50%
Sensory deprivation	1099	61%
Sleep deprivation	1118	69%
Incest	1122	70%
Child pornography	1106	52%
Child prostitution	1094	46%

Now imagine that no one believes you. This is what it feels like to be an extreme abuse survivor.

One survivor wrote, “Thank you for conducting the ritual abuse and mind control study. You made me cry with your kind words at the top. Nobody wants to hear about it but silence is not helping the children who still suffer.” In her article “Human Rights Alert: Ritual Torture,” Stone (2007) echoes that sentiment: “It’s hard to talk about something this horrific, but we need to look at it together for the love of humanity.”

Caring professionals, including therapists, physicians, clergy, etc. who have worked with survivors, not only disseminated our announcement, but some also used the survey as a healing tool. A participant wrote, “I had to have help from my counselor to answer some of these questions, but I wanted a voice in this. It’s good to know you are not alone.”

Seventy-five percent of 994 respondents reported having a spiritual belief system. I find that remarkable after what they have endured, especially when one considers that 46% of 960 survivors reported that at least one spiritual leader was involved in their RA/MC abuse. Listed below are response rates regarding other spiritually-related memories.

	N	%"Yes"
Ritually abused in a satanic cult	986	55%
Ritually abused in a Gnostic-occult group	969	14%
Ritually abused in a witchcraft cult	971	23%
Ritually abused in voodooism	966	07%
Had memories of ritual abuse before seeking therapy/counseling	977	48%
Perpetrators had on at least one occasion made them believe that external entities/spirits/demons had taken over their bodies	996	53%
Had at least one demon alter	957	40%

Regarding spiritual issues, a pastoral counselor wrote,

> I very much appreciate your collective efforts to document the RA/MC issues. I have worked with hundreds of such survivors in the US, Canada and abroad since the late 80's. Our ministry focus is on helping them get well. Their abuse often seems to deliberately connect them to the realm of 'cosmic evil' which is a concept that some professional organizations do not acknowledge or understand but that our experience abundantly documents is critical to complete healing." (T. Hawkins, personal communication, May, 2007) Participants were given an opportunity to evaluate healing methods often associated with the concept of "cosmic evil." The first number represents those who had tried each method. The second number is the percentage who found it of some to great help.

	N	%"Yes"
Deliverance	298	57%
Exorcism	199	36%
Personal prayer/meditation	766	83%

Spiritual guidance/counseling	605	71%
Theophostic prayer	207	56%

Besides spiritual healing, survivors found other helpful therapeutic tools. Individual psychotherapy/counseling topped the list with 75% of those who had been to therapy considering it from much help to great help. Other methods garnering over 50% in the much and great help categories combined were supportive friends, creative writing, personal prayer/meditation, journaling, art therapy, drawing, painting, abreactive work, grounding techniques, self-care/self-soothing techniques, formal deprogramming, and spiritual guidance/counseling.

The authors are aware of no previous studies pertaining to the victims of government-sponsored mind control experiments. Because of the ever increasing number of survivors coming forward alleging this type of abuse, we felt it relevant to statistically analyze this aspect. Twenty-six percent of 1000 respondents who answered the related question reported that secret government-sponsored mind control experiments were performed on them as children. Further analysis indicates that 69% of 257 respondents who said they had been used in government-sponsored mind control experiments also answered that they had been ritually abused in a satanic cult. This lends credence to the theory that during the Cold War, the mind control doctors went to the satanic cults to find already dissociative children for their experiments.

The National Security Archive (2005) posted documentation revealing extensive relationships between former Nazi war criminals and American intelligence organizations including the CIA. Many survivors have alleged some of these same war criminals, using aliases, were complicit in their extreme abuse. From the survey sample, ten percent of 965 respondents reported that one of their perpetrators went by the name, Dr. Black; five percent of 962 reported a Dr. Swartz (Black in German); seven percent of 961 reported a Father Joseph; and six percent of 959 reported a Vaterchen (Father in German). These four aliases are names many survivors have independently reported to me as names that were used in their presence by Josef Mengele, the “Angel of Death,” the infamous Nazi-doctor who performed horrific experiments on the prisoners at Auschwitz.

One mind control survivor who took the survey wrote,

> Continue your good and valuable work. I was a ‘gifted’ child left unable to cope with life, struggling to survive on SSDI that the government did not want to pay me. They shattered our minds and left us to pick up the pieces.

Another wrote,

> Thank you for this opportunity to stand and be counted. I finally connected with a psychiatrist who believes. I have hope. I am telling the truth. I approached the psych community because I already "knew" that I had been a human guinea pig for the U.S. Government courtesy of my father. The truth must be told, documented, and published for the world to see. We continue to suffer. There were cover stories for my absences, lies perpetrated to discredit me that I would not be a "reliable" witness. I know the truth. The world needs to know. I am a 51-year-old female and at this time I feel I have nothing to lose. Anything that I had, I lost through my demeaning process through the Social Security Disability Insurance approval process. I thank "God?" that I am still alive that I may live to see some sort of vindication. I dream of admission, apology, just compensation from the U.S. Government for the atrocities perpetrated on their own civilians: children!

Not only do survivors have to live through their abuse, but they are also likely to face years of severe aftereffects. Fifty-seven percent of 979 who responded to the related question are currently in psychotherapy/counseling for help with RA/MC issues. Respondents reported the following problems as possible aftereffects of the extreme abuse they experienced.

	N	%"Yes"
Sleep problems	1118	90%
Post-traumatic stress disorder	1114	89%
Survivor guilt	1102	73%
Substance abuse	1084	48%
Self-mutilating behaviors	1095	65%
Dissociative flashbacks with satanic themes	1085	68%
Eating disorders	1105	70%

Survivors seeking help for their injuries are further penalized by many insurance carriers. Mental health reimbursement is commonly only 50% of costs incurred. Because it is highly misunderstood by the lay person, dissociative identity disorder carries a myriad of problems, not the least of which is the diagnostic label. With 65% of 1007 respondents reporting DID, it is not difficult to understand how costly treatment can be as answers by 1448 respondents to the section “time spent in talk therapy” illustrate:

None	20%
Less than a year	09%
1–4 years	21%
5–9 years	21%
10–19 years	22%
20–29 years	05%
30+ years	01%

Many ritual abuse and mind control survivors are still walking through their nightmares and memories, left impotent to understand or deal with them alone. As they are given the liberation to tell and be believed, they will lose the fear they have been trapped in as evidenced by the words of these three persons who took the survey:

> “I was a little afraid I would get triggered but I didn’t which is good. What I learned is that I had a lot of abuse in my life and I am still here to talk about it.”
> “Thank you for your courage in ‘coming out’ and in developing this survey. Although it was mildly triggering, it was much more validating than triggering in the end.”
> “All people who have been sexually abused should never be made to feel mentally ill.”

The results of this survey will challenge many to step out of their comfort zones and change their worldviews. For those still in doubt I ask, How can we envision the future without visiting the past? Will we allow these heinous types of abuse to lie in the shadows, or do we have the courage to bring them into the light and face them?

I will continue to encourage survivors to find and use their voices. I believe it is our road to freedom. It liberates, invigorates and is the means to regain our personal power.
—Carol Rutz, August 2007

Conclusion

Where are the data? Skeptics who question the reality of ritual abuse and mind control have been asking this question for more than 20 years. Thanks to the efforts of 1471 survivors from around the world who punched their stories into the World Wide Web, we now have an enormous amount of data to hold out to that group of clinicians (and other skeptics) who believe that patients' reports of "seemingly bizarre abuse experiences such as involvement in organized occultist 'ritual' abuse and covert government-sponsored mind control experiments" can be explained "as contagion, unconscious defensive elaborations, false memory, delusion, or deliberate confabulation" (International Society for the Study of Dissociation (2005).

True to our mission to provide voice, validation, and visibility for survivors of extreme abuse, we encourage survivors to examine the survey responses to compare with their own experiences; we encourage mental health clinicians to use our findings in ways that will help their survivor clients overcome the aftereffects of torture; we encourage interested social science researchers to analyze our raw data for significant findings and to use it for comparisons with other research. Hopefully, responsible journalists will disseminate what survivors en masse have reported about these horrible crimes committed against them.

By presenting and publishing our results in a field of controversy; by exposing our findings about ritual abuse and its interplay with traumatic mind control, child pornography, clergy abuse, sex trafficking, and other forms of torture to a global community, we trust that the atrocities reported by survey participants will not only be validating to individual survivors but will also become socially validated reality.

In closing, we share some comments made by one of the 95 professionals who work with survivors of extreme abuse who reported on the EAS that they, themselves, are survivors of ritual abuse and mind control. This woman, a highly-respected researcher and clinical psychologist, wrote:

> Tortured by the silence and self-hatred and trying to find some redeeming value in your own life after having your life threatened every moment creates an indefinable terror. Being buried alive with bugs or dead animals and later being rescued by the same torturer who is now your savior. Being brainwashed that you are one of them because you have had to kill an animal to save yourself or a sibling. Wrapped in paper and buried alive to later be thrown in a pond so that you can demonstrate how much you want to live. And, being raped and then forced to deliver and bury your own child when you are but a child is impossible to process. Repeated medical tests and intrusive treatments that the professionals can document but not explain contribute to a complete and utter hopelessness.

Who do you trust and what is real? Then, someone writes about and asks about those same experiences that haunt your life. All those ghosts that have terrorized your life and prevented a connection with another human being are suddenly documented in a survey. To learn that there are others with the same existence is bittersweet. It's something that you've never wished on anyone else, but are relieved to learn that the insanity is not just in your mind.

Unfortunately, the greater the numbers of strangers who have lived this tortured existence, the more validity there is that this atrocity occurs. This, the world needs to know.

Preliminary Results

International Survey for Adult Survivors of Extreme Abuse (EAS)©

(Online: January 1, 2007–March 31, 2007)

This anonymous survey (in both English and German) was conducted privately by Carol Rutz, Thorsten Becker, Bettina Overkamp, Ph.D. and Wanda Karriker, Ph.D. to explore commonalities reported by survivors of Extreme Abuse (EA) including, but not limited to, Ritual Abuse (RA) and Mind Control (MC).

No widely accepted definitions appear in the academic or survivor literature for the terms “ritual abuse,” “mind control,” or “extreme abuse.” The surveyors did not operationally define those terms for the EAS, rather they made the assumption that respondents would define the terms within their own frames of reference.

RA includes, but is not limited to, Satanic Ritual Abuse (SRA).

MC refers to all mind control procedures designed to make a victim follow directives of the programmer without conscious awareness including, but not limited to, government-sponsored mind control experiments (GMC).

RA/MC means Ritual Abuse and/or Mind Control.

The EAS was developed to gather preliminary descriptive data to obtain indications of the nature and extent of extreme abuse like that suffered by RA/MC survivors and to use its findings to give survivors voice, validation, and visibility. This document provides the following data:

- Demographics for total sample and for countries/country groups.
- Self-selected categories of extreme abuse across countries/country groups.
- Frequencies of “Yes” responses for statements in Memories, Possible Aftereffects and Personal Experiences sections for the total sample, for the self-selected categories of abuse, for respondents who reported ritual abuse in a satanic cult and for those who reported that secret government mind control experiments had been performed on them as children.
- Ratings for the effectiveness of 53 healing methods by those who had used the method.
- Rankings of healing methods reported to have been of much help or great help for those who had used the method.

The surveyors encourage:

Survivors to examine the survey responses to compare with their own experiences.

Mental health providers to use the findings in ways that will help their clients overcome the aftereffects of extreme abuse.

Social science researchers to analyze the raw data for significant findings and/or use it for comparisons with other research.

Journalists and other media persons to disseminate what survivors en masse have reported about their experiences of EA.

For further information about the survey and/or to apply for rights to use the raw data for social science research, contact the developers of the EAS at info-english@extreme-abuse-survey.net or info-deutsch@extreme-abuse-survey.net.

Preliminary Data

1471 participants from more than 30 countries answered at least one of the 248 questions on the Extreme Abuse Survey (EAS).

For

Part 1: Memories
Part 2: Possible Aftereffects

Part 3: Personal Experiences respondents were given the opportunity to answer each question either

1. N/A if the meaning was unclear or not applicable
2. Yes
3. Don’t know
4. Know

Numbers and frequencies of “Yes” responses for Parts 1, 2, 3 are listed below:

N	Total who responded to the question
% N	% N who responded “Yes”
n	Number who responded “Yes” to the question
RA	% n who self-selected RA as primary category of abuse
MC	% n who self-selected MC as primary category of abuse
RA & MC	% n who self-selected RA and MC as primary category of abuse
EA	% n who self-selected Other EA as primary category of abuse
NR	% n who did not self-select a primary category of abuse
SRA	% n who reported that they were ritually abused in a satanic cult
GMC	% n who reported that secret government mind control experiments were performed on them as children

Examples:

11% of 419 who reported “aversive hypnosis” as a memory chose RA as their primary category of abuse.

69% of 99 who reported “radiation exposure” reported that secret government mind control experiments were performed on them as children.

CHAPTER 4

Guidelines to Differential Diagnosis between Schizophrenia and Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Ellen P. Lacter and Karl Lehman

Purpose of These Guidelines

The purpose of this chapter is threefold; 1) to identify the problem of misdiagnosis of Schizophrenia in adults with trauma-based disorders originating in ritual abuse and trauma-based mind control (we will refer to these hereon as Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress), 2) to provide diagnosticians unfamiliar with the clinical presentation of Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress with guidelines to facilitate recognition of such cases and to thereby reduce the likelihood of their being misdiagnosed as Schizophrenia, and 3) to provide diagnosticians experienced with Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress with guidelines to facilitate differential diagnosis between such trauma and schizophrenia in cases with complex clinical features and diagnostic questions.

Misdiagnosis results in harmful outcomes for ritual abuse and mind control victims in both the mental health and the legal arena. Harmful treatment decisions based on misdiagnosis include lack of provision of treatment for trauma, incorrect and excessive use of medications, sometimes with severe and irreversible side effects, reinforcement of victims' fears that they are hopelessly crazy and untreatable, long-term hospitalization, and involuntary hospital commitment. Harmful legal outcomes include incorrect findings of insanity, valid reports of abuse being viewed as delusional within law enforcement investigations and judicial proceedings, and forced conservatorship removing victims' basic freedoms.

In order to judge the veracity of victims' reports of these abuses, the clinician must have a basis for understanding what ritual abuse and trauma-based mind control programming are, that they do exist, the kinds of torture endured by victims of these abuses, and familiarity with the most common ritual symbols, artifacts, and holidays utilized by these abuser groups. A general overview of these now follows.

The Existence of Ritual Abuse

The term ritual abuse is often used broadly to include any organized abusive practice that furthers the abuser group's ideology. However, the term is usually restricted to organized physical or sexual assault, often including homicide and severe psychological abuse, within the context of a spiritual practice or belief. Some definitions encompass any spiritual belief. But, most definitions use the term to refer to practices that involve physical and sexual abuse of children and adults, and human sacrifice to propitiate and empower malevolent deities, such as Satan, but also including many polytheistic gods and goddesses.

A substantial body of psychological literature supports that ritualistic abuse is a real phenomenon that must be correctly assessed and treated (Belitz & Schacht, 1992; Bernet & Chang, 1997; Bloom, 1994; Boat, 1991; Boyd, 1991; Brown, 1994; Clark, 1994; Clay, 1996; Coleman, 1994a, 1994b; Comstock, 1991; Comstock & Vickery; Cook, 1991; Coons, 1997; Crabtree, 1993; Cozolino, 1989, 1990; deMause, 1994; Driscoll & Wright, 1991; Edwards, 1991; Ehrensaft, 1992; Faller, 1994; Feldman, 1993; Fine, 1989; Finkelhor, Williams, & Burns, 1988; Fraser, 1990, 1991, 1993a, 1993b, 1997a, 1997b; Friesen, 1991, 1992, 1993; Gallagher, 2001; Golston, 1993; Gonzalez, Waterman, Kelly, McCord, & Oliveri, 1993; Goodman, Quas, Bottoms, Qin, Shaver, Orcutt, & Shapiro, 1997; Goodwin, 1993, 1994; Goodwin, Hill, & Attias, 1990; Gould, 1992, 1995; Gould & Cozolino, 1992; Gould & Graham-Costain, 1994; Gould & Neswald, 1992; Greaves, 1992; Groenendijk & van der Hart, 1995; Hammond, 1992; Harvey, 1993; Hill & Goodwin, 1989; Hornstein, 1991; Hudson, 1990, 1991; Ireland & Ireland, 1994; Johnson, 1994; Jones, 1991; Jonker & Jonker-Bakker, 1991, 1997; Katchen, 1992; Katchen & Sakheim, 1992; Kelley, 1989; King & Yorker, 1996; Kinscherff & Barnum, 1992; Kluft, 1988, 1989a,1989b, 1994, 1995; Lawrence, Cozolino, & Foy, 1995; Leavitt, 1994, 2000a, 2000b; Leavitt & Labott, 1998a, 1998b, 2000; Lockwood, 1993; Lloyd, 1992; Mandell & Schiff, 1993; Mangen, 1992; Mayer, 1991; McCulley, 1994; McFadyen, Hanks, & James, 1993; McFarland & Lockerbie, 1994; MacHovec, 1992; Moriarty, 1991, 1992; Neswald & Gould, 1993; Neswald, Gould, & Graham-Costain, 1991; Noblitt, 1995; Noblitt & Perskin, 2000; Nurcombe & Unutzer, 1991; Oksana, 1994, 2001; Paley, 1992; Pulling & Cawthorn,1989; Raschke, 1990; Rockwell, 1994, 1995; Rose, 1996; Ross, 1995; Ryder, 1992; Ryder and Noland, 1992; Sachs, 1990; Sakheim, 1996; Sakheim & Devine, 1992b; Scott, 2001; Sinason, 1994; Smith, C. 1998; Smith, M. 1993;

The publishing arm of the American Psychiatric Association, the American Psychiatric Press, published a text in 1997 explaining the importance of correct assessment and treatment of victims of ritualistic abuse (The Dilemma of Ritual Abuse: Cautions and Guides for Therapists, edited by Fraser). One national survey of 2709 clinical psychologists found that 30% claimed to have seen at least one case of "ritualistic or religion-based abuse" and 93% of these psychologists believed the harm actually occurred (Goodman, Qin, Bottoms, & Shaver, 1994).

A review of the empirical evidence of ritual abuse is included in a book by Noblitt and Perskin (Cult and Ritual Abuse, 2000, Chapter 6). Noblitt and Perskin (2000) propose that "Cult and Ritual Trauma Disorder" be added as a new diagnosis to the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM). Inclusion of this diagnosis in the upcoming DSM would facilitate proper diagnosis and treatment of individuals with Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress, and would reduce misdiagnosis of these individuals as having Schizophrenia and other psychotic or delusional disorders.

Trauma-Based Mind Control Programming

Organizations with a wide range of political and criminal agendas have historically relied on coercive interrogation and brainwashing of various types to force submission and information from enemies and victims, and to indoctrinate and increase cooperation in members and captives. In modern times, these techniques are used by political/military/espionage organizations, race/ethnic hate-groups, criminal groups (e.g., child pornographers and sex rings, and international traffickers of women, children, guns, and drugs) and exploitative and destructive cults with spiritual or other agendas. Methods of "thought reform" used by such groups include intimidation, social isolation, religious indoctrination, threats against victims or their loved ones, torture, torture of co-captives, and brainwashing through social influence or deprivation of basic needs, such as sleep or food (see Releasing the Bonds: Empowering People to Think for Themselves (2000) by Steven Hassan).

Trauma-based mind control programming is a term generally used for thought reform that goes beyond the above-described overt torture, intimidation, and brainwashing of the conscious mind, to covert installation of information in the unconscious mind through sophisticated, often technological, Machiavellian means. Mental health and law enforcement professionals working with severe trauma are increasingly seeing victims of such torture (Boyd, 1991; Coleman, 1994b; Hersha, Hersha, Griffis, & Schwarz, 2001; Katchen & Sakheim, 1992; Keith, 1998; Marks, 1979; Neswald & Gould, 1993; Neswald et al., 1991; Noblitt & Perskin, 2000; Oksana, 2001; Ross, 2000; Rutz, 2001; Ryder, 1992; Sheflin & Opton, 1978; Smith, 1993; Weinstein, 1990), and evidence has begun to surface in the legal arena (e.g., Orlikow v. U.S., 682 F.S. 77 (D.D.C. 1988).

Trauma-based mind control programming can be defined as systematic torture that blocks the victim's capacity for conscious processing (through pain, terror, drugs, illusion, sensory deprivation, sensory over-stimulation, oxygen deprivation, cold, heat, spinning, brain stimulation, and often, near-death), and then employs suggestion and/or classical and operant conditioning (consistent with well-established behavioral modification principles) to implant thoughts, directives, and perceptions in the unconscious mind, often in newly-formed trauma-induced dissociated identities that force the victim to do, feel, think, or perceive things for the purposes of the programmer. The objective is for the victim to follow directives with no conscious awareness, including execution of acts in clear violation of the victim's volition, moral principles, and spiritual convictions.

One common function of trauma-based mind control programming is to cause the victim to physically and psychologically re-experience the torture used to install the programming should the victim consider violating its directives. The most common programs are unidimensional directives communicated during torture and impaired states of consciousness to, "Remember to forget" the abuse, and "Don't tell" about the abuse. Similar to this are pronouncements; claims, curses, covenants, etc., paired with abuse, that convince personalities they are controlled by evil entities, or forever malevolently defined as evil, physically or mentally ill, socially devalued and isolated, sexually enslaved, a murderer, a willing cult member, a coven member, etc.

Much trauma-based mind control programming is significantly more complex, more technological in its methods of installation, and utilizes the individual's dissociated identities (personalities) to effect greater layering of psychological effects. Personalities are usually programmed to take executive control of the body in response to particular cues (hand signals, tones, etc.), and then follow directives, with complete amnesia for these events. Personalities are programmed to become flooded with anxiety or feel acutely suicidal if they defy program directives.

Personalities are often programmed to believe that explosives have been surgically implanted in their bodies and that these will detonate if the individual violates orders or begins to recall the programming, the torture used to install it, or the identities of the programmers.

In highly sophisticated mind control, the individual is programmed to perceive inanimate structures in the unconscious inner landscape. “Structures” are mental representations of objects, e.g., buildings, grids, devices of torture, and other containers, that “hold” programmed commands, messages, information, and personalities. In many cases, walls are also installed that serve as barriers to hide deeper levels of programming and structures. Dissociated personalities perceive themselves as trapped within, or attached to, these structures, both visually (in internal imagery), and somatically (in experiences of pain, suffocation, electroshock, etc.).

Structures are mentally installed in early childhood, generally between two and five years of age. Torture, drugs, and even near death, are used in a variety of ways that make it extremely difficult for the child to mentally resist any of the programmer’s input, and to ensure that memories of programming sessions remain dissociated. The child may be tortured on a device, and the personalities formed in this process then perceive themselves trapped on these devices. Or an image of an object may be projected on the child’s body or on a screen, or in virtual reality goggles, or a physical model of the object is shown. The programmer then tells the child that this object is now within him or her. Because the child is in an altered, disoriented state, and because the mind of the small child does not easily discriminate reality and fantasy (this process relies on the pre-school child’s use of magical thinking), the child now perceives the object as a structure within. Then, a code is installed for the programmer to gain future access to the structure, to erase it, or to input new information.

Immediately after the structure is installed, the programmer will generally command traumatized personalities to go to places in the structures, e.g., “Go inside the grid.” The programmer will generally also mentally install the perception of wires, bombs, and re-set buttons to prevent removal of the structure. The child is usually shown something to make him or her perceive these as real, e.g., a button on the belly-button.

Kinds of Torture Endured in Ritual Abuse and Trauma-Based Mind Control

Knowledge of the methods of torture used within ritual abuse and trauma-based mind control provides a basis for recognition of related trauma disorders.

Individuals subjected to these forms of torture may experience intense fear, phobic reactions, or physiological symptoms in response to associated stimuli. In some cases, the individual, or particular dissociated identities, experience a preoccupation with, or attraction to, related stimuli.

Victims may be able to describe the torture they have endured, or they may fear doing so. In many cases of ritual abuse and mind control trauma, the abuse remains dissociated when the individual first seeks treatment. Typically, the initial presenting problems are symptoms of anxiety, depression, or trauma derived from childhood sexual abuse, usually by a family member who is eventually understood as a participant in the abuser group.

The following is a partial list of these forms of torture:

Sexual abuse and torture.

Confinement in boxes, cages, coffins, etc., or burial (often with an opening or air-tube for oxygen).

Restraint; with ropes, chains, cuffs, etc.

Near-drowning.

Extremes of heat and cold, including submersion in ice water, burning chemicals, and being held over fire.

Skinning for sacrifice or for torture. Pain-inducing drugs, chemicals, and/or adhesive tape can create an illusion of being skinned without permanent injury or scars.

Spinning.

Blinding or flashing light.

Electric shock.

Forced ingestion of offensive body fluids and matter, such as blood, urine, feces, flesh, etc.

Being hung upside down or in painful positions.

Hunger and thirst.

Sleep deprivation.

Compression with weights and devices.

Sensory deprivation.

Changes in atmospheric pressure (for example, using rapid pressure changes in a hyperbaric chamber to produce the “bends” and intense ear pain).

Drugs to create illusion, confusion, and amnesia, often given by injection or intravenously.

Oral or intravenous delivery of toxic chemicals to create pain or illness, including chemotherapy agents.

Limbs pulled or dislocated.

Application of snakes, spiders, maggots, rats, and other animals to induce fear and disgust.

Near-death experiences; such as by drowning or suffocation with immediate resuscitation.

Forced to perform or witness abuse, torture and sacrifice of people and animals, usually with knives.

Forced participation in child pornography and prostitution.

Raped to become pregnant; the fetus is then aborted for ritual use, or the baby is taken for sacrifice or enslavement.

Spiritual abuse to cause victims to feel possessed, harassed, and controlled internally by spirits or demons.

Desecration of Judeo-Christian beliefs and forms of worship; e.g., dedication to Satan or other deities.

Abuse and illusion to convince victims that God is evil, such as convincing a child that God has raped her.

Surgery to torture, experiment, or cause the perception of physical or spiritual bombs or “implants.”

Harm or threats of harm to family, friends, loved ones, pets, and other victims, to force compliance.

Use of illusion and virtual reality to confuse and create non-credible disclosure.

To illustrate, ritual abuse survivors may experience intense phobic reactions to spiders or maggots (item 20). They may fear water and baths (items 4 and 5). They often fear hypodermic needles (item 18). They become easily too cold, too hot (item 5), or thirsty (item 12). They may have aversive reactions to cameras (item 23). They may become upset upon seeing babies, dolls, or particular animals, or they may strongly identify with abused and abandoned animals and children (items 22, 24, and 29). Sexual aversions are common (items 1, 23, and 24), as is vulnerability to repeated sexual victimization. Sexual compulsions and paraphilias, such as sadism, can also occur (Young et al., 1991).

Food aversions and eating disorders are common. Ritual abuse survivors may not be able to eat food that is brown or red because these remind them of feces and blood. They are often repulsed by meat, are vegetarian, or fast excessively, or regurgitate food, derived from forced ingestion of body matter and fluids (item 10).

Ritual abuse survivors, by and large, believe in the presence and power of spiritually evil forces, and often feel personally plagued by these (items 25, 26, 27, and 28). They may experience anxiety or an aversion to God and religion (items 26 and 27), or may alternatively be devout in their spiritual beliefs and practices.

Art productions, creative writing, and sand-trays will often reflect their torture; including knives, religious symbols, frightening figures, coffins, burials, etc. Children unconsciously re-enact elements of torture they have witnessed or experienced with toys and other objects. For example, a three-year-old boy wrapped a rope three times around his neck and pulled upward, as if to hang himself. A three-year-old girl sang about marrying Satan.

External or internal reminders of torture-related stimuli often precipitate dissociative responses, such as entering a trance state, falling asleep, or another personality taking executive control of the individual. Torture-associated stimuli may also elicit disturbing impulses to re-enact unprocessed trauma, such as impulses to self-mutilate, or stab or sexually assault another person.

Somatoform and conversion reactions occur frequently in response to ritual abuse and mind control trauma-reminders. Individuals often experience localized pain, especially genitourinary, musculoskeletal, and gastrointestinal, motor inhibitions, nausea, or even swelling in the affected area, prior to retrieval of any visual or narrative memory of the related torture. These are generally very distressing to the affected individual. Once the trauma is re-associated and processed within the context of psychotherapy or other forms of support, these somatoform and conversion reactions usually dissipate.

Survivors of trauma-based mind control often respond with distress to fluorescent lighting, since so much programming utilizes intense lighting (item 8). They may startle in response to a telephone ringing, related to programming to receive or make calls to abusers. They may believe they have microphones inside their heads that will relay their disclosures to their abusers (item 28). Fears of electronic or spiritual surveillance, and threats to loved ones (item 29), inhibit their ability to defy and escape their abusers or to disclose their abuse.

Victims of trauma-based mind control also usually experience intense or odd reactions to benign stimuli that were used in their programming. For example, they may have been programmed to “remember to forget” every time they see an apple, or to remember they are being watched every time they hear a police or fire siren. Similarly, they may make repetitive, robotic statements that do not make sense in the context of dialogue, e.g., “I want to go home,” a common programmed statement intended to keep victims obedient to abuser groups and reporting to their abusers. Specific songs may be compulsively sung for similar programmed purposes.

All of these symptoms can occur prior to the individual having any conscious knowledge of the related abuse. This point is critical. Dissociative and neurobiological responses to overwhelming trauma (van der Kolk, McFarlane, & Weisaeth, 1996) often prevent these experiences from being processed into a coherent narrative memory. The diagnostician cannot rely on the patient to “put the pieces together” of their clinical picture.

Finally, generalized guilt and survivor guilt are strongly associated with ritual abuse, since participation in victimization of others is a mainstay of ritual abuse and mind control torture (items 22 and 29).

For more on recognition of symptoms specific to ritual abuse trauma, see Boyd 1991; Coleman 1994a; Gould 1992; Hudson 1991; Mangen 1992; Oksana 2001; Pulling and Cawthorn, 1989; Ross 1995; Ryder 1992; Young 1992; and Young and Young 1997.

Ritual Symbols, Artifacts, and Holidays Utilized by Groups Practicing Ritual Abuse

Practitioners of ritual abuse observe holidays and employ symbols and artifacts particular to their spiritual practices and beliefs. Victims may describe these, draw them, or be preoccupied with them. Commonly, victims experience increased distress as these dates approach and in relation to these symbols and artifacts. Recognition of ritual symbols, artifacts, and holidays alert the clinician to possible victimization in affected individuals.

Ritual holidays vary between groups, but some of the most common of these include victims’ birthdays, many Christian holidays (often in opposition to Christian doctrine and practice), All Hallows Eve through Samhain (October 29 through November 4), Candlemas (February 2), Beltane (May 1, and 10 days prior in preparation), Lammas (August 2), the vernal and autumnal equinoxes (March 21 and September 21), the summer and winter solstices (June 21 and December 21), full moons, new moons, and “Marriage to the Beast” in some practitioners of Satanism (September 5 to 7). Extreme distress, increased self-mutilation, suicidality, and hospitalizations in relation to ritual holidays are a strong indicator of ritual trauma (Ross, 1995).

Symbols and artifacts also vary, but commonly-reported ones include the five-pointed star within a circle (inverted in Satanism, upright in abusive witchcraft), the six-pointed star, the inverted Christian cross, the symmetrical cross in a circle, the letter “A” within a circle (the cross of the “A” extends beyond the circle), the Swastika within a circle (also utilized by Nazi-agenda groups), the circle, the triangle (upright or inverted), the Ankh, the infinity sign, lightening bolts, the Nero cross (peace symbol), the “all-seeing eye” in a triangle atop a pyramid (as on the United States dollar bill), altars upon which people are physically or sexually abused or sacrificed, black candles (often associated with sacrifice), white candles, other-colored candles, chalices, robes (often black, sometimes white and other colors), masks, swords and knives, snakes, spiders, the head of the goat, red (blood), black (death), brown (feces), and fixation on particular numbers (often, 6, 7, 8, 9, or 13).

The above-described holidays, symbols, and ritual artifacts are generally not associated with victimization by political/military/espionage, race/ethnic hatred, or criminal groups (except the Swastika), unless they have a concurrent spiritual agenda. More detailed information on common ritual symbols, artifacts and holidays utilized by groups with malevolent spiritual agendas are available in published accounts. (See Boyd, 1991; Coleman, 1994b; Edwards, 1991; Katchen & Sakheim,1992; Pulling & Cawthon, 1989 (good illustrations); Ross, 1995; Ryder, 1992 (good illustrations); Oksana, 2001).

Primary Psychiatric Diagnoses for Individuals with Ritual Abuse and/or Mind Control

Trauma

Using present diagnostic criteria, individuals with ritual abuse and/or mind control trauma generally hold a primary diagnosis of Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), Disorders of Extreme Stress-Not Otherwise Specified (DESNOS), or a Dissociative Disorder, most commonly Dissociative Identity Disorder (DID). Secondary diagnoses often include other Anxiety Disorders (especially Panic Disorder and Phobias), Mood Disorders, Eating Disorders, Sleep Disorders, Personality Disorders, Substance Abuse Disorders, Sexual Dysfunctions, Somatoform Disorders, Pain Disorders, Conversion Disorders, and stress-related physical diseases. The first step in accurate differential diagnosis from Schizophrenia is good working knowledge of the three primary diagnoses.

The reader is already likely familiar with the diagnostic criteria for PTSD. Briefly, these include three clusters of symptoms in response to having been exposed to a traumatic event. The first is persistent re-experiencing of the trauma in intrusive distressing recollections, recurrent distressing dreams, and the experience of the trauma re-occurring, as in re-living the experience, illusions, hallucinations, and dissociative flashback episodes, and intense psychological distress or physiological reactivity at exposure to internal or external cues associated with the trauma. The second is persistent avoidance of stimuli associated with the trauma, including the inability to recall an important aspect of the trauma, numbing of general responsiveness, and restricted range of affect. The third is persistent symptoms of increased arousal, including difficulty falling or staying asleep, irritability or outbursts of anger, difficulty concentrating, hypervigilance, and an exaggerated startle response.

Disorders of Extreme Stress-Not Otherwise Specified (DESNOS) is a relatively recent diagnostic formulation not included in the DSM-IV (American Psychiatric Association, 1994), which perhaps better captures the symptom picture of ritual abuse and/or mind control trauma survivors. These disorders are explained in depth on the World Wide Web. (See Luxenberg, T., Spinazzola, J., &. van der Kolk, B. (2001), Complex Trauma and Disorders of Extreme Stress (DESNOS) Diagnosis, Part One: Assessment, Directions in Psychiatry (21); Luxenberg, T., Spinazzola, J., Hidalgo, J., Hunt, C., &. van der Kolk, B. (2001), Complex Trauma and Disorders of Extreme Stress (DESNOS) Diagnosis, Part Two: Treatment, Directions in Psychiatry (21), see http://www.traumacenter.org/DESNOS.pdf).

The diagnostic criteria for DESNOS include six categories, as follows: 1) Alteration in regulation of affect and impulses, 2) Alterations in attention or consciousness (dissociative symptoms), 3) Alterations in self-perception (negative, trauma-related self-representations), 4) Alterations in relations with others (inability to trust, revictimization, or victimizing others), 5) Somatization, and 6) Alterations in systems of meaning (despair and hopelessness or loss of previously sustaining beliefs).

Dissociative disorders bear a bit more explanation, since these are generally the least recognized and understood, and because they are so strongly associated with Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress.

The DSM-IV Defensive Functioning Scale defines dissociation as follows: “The individual deals with emotional conflict or internal or external stressors with a breakdown in the usually integrated functions of consciousness, memory, perception of self or the environment, or sensory/motor behavior” (American Psychiatric Association, 1994, p. 755). Dissociation has become understood as a common response to trauma. Dissociative responses are generally believed to first arise during traumatic experiences and to be fortified by intrusive and chronic re-experiencing of these experiences. Common dissociative responses include self-induced trance states, numbing of psychological pain, bodily self-anesthesia, partial or full amnesia for abuse, depersonalization (feeling detached from oneself, as if in a dream), out-of-body experiences (the experience of observing one's self from without), and derealization (experiencing others or the world as less than real) (Briere, 1992; Ellenson, 1986; Hartman & Burgess, 1993; van der Kolk et al., 1996).

Dissociative responses also include many somatoform symptoms (Ross, 1997), such as transient or enduring numbness, insensitivity to pain, psychogenic stiffness or paralysis, genitourinary pain, gastrointestinal pain, musculoskeletal pain, pain on skin surfaces, disturbed smell or taste, psychogenic non-epileptic seizures, and impaired ability to see, hear, or speak. A body of research by Nijenhuis (2000) and colleagues argues convincingly that conversion and some somatization disorders are so intrinsic to dissociative disorders that they should be re-classified in the DSM as such. Nijenhuis has developed a scale to measure these, the Somatoform Dissociation Questionnaire (SDQ-20). An excellent book on the effects of trauma on health, injury, and disease is Robert Scaer's The Body Bears the Burden: Trauma, Dissociation, and Disease (2001).

Attention to somatoform dissociative symptoms holds particular importance for assessment of Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress. Somatoform dissociative symptoms have been found to be associated with severity of reported childhood trauma involving physical contact or injury (Waller, et al. 2000). Since victims of ritual abuse and mind control have experienced extreme pain and torture, this may explain the great frequency of somatoform symptoms in this population (Oksana, 2001; Ryder, 1992). A study utilizing the SDQ-20 significantly differentiated Schizophrenia and Dissociative Disorders (Sar, Kundakci, Kiziltan, Bakim, & Bozkurt, 2000). Patients with dissociative disorders scored about twice that of patients with Schizophrenia. Thus, severity of somatoform symptoms may help differentiate patients with Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress from patients who should be diagnosed with Schizophrenia.

The most severe form of dissociative disorder is Dissociative Identity Disorder (DID). The DSM-IV defines its essential feature as "the presence of two or more distinct identities or personality states that recurrently take control of behavior" (p. 484). Van der Kolk et al. (1996) describe such identities as "distinct ego states that contain the traumatic experience, consisting of complex identities with distinct cognitive, affective, and behavioral patterns" (p. 307). DID is associated with chronic, intense, and early abuse, often involving a combination of physical, sexual, and emotional abuse, and frequently including experiences of profound neglect, family violence, and a generally chaotic home environment (Chu, Frey, Ganzel, & Matthews, 1999; Draijer & Langeland, 1999; Ogawa, Sroufe, Weinfield, Carlson, & Egeland, 1997; Putnam, 1997; Pynoos, Steinberg, & Goenjian,1996; Ross, 1995; Van der Kolk et al., 1996). Research suggests that its prevalence in the general population is at least 1% and closer to 5% in samples of psychiatric patients (Ross, 1997).

Symptoms of DID include: 1) rapid personality changes, e.g., timid to aggressive, regressed to mature, female to male, 2) references to oneself in the third person, 3) reports of voices, primarily inside the head, 4) marked changes in appearance, skills, preferences, knowledge, memory, and physical complaints, 5) significant loss of time, and, 6) in children, reports that an animal or evil entity made them behave aggressively/destructively. In young children, personalities are often in a process of formation rather than fixed, thus the proposed diagnoses of "Incipient" DID (Fagan & McMahon, 1984) and "Dissociative Disorder of Childhood" (Peterson, 1996).

In ritual abuse and mind control trauma, a few personalities generally form in response to severe, early abuse, often in infancy. Personalities continue to branch off of these in response to ongoing trauma. Not uncommonly, these individuals have hundreds of personalities, receiving the diagnosis of Complex DID.

Adult survivors and child victims of ritual abuse and mind control often withhold dissociative experiences unless the subject is directly explored by the clinician. Many dissociative symptoms may be difficult for individuals to describe because they involve "negative" rather than "positive" experiences, such as, 1) amnesia, 2) emotional numbing, and 3) loss of self-awareness, time, or physical sensation. In DID, the host personality ("The personality that has executive control of the body for the greatest percentage of the time during a given time period," Braun, 1986) may not report the presence of other personalities because the host fears them, is ashamed of them, wishes to deny their presence, or is not conscious of their existence (though internal personalities are usually aware of the host). In many cases, the individual withholds this information from the diagnostician for fear of not being believed or of being labeled "crazy," psychotic, or Schizophrenic, a very common diagnostic error (Bliss, 1980; Kluft, 1987; Ross, 1997). However, survivors are more likely to reveal dissociative symptoms and related traumatic experiences to clinicians who demonstrate an understanding of dissociation, are respectful, and do not invalidate their experiences.

Psychological Tests in the Assessment of Ritual Abuse and/or Mind Control Trauma

The purpose of this chapter is to provide guidelines for differential diagnosis within the context of the diagnostic interview and ongoing therapy rather than psychological testing. Yet, the literature on psychological testing with victims of ritual abuse, and a substantial body of research on psychological testing of DID and other dissociative disorders, inform our clinical understanding in ways that generalize to the clinical interview. These are conceptually incorporated in our differential diagnosis chart below. In complex cases in which diagnosis remains uncertain, psychological testing is indicated and the findings summarized herein can inform that process.

A review of the literature yielded few scholarly works specific to psychological testing of adult victims of ritual abuse. The most notable are by Mangen (1992), Noblitt (1995), and Leavitt and Labott (1998a, 2000).

Noblitt (1995) found that patients reporting ritual abuse had significantly higher scores than other psychiatric patients on two Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (MMPI) scales designed to measure Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). They had a mean of 86.3 on the PK scale, (PTSD by Keane: Keane, Malloy & Fairbank, 1984) and a mean of 85.8 on the PS scale, (PTSD by Schlenger: Schlenger & Kulka, 1989). Patients not reporting ritual abuse had a mean PK score of 58.3 and a mean PS score of 58.7. For patients reporting ritual abuse, 91% of them had scores in the clinically significant range (above 65) on at least one of these two scales. Both scales were developed based on research comparing MMPIs of Vietnam veterans with Post-traumatic Stress Disorder to other psychiatric patients.

Leavitt and Labott (2000) compared Rorschach results of three groups of patients; 1) patients reporting child sexual abuse within Satanic cults; 2) patients reporting child sexual abuse without ritual abuse; and 3) non-abused patients. The first two groups had histories of amnesia for their sexual trauma, memory recovery after the age of 18 years, and an absence of psychotic or neurologic symptoms. Groups were compared for frequency of 41 Rorschach content responses related to Satanic ritual abuse, selected by four experts in ritual trauma. The group of patients reporting abuse within Satanic cults gave significantly more Rorschach responses with Satanic content. The following specific percepts significantly differentiated the groups: robe, mask, body mutilated, babies damaged, ritual ceremony, threatening eyes, blood everywhere, special knife, goat reference, bondage, torture, sacrifice, hooded figure, altar, blood rituals, and circle. A second study revealed that these results were unrelated to patients' degrees of media and hospital milieu exposure to the subject of Satanic ritual abuse. In fact, less media exposure was associated with production of more Satanic content in patients reporting ritual abuse, evidence that reports of ritual abuse are not primarily the product of exposure contagion.

In an earlier study, Leavitt and Labott (1998a) found that patients reporting Satanic ritual abuse provided more Satanic-content responses in a word association test than patients reporting non-ritual sexual abuse. They also provided fewer normative responses, understandable given the pervasive nature of ritual trauma and the paucity of normal childhood experience for so many of these victims.

Mangen (1992) performed approximately 25 psychological evaluations with patients already identified as having been victimized within Satanic cults, including the Wechsler Adult Intelligence Scale-Revised (WAIS-R), Rorschach, Thematic Apperception Test (TAT) or other story-telling test, human figure drawings, and more.

Mangen found that the "testing" situation itself often induced great fear in these patients, related to the frequent "tests" of abilities within ritual abuse. Test stimuli, even benign or familiar stimuli, often acted as trauma reminders and precipitated trauma reactions and dissociative "switching" of personalities. He observed that "many responses given by these patients sound blatantly psychotic" (p. 154), but closer scrutiny revealed that these were derived from the ritual abuse and the traumatized level of functioning. He explains the importance of understanding ritual abuse practices, symbols, holidays, etc., as emphasized above.

Mangen found these individuals were of at least average intelligence. However, signs of cognitive slippage and inefficiency occurred as trauma impinged on thought processes. Idiosyncratic, personalized, and even bizarre responses to test stimuli were common. For example, patients often provided disorganized responses to intelligence tests involving numbers, and in particular, having to repeat series of numbers backwards, since numbers and reversal of numbers and letters are common in ritual practices and programming. Mangen noted that words often lost their meaning as symbols, and were perceived as dangerous in themselves, related to abusers communicating deadly messages with words, and punishment by abusers for incorrect verbal responses. Visual images also disorganized thought processes. E.g., one woman froze when given puzzle pieces of a human figure to assemble. When asked what had happened, she "switched" into a young personality who explained that she had participated in rituals involving people being cut into pieces, but had never been told to try to put the people back together.

Mangen emphasized that such disorganized episodes are frequent, but exist side-by-side with trauma-free spheres of cognitive functioning. He suggests that the traumatized thought processes are state-dependent, and that these patients readily enter states of traumatized functioning.

Mangen's Rorschach observations are especially revealing. Patients tended to provide images that were perceptually accurate (good form); i.e., they were largely consistent with shapes in the inkblot. In contrast, patients with Schizophrenia often have poor perceptual accuracy (poor form) on the Rorschach, a sign of more impaired perceptual and thought processes.

Though form was generally adequate, associations to the blots were replete with traumatic imagery. E.g., a perception of a person might fit the blot, but the associations might include themes of cutting and murdering babies, eating flesh, evil, etc., additions that would appear bizarre if not for the ritual trauma. Such trauma-driven associations might be made with flat affect or flooded affect. In some cases, perceptual distortions (poor form) were more central, but even these were often resolved in light of the abuse. For example, one patient perceived a person with women's breasts and a penis, an incongruous combination (INCOM) that might indicate psychosis, if not for the fact that some sexual rituals involve people costumed to appear bi-gender. Yellow was perceived by another patient as angry and as urine "poured all over me." This response becomes understandable if the clinician knows that abusers often urinate on the victim, in some cases with the intent to dominate the spirit of the victim with their own spirits.

Mangen explains that drawings also contain elements that would appear bizarre without an understanding of the underlying trauma. For example, trees may contain eyes, hidden people, and blood dripping from severed limbs. Moore (1994) notes that in human figure drawings of ritual abuse victims, arms often abruptly end, appear torn off or jagged, or have unusual endings unlike hands. Ritual acts, symbols, candles, pentagrams, inverted crosses, robes, dripping blood, etc., may be graphically represented, particularly if the abuse is conscious. Cohen and Cox (1995) include a series of drawings depicting the unfolding of memories of an adult woman ritually abused as a child, replete with graphic memories of abusive rituals, ritual artifacts, her terror, phallic symbols of sexual abuse, and dissociative responses, such as multiple self-representations in one drawing, and changes in developmental level across drawings in relation to the age of the personality making the picture.

Mangen reports that ritual abuse victims demonstrate a damaged experience of self on projective tests such as the Rorschach and TAT. Responses demonstrate a lack of self-agency, that is, a sense of lack of control over one's life and actions. Figures are often perceived as helpless or passive. Body integrity is often impaired; figures are seen as broken, devoured, harmed, etc. Self affect is inconsistent and incongruent. For example, a figure may be described as frightened and laughing, evil and good, etc. Dissociative processes are evident in illogical shifts and transpositions. TAT stories include confusion in regard to time, states of waking and sleeping, life and death, here and not here, and sudden changes in what characters know, think, and want.

TAT stories reflect interpersonal estrangement and malevolence. Themes of caring and kindness tend to be fleeting. Themes of deception and betrayal are common; “things are not what they seem.” Kind adults turn threatening. Child figures may feign compliance, but are described as actually pretending or escaping in their minds (dissociating). Responses are consistent with the devastating and pervasive abuse these victims have experienced, so often including immediate family members.

Affect dysregulation and emotional intensity pervade test responses. Primitive violent imagery related to ritual trauma is common in Rorschach responses and TAT stories. There is a paucity of positively tinged affective experiences, such as love and hope. Terror and despair dominate. Fear of annihilation and abandonment are more common than fear of loss of love. Some responses may reflect identification with aggressors.

Dissociative responses are observed throughout the evaluation process. Blocking of affect may occur as trauma is described. Overwhelming stimuli can precipitate switching of personalities. There may be obvious changes in vocal presentation and general demeanor. Personalities may identify themselves by name. They may relay accounts of horrible abuse unknown to the host and the host may return with complete amnesia for the event. Or dissociative episodes may be more subtle, and not distinguished unless the evaluator looks for amnestic gaps, such as the repetition of test questions later in the evaluation process to determine if prior responses are recalled.

Mangen explains that the patient may not be able to reveal the “secret” of the abuse and that personalities who identify with the cult experience tend not to present themselves. Thus the clinician must work with the patient to “help make the invisible visible” (p. 155). However, he states that much more research is needed on the use of psychological testing in identifying severe trauma, dissociation, and in particular ritual trauma, to help clinicians to recognize patients who are still preserving the “secret” and not yet revealing their ritual abuse.

Since 1989, a number of assessment and screening tools have been proven very useful in discovering dissociative symptomatology. These tools can play a critical role in differentiating Dissociative Disorders from Schizophrenia (Steinberg, Cicchetti, Buchanan, Rakfeldt & Rounsaville, 1994; Welburn, Fraser, Jordan, Cameron, Webb, & Raine, 2003), thereby making an important contribution to differential diagnosis of Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress from Schizophrenia. Administration and scoring are simple, not requiring specialized training in psychological testing. These include:

The Dissociative Experiences Scale (DES), a 28-item self-report measure (Carlson & Putnam, 1993; Carlson, Putnam, Ross, Torem, Coons, Dill, Loewenstein, & Braun, 1993).

The Dissociative Disorders Interview Schedule DSM-IV Version (DDIS), a highly structured interview administered in 30 to 45 minutes (Ross, 1989; Ross, 1997).

The Dissociation Questionnaire (DIS-Q) (Vanderlinden, Van Dyck, Vandereycken, & Vertommen, 1991).

Questionnaire of Experiences of Dissociation (QED) (Riley, 1988).

Structured Clinical Interview for DSM-IV Dissociative Disorders (SCID-D-R) (Steinberg, 1996).

S*tructured Interview of Disorders of Extreme Stress* (SIDES) (Pelcovitz, van der Kolk, Roth, Mandel, Kaplan, & Resicket, 1997). This tool for assessing extreme traumatic stress includes a subscale, "Alterations in Attention or Consciousness," which has sub-categories of amnesia, dissociative episodes, depersonalization.

Somatoform Dissociation Questionnaire (SDQ-20), (Nijenhuis, 2000).

Adolescent Dissociative Experiences Scale-II (A-DES) (Armstrong, Putnam, Carlson, Libero, & Smith, 1997).

Differential diagnosis of children with ritual trauma is beyond the scope of this paper. However, three widely-used scales that screen for dissociative disorders are included for reference:

Children's Perceptual Alteration Scale (Evers-Szostak & Sanders 1992).

Child Dissociative Checklist (Putnam, Helmers, & Trickett,1993;Version 3).

Child Dissociation Problem Checklist (Peterson, 1991).

A substantial body of research has identified a number of Rorschach indicators that differentiate DID and other dissociative disorders from other mental disorders (Armstrong, 1991; Danesino, Daniels, & McLaughlin, 1979; Labott, Leavitt, Braun, & Sachs, 1992; Labott & Wallach, 2002; Leavitt & Labott, 1998b; Lovitt & Lefkoff, 1985; Scroppo, Drob, Weinberger, & Eagle, 1998; Silberg, 1998; Wagner, Allison, & Wagner, 1983; Wagner & Heise, 1974; Young, Wagner, & Finn, 1994).

Not surprisingly, individuals with DID produce more traumatized content than many other populations, including perceptions of blood, anatomy, and morbidity (images of things that are damaged, diseased, mutilated, dead, etc.), and assault or pursuit, consistent with their history of severe trauma and intense somatic concerns. Traumatic imagery in the blots can precipitate intense anxiety, flashbacks, autohypnotic trance states, or a change in personality. Silberg (1998) found that dissociative children and adolescents perceived in a battery of tests (including the Rorschach) produced more images of torture, mutilation, and malevolent religiosity (sacrificial ceremonies, devils, etc.) than other patients. Some reported that symbols of Satan or devils had been used to terrorize them.

Patients with DID have an elevated number of responses depicting fragmentation, that is, the perception of objects as divided, torn, cut, broken, or split, paralleling their lack of integration of consciousness and a sense of damaged body integrity. They tend to form highly atypical images (high Xu and low X+% in the Exner (1978) system), indicating a tendency to see the world in an unconventional manner. They tend to see incompatible relationships in the blots, such as inappropriate condensation of images into single objects (INCOM) and implausible relationships between objects (FABCOM). These findings derive, in part, from dissociation and their heightened imaginative capacity, and can appear like Rorschach responses of Schizophrenia in their divergence from conventionality and reality.

However, patients with DID tend to see few severely distorted responses (X-) and more whole and real objects than part and imaginary objects, in contrast to patients with Schizophrenia. They also tend to have at least one human movement response with unusually well-articulated form (M+), an indicator of normal psychological development that is atypical of psychotic subjects. They also tended to have a very large number of responses involving the perception of depth, distance, or dimensionality (high FD), which is associated with a good capacity for intellectual self-observation and introspection (Armstrong & Loewenstein, 1990). This also corresponds with derealization experiences in which things appear far away, distorted, or unreal.

DID patients have some tendency to respond to color more than form in color responses (total CF and C responses is greater than total FC responses), including color responses of both positive (e.g., a flower) and negative (e.g., blood) connotations (Wagner et al., 1983, 1994). Color dominating form is related to weak regulation of affect and behavior, also consistent with severe trauma and subsequent dysfunctionality.

DID patients have a large number of responses involving the perception of movement (e.g., a bird flying, a woman sewing). This is associated with heightened imaginative capacity and is consistent with the capacity of individuals with DID to dissociate (self-induced trance, retreat into their inner world, switching to other personalities) to mentally escape trauma. Dissociative children and adolescents have also been found to be fantasy-prone, relying more than other patients on dissociative coping mechanisms such as pretending, forgetting, wishing, sleeping, extreme dichotomization of things, and mental magical transformations (e.g., evil becomes good, dead become alive) (Rhue, Lynn, & Sandberg, 1995; Silberg, 1998).

These Rorschach indicators have relevance for diagnostic interviews with victims of ritual abuse and mind control since most of these victims are highly dissociative. The clinician should expect intrusive traumatic images and fears to impinge on thought processes and to generate dissociative responses. Identity and self-expression are likely to be incohesive. The environment may be perceived and described unconventionally. Moderate dysfunction in regulation of behavior and affect can be expected. These effects are likely to be magnified in ritual abuse and mind control trauma since the abuse is so extensive, and often begins in infancy or early childhood.

Sources of Misdiagnosis of Schizophrenia in Cases of Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Symptoms of PTSD, DESNOS, and Dissociative Disorders often present as similar to symptoms of Schizophrenia. Hallucinations, delusions, and thought disorders, long believed to be the hallmark of Schizophrenia, are now being understood as commonplace to trauma disorders. Disorders of extreme stress have a profound effect on cognition, perception, identity, social relationships, stress-tolerance, and regulation of affect and behavior. And dissociative phenomena disturb the integrative functions of consciousness, memory, identity, and sensory perception severely enough that the clinical picture begins to resemble the confusion of Schizophrenia. Thus the high rates of this misdiagnosis, and years of treatment before proper diagnosis (Bliss, 1980; Kluft, 1987; Ross, 1997).

Schneiderian first rank symptoms, historically considered to be classic features of Schizophrenia, are actually more prevalent in DID than in Schizophrenia. A comparison of 1739 schizophrenics with 368 MPD (Multiple Personality Disorder; the designation for DID in 1990) patients found that schizophrenics averaged 1.3 Schneiderian first rank symptoms, while MPD subjects averaged 4.9 (Ross, Miller, Reagor, Bjornson, Fraser, & Anderson, 1990).

Similarly, Ellason and Ross (1995) compared 108 patients with DID patients with 240 patients with Schizophrenia. They found that positive symptoms were more severe in the DID group, while the negative symptoms were more severe in Schizophrenia. Positive symptoms include delusions, conceptual disorganization, hallucinatory behavior, excitement, grandiosity, suspiciousness, and hostility. Negative symptoms include blunted affect, emotional withdrawal, poor rapport, passive-apathetic social withdrawal, difficulty in abstract thinking, poverty of thought and spontaneous activity, and stereotyped thinking/behavior.

Schneiderian positive symptoms common in DID include hallucinations of voices commenting on one's behavior, conversing, or arguing (voices are the most common symptom, Ross et al., 1990); thought insertion (the belief that thoughts have been placed into one's mind); thought withdrawal (the belief that thoughts are being taken from one's mind); audible thoughts (hearing one's thoughts spoken aloud); delusions of control; and somatic passivity (the belief that the body is being influenced by an external force or power) (Kluft, 1987; Ross et al., 1990). True thought broadcasting (the belief that one's thoughts are transmitted to others all around, often via some form of media), a Schneiderian first rank symptom, tends not to occur in DID. However, a suspicion that others are able to read one's mind, especially a parent or a therapist, does occur in DID (Kluft, 1987).

When trauma-based disorders originate in experiences of ritual abuse and/or mind control, diagnostic questions become even more complex, and misdiagnosis of Schizophrenia more likely. Much of the basis for misdiagnosis lies in the DSM-IV's definitions of delusions and hallucinations, and the diagnostic criteria for Schizophrenia.

The DSM-IV defines a delusion as:

> A false belief based on incorrect inference about external reality that is firmly sustained despite what almost everybody else believes and despite what constitutes incontrovertible and obvious proof or evidence to the contrary. The belief is not one ordinarily accepted by other members of the person's culture or subculture (e.g. it is not an article of religious faith)… (American Psychiatric Association, 1994, p. 765).

Belief in the existence of ritual abuse and mind control is not in the realm of acceptance in mainstream Western culture, and therefore likely to be mistaken for delusional. Information on ritual abuse and mind control is generally unavailable due to: 1) the secrecy preserved by the underground abuser groups, 2) profound dissociative responses in the victims limiting their own knowledge of their abuse history, 3) victims' fear of disclosure (Fraser, 1997b; Young & Young, 1997), 4) abusers' use of sophisticated mind control techniques designed specifically to prevent victims from gaining any conscious awareness of the abuse, 5) use of torture and illusion to instill bizarre "cover memories" to undermine victims' credibility and make them appear insane, and 6) claims that memories of ritual abuse are false, grossly exaggerated, or the product of bad therapy by organizations that have had considerable influence in the media and much presence in the courts, such as the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (Brown, Scheflin, & Hammond, 1998; Coons, 1997; Whitfield, Silberg, & Fink, 2002; Young & Young, 1997).

This coordinated effort to discredit reports of ritual abuse and mind control is supported by the natural human tendency to dismiss these heinous crimes as impossible because they are too disturbing to believe. Health and law enforcement officials often believe victims' accounts upon first hearing them. But within hours or days, many come to view the victim as psychotic. This is often based in a emotional aversion for the material, albeit often an unconscious reaction. In contrast, clinicians and law enforcement officials who accept that these crimes are real are often ostracized by their colleagues, and often experience significant secondary traumatic stress (Perlman, 1995), and painful shifts in their view of humanity, their communities, and the world.

The subject of ritual abuse also has little presence in recent mainstream professional literature. A good many psychology books and journal articles exposed ritual abuse in the early 1990s. But since 1995, the number of publications has dropped dramatically, as mental health professionals reeled from legal and media accusations of "implanting false memories" of child abuse, particularly ritual abuse. Since then, many psychotherapists treating victims of these abuses have become very guarded about divulging their clinical findings, and many medical and mental health professionals now peremptorily dismiss all reports of ritual abuse as delusional.To the uninformed or misinformed clinician, common beliefs and behaviors associated with ritual trauma and mind control are indistinguishable from many types of delusions associated with Schizophrenia or Delusional Disorder, per DSM-IV definitions (pp. 765–766). Reports of torture by organized abuser groups conspiring to silence their victims are easily mistaken for bizarre (implausible) and persecutory delusions. Reports of explosives within the body or surgical implants controlling oneself (common beliefs installed in technological mind control) can easily be confused with somatic delusions. Similarly misinterpreted are fear responses to benign stimuli that were in actuality utilized in the victim's trauma or programming. Programming can also cause compulsive behaviors that appear bizarre when viewed out of context, such as robotic, repetitive statements or singing songs at inappropriate times, unusual hand movements, patterned self-mutilation, etc. These behaviors and beliefs appear bizarre, possibly psychotic, if the history of ritual trauma and coercive mind control remain unrecognized.

These victims often report abuse by well-known individuals or government, military, espionage, religious, business, or entertainment institutions. They may allege that such people and institutions are involved in organized child pornography, pedophilia, trafficking of women and children, etc. Many clinicians reflexively view such reports as delusional rather than considering them further. In fact, quite a few facets of victimization by ritual abuse and mind control can generate such beliefs, as follows:

1. These beliefs are often derived from false claims by victims' abusers and programmed illusions used to perpetuate these beliefs. It appears that most abuser groups seek to convince their victims that they are the most powerful and formidable group, the most well-connected to prominent individuals and organizations. Many groups call themselves "the Illuminati," to distinguish themselves as the most enlightened and spiritually powerful. They claim to be direct descendants of the Knights Templar, the 16th Century Roshaniya of Afghanistan (Daraul, 1997), the Pharaohs of Europe, etc. All such claims are highly unlikely, but help control victims with fear.

2. For many victims of ritual abuse and mind control, the first indication of their trauma is a poorly-defined state of fear or a sense that something is not right. Dissociation and programming make any true memory consciously inaccessible. Naturally driven to determine the source of their uneasiness, they read books, search the Internet, and make inquiries. They come upon information about ritual abuse and mind control and this information "resonates" with them. These individuals begin to piece together their lives "from the outside in," since they cannot yet accomplish this "from the inside out." This approach can result in victims believing they were abused by individuals or institutions unrelated to their abuse.

3. Such allegations can originate in the individual's own personalities who seek to confuse, overwhelm, and terrify the host personality. A personality loyal to one abuser group may make false allegations against particular individuals or institutions that are viewed as rivals. Or, a personality may seek to keep the host in a state of generalized fear of everyone to prevent access to the memories of the actual abuse.

4. These perceptions may be based entirely or primarily in actual experience. For example, Senator John DeCamp's book, The Franklin Cover-Up: Child Abuse, Satanism, and Murder in Nebraska, 1992, has carefully documented a case involving allegations of ritual abuse involving prominent community and political figures. The clinician should exercise caution to ensure that his or her cultural biases, spiritual beliefs, and political opinions do not bias diagnostic determinations when allegations are made against prominent figures or institutions.

Abusive mind control usually endeavors to make victims believe that their thoughts are always heard, via surgical implants or electronic surveillance. And victims of ritual trauma usually believe that spiritual entities attached in rituals are now controlling them, commanding them, or reading their thoughts. These can appear much like delusions of thought broadcasting, being controlled, and thought insertion. Yet, these are effects that most individuals would undergo if so traumatized, rather than derived from a neurological disease process, a proven factor the development of Schizophrenia.

The DSM-IV defines hallucinations as, "A sensory perception that has the compelling sense of reality of a true perception but that occurs without external stimulation of the relevant sensory organ," (p. 767) with or without insight that it is a hallucination. The term is not ordinarily applied to perceptions that occur while falling asleep or awakening. Illusions are distinguished from hallucinations in that illusions involve "an actual external stimulus is misperceived or misinterpreted" (p. 768).

This definition is very broad and does not address the multiple etiologies of hallucinations. When hallucinations are present, many diagnosticians consider Schizophrenia, severe mood disorders, and processes that directly effect the physiology of the brain, such as neurological lesions and diseases, medical illnesses that affect brain physiology, toxins, and substance abuse.

Hallucinations are still not widely attributed to trauma-based disorders and dissociative experiences. Yet, hallucinations are commonly associated with trauma, and are more likely to be present when the trauma is severe, of earlier onset, when it includes sexual abuse, and when violence extends into adulthood.

Read and Argyle (1999) found that psychiatric inpatients reporting a history of sexual or physical abuse had a high frequency of auditory hallucinations, particularly command hallucinations to kill oneself, and paranoid ideation. They write:

> Half of the symptoms for which content was recorded appeared to be related to their abuse. An analysis of the relationships between types of abuse and specific symptoms suggested that hallucinations may be more common than delusions or thought disorder among patients who have been sexually abused, particularly among those who have experienced incest, and that delusions may be more related to having been physically abused (p. 1467).

Flashbacks of ritual trauma regularly involve auditory and visual hallucinations of abusers, and somatic sensations of torture being re-lived.

Greater perceptual distortions are likely to occur when child abuse is of earlier onset, longer duration, involves a number of perpetrators, and when abusers are more closely related to the victim (Sacco & Farber, 1999). Read, Agar, Argyle, and Aderhold (2003) found that 47% of community mental health center patients who were abused as children experienced hallucinations compared to 18% of patients with no abuse. Findings were significant for hearing voices, and command, visual, tactile, and olfactory hallucinations. Adult abuse alone did not generally predict hallucinations. However, patients with both child sexual abuse and adult sexual abuse were more likely to experience delusions and/or thought disorders. Mueser and Butler (1987) found that war veterans with PTSD who had auditory hallucinations had significantly more combat exposure than those without hallucinations. These findings hold great relevance for victims of ritual abuse and mind control, since the abuse often extends into adulthood, and may even be ongoing when the individual seeks treatment.

Bliss (1980) in his article distinguishing features of Schizophrenia and "hysterics with multiple personalities" (the diagnostic term for Dissociative Identity Disorder in 1980) observed the following about visual hallucinations in DID:

> What is seen is usually life-like and real, and corresponds to the kind of visual hallucinations schizophrenics often report. These contrast with weird, bizarre, polychromatic visions seen by alcoholics in delirium tremens, or those found in other toxic deliria. (p. 1396)

While toxic deliria often produce visual hallucinations that remind one of Fantasia on LSD (more fantastic and distorted than the visual hallucinations seen with ritual trauma), it is important to note that victims tortured with electroshock, a common means of inducing pain in abusive mind control, often experience flashes of light (often white, blue, red, orange, and yellow) as components of their flashback experiences.

Many mental health professionals continue to mistake reports of voices of dissociated identities for auditory hallucinations. And some victims of ritual abuse have personalities perceived to be animals which, when in executive control, may behave as such; growling, crouching, etc. In some ritual trauma, victims are locked in cages, starved, kept in dark or cold environments, and encouraged to take on animal behaviors and identities. Hendrickson, McCarty, and Goodwin (1990) report that DID patients with animal alters report being forced to live like an animal, exposure to bestiality, and being forced to witness or participate in torture, mutilation, and killing of animals to terrorize, punish, and control them. This clinical phenomenon, which at first may seem like psychotic behavior, has a discernable basis in the patient's trauma history.

If the functional host personality loses executive control of the mind and body, and less functional alters take over long-term control, dysfunctionality can be quite global. Personalities who serve to "hold" the most severe trauma apart from the host may be in constant terror and appear blatantly psychotic. Or completely non-emotional personalities may take executive control in efforts to contain affect flooding. These may be nonresponsive, appear catatonic, and may even deny their true identity, symptoms easily mistaken for psychotic.

The DSM-IV states that Schizophrenia is diagnosed "if delusions are bizarre or hallucinations consist of a voice keeping up a running commentary on the person's behavior or thoughts, or two or more voices conversing with each other" (American Psychiatric Association, 1994, p. 285), with corresponding social or occupational dysfunction, for a duration of at least 6 months. Diagnostic exclusions are limited to Schizoaffective, Mood, Substance, and Pervasive Developmental Disorders. By these criteria, when "bizarre delusions" or the above-described voices occur, Schizophrenia should be diagnosed, even if these occur only during the active phase of Dissociative, Post-traumatic, and Acute Stress Disorders. Clearly, this is a troubling source of misdiagnosis in cases of ritual trauma, and in disorders of dissociation and extreme stress in general.

Distinguishing symptoms of actual ritual abuse from true psychosis is further complicated by the fact that in some cases, the first can eventually develop into the second. Ritual trauma and mind control often cause victims to perceive abusers as omniscient, omnipresent, and capable of almost anything. Many victims isolate themselves socially, due to fear of people or feelings of unworthiness, and may not be able to work. Having little or nothing to ground them back to outer reality, they retreat further into inner nightmarish worlds and their fears can grow unchecked. In cases of organized criminal abuse, perpetrators may still be monitoring, or even abusing, the individual. Prolonged states of dread and hypervigilance eventually gain their own momentum and "outrun" actual events. In an attempt to attach meaning to this state of fear, victims may seek answers from unreliable sources. In particular, the Internet is a valuable source of useful information on ritual abuse and mind control, but is also a source of much misinformation. The individual may finally develop an acute traumatic stress reactive psychosis, in which reality testing is severely compromised. The fear can escalate until it is generalized to almost everything and everyone in the environment, which can closely resemble the delusional state of acute paranoid Schizophrenia. In actuality, this clinical picture is more closely related to the stress-induced deterioration in dissociative patients that was in years past termed Hysterical Psychosis (Tutkun, Yargic, & Sar, 1996). Per the DSM-IV, Brief Psychotic Disorder would be the most fitting diagnosis, but this lacks the etiological specificity of Hysterical Psychosis. Prolonged extreme stress can eventually result in generalized and extended gross dysfunction, including catatonic states. The DSM-IV provides no diagnostic category that fits this most chronic and deteriorated presentation.

In some cases, trauma may contribute to the pathogenesis of Schizophrenia. Read, Perry, Moskowitz, and Connolly (2001) propose a traumagenic neurodevelopmental model of Schizophrenia. Read et al. (2003) suggest that the heightened sensitivity to stress which is found in Schizophrenia is, for some patients, related to neurodevelopmental changes caused by childhood trauma. They cite numerous studies showing a high prevalence of childhood abuse and trauma in psychiatric inpatients diagnosed with severe mental disorders. They also point out many similarities between the effects of early trauma on the developing brain and neurobiological abnormalities associated with Schizophrenia. These include "overreactivity of the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis; dopamine, norepinephrine, and serotonin abnormalities; and structural changes to the brain such as hippocampal damage, cerebral atrophy, ventricular enlargement, and reversed cerebral asymmetry" (p. 319). These neurobiological similarities should be interpreted cautiously, but are certainly consistent with the significant overlap in clinical symptoms of severe trauma disorders and Schizophrenia.

In some cases, an individual will have both Schizophrenia and Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress (these individuals are seen most often in inpatient settings). Fortunately, in most cases, these disorders are distinct, and readily differentiated by clinicians experienced with both populations.

Some victims of ritual abuse and mind control appear to have suffered abuse extensive enough to result in irreversible brain damage (e.g., prolonged oxygen deprivation or extensive electroshock). In such cases, the individual can appear much like an individual with chronic Schizophrenia or organic psychosis.

Spiritual Factors

Most ritual abuse victims believe in the existence of God, a rival force of evil, such as Satan, and lesser evil entities, such as demons. Many report having a personal relationship with God, Jesus, angels, etc., as a source of divine guidance and support, often beginning with a profound spiritual experience while being tortured as a child. They may describe a close spiritual connection to other children abused with them in rituals, and may even believe they hold parts of the spirits of sacrificed children within themselves, to help these spirits. They may believe that God has directed them to help other victims of ritual abuse or to expose these crimes, and may be helping others through support networks, writing books, etc. They are often deeply committed to their faith. Many worship within mainstream religions, and others only within individual spiritual practice. Other survivors have anxious and aversive reactions to organized religion, particularly Judeo-Christian religions, as a direct result of rituals involving desecration of Judeo-Christian houses of worship and religious symbols (e.g., the cross), and torture and programming to prevent faith in the Judeo-Christian God.

Ritual abuse victims also commonly experience the presence of evil spiritual entities, both internally and externally. They may believe they have malevolent spiritual attachments within themselves, and may feel plagued or controlled by spirits of living, or even dead, abusers. Some victims believe that they have been possessed by evil spirits or demons, briefly or long-term. These phenomena are often restricted to only particular personalities.

Some survivors believe they have spiritual or supernatural powers and that they are engaged in a battle of good against evil. Many engage in spiritual warfare, or even exorcism of demons, usually within Christian faiths, to protect themselves from forces of extreme evil associated with their childhood ritual abuse, and which they believe still intend them harm. Some practice “white magic” or “Wicca” in efforts to empower themselves.

Many victims of ritual abuse report being telepathic or clairvoyant, and may be superstitious and rely on magical thinking. These characteristics are shared by many patients with DID who are not necessarily ritually abused (Ellason, Ross, & Fuchs, 1996). Many ritual abuse victims also claim to have had paranormal experiences, such as astral travel, out-of-body, and near-death experiences, in which their spirits left their physical bodies.

Many of these spiritual beliefs may be viewed by secular clinicians as unusual or extreme, but would not be so-viewed in many mainstream religions. The less traditional beliefs are consistent with the spiritual practices of many alternative religions. Studies in mainstream psychology are finding high rates of paranormal experience in the general population. Van Lommel, van Wees, Meyers, and Elfferich (2001) found that of 344 cardiac arrest patients resuscitated after being clinically dead, 62 (18%) reported near-death experiences involving a “special state of consciousness,” including specific elements such as out-of-body experience, pleasant feelings, moving through a tunnel, communication with light, deceased relatives, or a life review. Greyson (2000) found that people who believed they had left their physical bodies in close brushes with death reported more dissociative symptoms than people without such experiences, but that their level of symptoms was significantly lower than patients with pathological dissociative disorders. Ross and Joshi (1992) found the incidence of 65.7% of paranormal experience in the general population. The most common were deja vu (54.6%), precognitive dreams (17.8%), and mental telepathy (15.6%).

Possession phenomena are not restricted to patients with histories of ritual abuse, nor are they necessarily associated with a psychiatric disorder. Possession phenomena have a higher incidence in cultures with beliefs in spirits or evil, such as some rural Asian cultures (Chiu, 2000). The DSM-IV acknowledges that nonpathological possession trance states are common within certain cultures and religions, within its discussion of Dissociative Trance Disorder (a proposed diagnostic category for further study, pp. 727–729).

The spiritual beliefs of ritual abuse victims are directly derived from years of inculcation in the doctrines and practices of Satanism and abusive witchcraft, generally including the formative years of early childhood, and often under the tutelage of their parents. Victims' spiritual beliefs must be interpreted within this cultural context.

Wolfgang G. Jilek (2001), Past Chairman, Transcultural Psychiatry Section of the World Psychiatric Association, explains that many psychological conditions are actually "Culture-bound Reactive Syndromes." For instance, he reports that persecutory delusions and auditory hallucinations are not necessarily indicative of Schizophrenia in persons of African cultural background and that acute transient psychotic reactions occur especially frequently in African and Afro-Caribbean populations. He reports that increasingly, the French term bouffée délirante introduced by Magnan in 1886, is being used to designate these transient psychotic or psychosis-like reactions. He writes (italics added for emphasis, spelling unchanged from the original): The bouffée délirante reactions are sudden attacks of brief duration with paranoid delusions and often concomitant hallucinations, typically precipitated by an intense fear of magical persecution through sorcery or witchcraft. They are also characterized by a confusional state and by highly emotionalized behaviour and, after the attack, by amnesia, or rather disavowal. In its symptomatology, the bouffée délirante is reminiscent of the transient psychotic reactions occurring in the early phases of industrialization and mass-urbanization in 19th century Europe; described under such names as folie hystérique in Paris and amentia transitonia in Vienna [Morel, 1860; Meymert, 1889]. Indeed, the concept of hysterical psychosis was revived in the 1960s by American psychiatrists with special reference to transient psychotic reactions in non-Western populations [Hollender & Hirsch, 1964; Hirsch & Hollender, 1969], while Swiss psychiatrists during the same period introduced the label "emotional psychosis" for bouffée délirante-like reactions triggered by the fear of witchcraft, experienced by rural South Italian migrants under acculturation pressure in Swiss cities [Labhardt 1963; Risso & Boeker 1964]. Transient psychotic reactions are of particular interest to comparative cultural psychiatry because they are interwoven with culturally validated beliefs in sorcery and witchcraft which persist, even after the traditional resources of protection from, and of therapeutic action against, the assumed persecution by magical or supernatural powers, are no longer available as a consequence of Westernization and urbanization. While the number of individuals experiencing the pressures of rapid social change is steadily increasing, many feel unprotected against magical forces in which they still firmly believe, and react to acculturation stress with transient psychotic symptom formation.

The implications of Jilek's thesis for our purpose are clear. Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress is a culture-bound condition, uniquely bourne of the subculture of isolation, torture, religious indoctrination, and coercive programming, inherent in ritual trauma and mind control, understandable only in that context, and not to be superimposed onto a model that does not account for its origins, i.e., the diagnostic system of the DSM-IV.

Chart for Differential Diagnosis of Schizophrenia and Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

The clinical features that differentiate Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress from Schizophrenia are summarized in the attached chart below for easy clinical reference.

This chart draws primarily on the clinical experience of the authors who have treated or assessed a total of 50 patients with ritual abuse and mind control trauma, and hundreds with Schizophrenia, and consultation with other experts in assessment of this population. It also incorporates information drawn from the literature on ritual abuse and mind control trauma; symptomatology related to ritual torture, symbols, artifacts, and holidays; relevant symptoms of the major primary and secondary diagnoses of affected individuals; findings based in psychological assessment of ritual trauma and DID; and research on differential diagnosis of trauma-related disorders from Schizophrenia.

Validation Studies

Two validation studies were performed on these guidelines and chart. A first draft of these was sent to 17 licensed mental health professionals known to have significant knowledge of ritual abuse and/or coercive mind control. They were asked to fill out a short questionnaire about their professional experience and to indicate the degree to which they judged these guidelines to accurately differentiate Schizophrenia from Traumatic Stress from Ritual Abuse or Mind Control. Expertise was defined as a clinician having at least 10 years of licensed clinical experience and as having treated or assessed at least six patients with each disorder.

Thirteen surveys were returned. Three clinicians were judged to have inadequate expertise with at least one of the diagnostic groups. Two did not complete the question about adequate differentiation of the two disorders, but did send an explanation and helpful suggestions for improving the guidelines and chart.

Eight clinicians met criteria for expertise and completed the chart; four psychiatrists, three psychologists and one marriage and family counselor/professional counselor (MFT/PC). Seven of these judged that this chart accurately differentiated 90% to 100% of the patients in each diagnostic group from patients with the other diagnosis. One psychologist judged that it accurately differentiated 90 to 100% of the patients with Traumatic Stress from Ritual Abuse or Mind Control from patients with Schizophrenia, but only about 75% of the patients with Schizophrenia from those with Traumatic Stress from Ritual Abuse or Mind Control.

The second validation study was performed following substantial additions to the article text, and less extensive, but significant additions to the differential diagnosis chart. The newly-revised guidelines and chart were sent to 20 additional licensed mental health professionals known to have experience in ritual abuse and/or coercive mind control. Expertise remained defined as in the first validation study.

Fifteen surveys were returned. Three clinicians had inadequate expertise with one or both diagnostic groups. Twelve clinicians met criteria for expertise and completed the surveys. The study results are as follows:

Guidelines to Differential Diagnosis between Schizophrenia and Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

by Ellen P. Lacter,Ph.D., and Karl Lehman, M.D.

Symptom: Auditory Perceptual Experiences and Distortions; Hearing Voices and Other Sounds.

Schizophrenia

Types: Generally hears voices that call them names, converse, argue, predict danger, or give commands (often hostile). Voices are generally malevolent, but in some cases, benevolent voices occur. Voices tend to be in the second person ("you") and third person ("he," "she"), and not usually in the first person ("I"). May believe the voices are well-known religious or public figures. Rarely hears children's voices. Only a few voices are usually heard. They may also hear buzzing, tones, etc. Unmedicated, voices are usually frequent or constant.
Perceived Source and Response: Voices are usually heard as originating outside the head, but voices inside the head are also common. Voices tend to be perceived as audible. The person may speak aloud or yell at these voices. Voices may be perceived from inanimate objects, such as a turned-off radio.

They may respond back to these objects, expecting the object to respond back. The person usually can exert no influence over the voices.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Types: If Dissociative Identity Disorder (DID) is present, hearing vocalizations of other "parts" is common, commonly including conversations or arguing between personalities, children's voices, crying or screaming, or even sounds of animal "parts". Hearing voices of abusers is also common. Voices criticizing the host, giving hostile commands, or predicting danger can also occur, but are rarely the only voices heard. Benevolent and helpful voices are common. Voices may be identified by name (personalities). There will often be many voices heard. Internal personalities may converse in the first person, but second and third person are also common, as personalities discuss the host personality. The voices may be perceived to be more vivid than actually audible. Buzzing and tones may be heard, usually derived from flashbacks (mental play-back) of abuse involving such sounds. Voices can be intermittent or frequent.
Perceived Source and Response: Usually, voices are perceived as originating inside the head; the person may speak quietly with these internal voices. Occasionally, the person will perceive voices as coming from outside the head, or from inanimate objects, based in the perception of omnipresent threat. In rare cases, they will speak aloud to these voices. They rarely expect a response back. The person may be able to influence these voices; to gain varying degrees of response back, to gain cooperation, or to temporarily silence them.

Symptom: Thought Withdrawal, Thought Insertion, and Thought Broadcasting

Schizophrenia

The person may believe that thoughts are being withdrawn from his/her mind by some external force (thought withdrawal). Thoughts and impulses felt not to be one's own may occur and be blamed on some external force (thought insertion). They may believe that their thoughts are transmitted to others at large, often via media such as radio, television, newspapers, etc. (thought broadcasting).

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Personalities often block unwanted thoughts, causing the host to suddenly lose track of thoughts or discourse. However, an external force will not generally be blamed for blocked thoughts. Ego-alien thoughts and impulses, e.g., aggressive or sexual, may intrude from other personalities. This is more likely to make the host personality anxious than be ascribed to some external force. Some individuals believe that their abusers, evil entities, or surveillance equipment can implant thoughts or read their thoughts. Occasionally, this fear becomes generalized to everyone and closely mimics the thought broadcasting delusions seen in Schizophrenia.

Symptom: Visual Perceptual Experiences, Distortions, and Representations

Schizophrenia

Visual hallucinations are about half as common as auditory. Hallucinations and illusions include people, frightening animals or monsters, lights, lines, etc. If present, they are usually frequent or constant. Perceptual fit may be poor; e.g., a drawing of a man may look nothing like a man. Line quality may be poor and impulsive.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Trauma-based visual perceptions of abusers, abuses, or feared spiritual entities can occur, often “leaking” into consciousness from dissociated personalities, or derived from flashbacks, consistent with traumatic experiences. Hallucinations and illusions tend not to be frequent or constant. Flashes of light or color may be seen, also based in flashbacks of torture, often involving electroshock and light stimulation.Perceptual fit of visual stimuli and drawings is usually good; i.e., interpretation of visual stimuli tend to fit form demands, but not in all cases.

Symptom: Tactile and Somatic Perceptual Experiences and Distortions

Schizophrenia

Tactile hallucinations are less common than visual. The person may feel as if insects are crawling on the skin. Hallucinations of pain, hot, and cold are rare. Without co-occurring trauma, abreaction (re-living trauma) is unlikely. Delusions of persecution often accompany somatic perceptual distortions. Conversion reactions are not common. Analgesia and anesthesia would be unlikely.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Trauma-based tactile sensations are common, as dissociated experiences of past abuse “leak” into conscious awareness in flashbacks or abreaction (re-living trauma). During flashbacks, these can feel like re-assault, but the person tends to re-orient to reality immediately after. Other tactile sensations are perceived “as if” being assaulted, with reality-testing intact throughout. The most common sensation is pain, often gastrointestinal, genitourinary, skin surface, and musculoskeletal. Others include cold, heat, dizziness, pressure, nausea, sexual sensation, noxious odors and tastes, perceiving snakes (especially along the spine or in the abdomen) or insects (especially spiders) within the body or crawling on the skin, and the perception of electric shock or involuntary spasms related to torture involving electroshock. Conversion reactions are common, including numbness, anesthesia, analgesia, and motor inhibitions, inability to speak, hear, and changes in vision.

Symptom: Degree of Conviction in Reality of Perceptual Distortions

Schizophrenia

Difficulty differentiating hallucinations from reality. Often adamant that these perceptions are real. Difficulty engaging in rational evaluation of the derivations of these experiences. Low capacity for self-observation.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

If sounds are heard, distorted stimuli are seen, or somato-tactile sensations are felt, the person usually becomes oriented back to "here-and-now", and understands the perceptions were not real, either as they occurred or shortly afterwards, and can rationally evaluate their source. Insight often follows that these originated in voices or memories of inner personalities, flashbacks, or fear of re-assault and autonomic arousal.

Symptom: Reports of Persecution

Schizophrenia

Onset: Focus is usually on persecution that is perceived to be current or beginning in adulthood more often than having childhood origins.

Source of Threat: Focus is usually grandiose and global, e.g., the CIA, Satan, or celebrities. Specific abusers or abuser groups, specific acts and motives, are usually not identified. Reports usually lack complexity and detail. Rarely states other victims were involved.

Affect: Generally agitated as reports persecution.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Onset: Focus is usually on abuse beginning in childhood, sometimes continuing into adulthood, even to the present.

Source of Threat: Focus is usually on specific abusers; often close relatives. May also identify people or groups known, or alleged, to participate in Satanism or witchcraft (some with web-sites), mind control with political/military agendas (e.g., CIA, Nazi, Ku Klux Klan, etc.), or organized crime. Allegations include complexity and detail. Impossible delusions can co-occur, derived from mind control designed to mimic psychosis or influence from other sources, especially when overwhelming fear becomes generalized and when answers are sought external to oneself. Generally, reports other victims in addition to oneself.

Affect: May be blunted and detached, or intense and afraid.

Important Note on Reports of Persecution

Reports of mind control methods, espionage operations, and spiritual or psychic experiences not in the clinician's experience should not be the basis for a diagnosis of Schizophrenia, since; a) most clinicians are not authorities on these complex subjects, b) some abusers program bizarre beliefs (e.g., alien abduction) in victims to make them feel and appear non-credible or insane, and, c) Extreme post-traumatic stress from ritual abuse or trauma-based mind control can cause irrational fears and beliefs, especially if victims socially isolate and/or obtain information from unreliable sources, and, in severe cases, can result in acute or chronic traumatic stress reactive psychosis.

Symptom: Degree of conviction and consistency in reporting abuses.

Schizophrenia

Generally an emotionally intense and unwavering conviction that persecutions occurred, especially early in the disease, and before treatment. Resistant to rational analysis of these beliefs. Illogical and unexplained changes in reports may occur, e.g., changes in alleged perpetrators. With more treatment and age, the person may question these perceptions.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Skepticism is common when memories of abuse first emerge. Individuals often state; "I must have made this up", or, "I don't want to believe it", or, "I can't tell if it really happened, or if I dreamed it or imagined it." Reports are usually accompanied by awareness of possible disbelief by the listener. As dissociation decreases, the person usually perceives increased consistency between memories and reports have increased narrative coherence. The individual may eventually discover that particular memories were distortions based in fear, programming, or abusers' illusions to create "cover memories."

Symptom: Response to respectful questioning of the validity of their reports.

Schizophrenia

The person may react with strong anger, and will often escalate accusations to less credible reports.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Reactions of belligerence are not common. Reactions may include sadness, tears, grief, despair, withdrawal, silence, mild to moderate frustration, or attempts to provide more information. Will often employ logical tactics in an attempt to convey his/her experience.

Symptom: Response to anti-psychotics.

Schizophrenia

Often results in reduction in perceptual distortions and in reports of persecution.

Low doses can reduce over-generalized fear or aggression, but trauma-based perceptual distortions and reports of persecution will remain.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Unless given in low doses, there is often an increase in dissociative confusion and dysfunctionality.

Symptom: General dysfunction.

Schizophrenia

During acute psychotic episodes, generalized impairment is usually marked to extreme, and this impairment is fairly constant over the duration of the episode (usually days to months). Baseline generalized impairment (between acute psychotic episodes) is usually mild to marked.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Functionality ranges from good to disabled. Usually, there are spheres of good functionality alongside spheres of trauma-based impairment. Prolonged extreme stress can result in fairly generalized dysfunction and cognitive confusion.

Symptom: Negative symptoms.

Schizophrenia

Commonly restricted/blunted affect, and reduced interest, enjoyment, motivation, energy, initiative, spontaneity, and overall willed action. Often decreased thought content and emotional withdrawal from relationships and daily activity.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Emotional numbing and flooding tend to co-exist. Thinking is generally spontaneous with richness of content. Generally invested in some activities, unless depression dominates the clinical picture. Usually preserves pleasure in some activities and interests.

Symptom: Affect: range and appropriateness.

Schizophrenia

Affect is often restricted/blunted (a diminished emotional response to stimuli). In some cases, affect is agitated, fearful, and/or angry. Shifts in affect are often unrelated to context (inappropriate), but are not accompanied by dramatic changes in presentation of personality, such as demeanor, appearance, and vocal quality.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Affect may be relatively normal, though mildly blunted in the host personality (usually the most functional personality), or the host may be quite fearful and agitated. Shifts in affect are usually appropriate within the context of trauma reactions. Dramatic shifts to fear, sadness, anger, and in some cases, happiness, occur when personalities "switch", paired with changes in general demeanor, body posture, facial appearance, vocal inflection, and age-related behaviors, such as adult-like or childlike presentation. Some personalities may be severely emotionally constricted or robotic.

Symptom: Coherence of thought process.

Schizophrenia

Generally disorganized with loose associations. Often illogical (alogia), circumstantial, or tangential, and can be so disorganized as to be incoherent.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Generally sequential, coherent, and goal-directed. Narratives may be pressured and somewhat tangential as the individual associates to trauma or attempts to divulge extensive trauma. Thoughts can stop mid-stream, and new, somewhat-related, subjects begun, as personalities compete to communicate.

Symptom: Abstract thought.

Schizophrenia

Usually, some impairment in capacity for abstract thought (can be mild to severe). Often displays rigidity and concreteness (can be mild to severe)

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Usually, a normal capacity for abstract thought.

Symptom: Memory functions.

Schizophrenia

Mild to moderate chronic, baseline memory impairment is common. Amnesia for specific childhood events and amnestic gaps in adult life are not likely (unless severe psychological trauma or dissociation are also present).

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Baseline memory function for neutral events is generally normal. There is usually substantial amnesia for childhood, which can include amnesia for significant events (e.g., birthdays or holidays), all experience with particular family members (who are later identified as abuse perpetrators), or even complete amnesia for extended periods of a year or more. There are often amnestic gaps in current adult life as alters take executive control from the host.

Symptom: Orientation.

Schizophrenia

Disorientation for person, place, and time can occur during acute psychotic episodes, which usually last days, weeks or even months.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Disorientation (dissociative confusion regarding person, place, and time) can be caused by flashbacks and/or dissociative switching, and usually resolves in seconds, minutes, or at most hours.

Symptom: Attention and concentration.

Schizophrenia

Often mild impairment in attention and concentration at baseline. Marked difficulty focusing attention and concentrating during acute psychotic episodes, especially due to distraction from hallucinatory internal stimuli. Mild to moderate impairment in attention and concentration remains even at baseline.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Usually, little to moderate difficulty focusing attention and concentrating, commensurate with the person's levels of anxiety, depression, and dissociation. Transient episodes of more marked impairment often occur, especially during flashbacks and personality "switching". As personalities "switch", there are often observable transient trance-states with sleepiness, eyes closed, gaze briefly fixed, or eyelids rolling or fluttering. Sometimes, "switching" trance states are more subtle.

Symptom: Overall cognitive function.

Schizophrenia

Overall cognitive function is usually dramatically impaired during acute psychotic episodes, but some cognitive impairment is also usually present at baseline.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Baseline overall cognitive functioning is normal unless trauma has resulted in permanent brain injury. Various types of cognitive impairment are observed with flashbacks, during dissociative switching, and when certain internal parts assume executive control, but there are usually trauma-free spheres of cognitive functioning.

Symptom: Language spontaneity.

Schizophrenia

Often poverty of speech, blocking, increased latency of response, and lacking in spontaneity.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Usually highly verbal and expressive. May be guarded due to fear of eliciting abusive responses, or not being believed. Speaks about many different things and experiences, with a good degree of complexity.

Symptom: Language peculiarities.

Schizophrenia

May use new meaningless words (neologisms), meaningless rhyming or "word salad" (a meaningless mixture of words). Very unlikely to refer to oneself as "we."

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Neologisms, rhyming, and "word salad" tend not to occur, except in meaningful plays on words. If DID, may refer to the self as "we," or even "not me," may refer to "the voices inside," or may report being inhabited by someone else.

Symptom: Vocal quality and nonverbal communication.

Schizophrenia

Vocal quality (tone, inflection) and nonverbal communication (body language, mannerisms, gaze, eye contact) are often unusual, impaired, stunted, or unrelated to the context. Dramatic and sudden changes in vocal inflection, grammar, accent, etc., (personality "switching") are unlikely.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Vocal quality and nonverbal communication are often normal. As personalities switch, there are often changes in vocal inflection, grammar (especially in relation to the age of the personality), even regional accent or other languages. Oddities may be present, e.g., when executive control is assumed by robot-like, terrified, previously-drugged, childlike, and heavily programmed personalities. These oddities are usually less subjectively disturbing and more potentially meaningful than in Schizophrenia. In some cases, oddities are more extreme, but ultimately "make sense" as subtle details of the extreme stress dissociative and processes are understood.

Symptom: Changes in interpersonal communication style.

Schizophrenia

Between acute psychotic episodes, interpersonal communication style tends to be stable, and appears as one personality. Between baseline and acute psychosis, interpersonal communication style can change, usually gradually, over the course of hours or days. During acute psychotic episodes, affect may be labile, but overall interpersonal communication style usually remains stable (one personality).

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

As personalities "switch," there are usually observable changes in interpersonal communication style. These tend to occur quickly, over the course of seconds, and can occur many times in one session, especially when painful content is being discussed.

Note: it can be easy to miss changes in interpersonal communication style when they are subtle and/or when they occur more slowly (over minutes as opposed to seconds).

Symptom: Distress and phobic reactions.

Schizophrenia

Distress and phobic reactions may occur in relation to delusional content, such as fear of cameras, microphones, and spiders.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Distress and phobic reactions are common in response to abuse-related stimuli, such as knives, babies, crosses, blood, and related to fear of surveillance, such as cameras and microphones. These may also occur in response to benign stimuli, such as colors and shapes. Extreme distress, increased self-mutilation, suicidality, and hospitalizations in relation to ritual holidays are common.

Symptom: Fugue states.

Schizophrenia

Unlikely to experience psychogenic fugue states or to find oneself in a strange place or doing unfamiliar activities with no memory of how one arrived there.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Fugue states are common, as "alter" personalities take executive control of the body. The host will often affirm having found him/herself in a strange place or as engaging in an unusual, or morally unacceptable, behavior, often with unfamiliar people.

Symptom: Hypnotizability.

Schizophrenia

Likely to be somewhat suspicious about being hypnotized and resistant to hypnosis. Generally, will score low on formal hypnotizability measures.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Generally autohypnotic, with spontaneous trance states. Usually highly hypnotizable. Alter personalities will often take executive control in response to a request to speak with them. The host will usually transition through a hypnagogic state in the process.

Symptom: Rapport and guardedness with therapist or evaluator.

Schizophrenia

Stilted rapport, lack of emotional involvement, and guardedness are common. Mutual interaction may not be sustained. Fear reactions may occur and mount with little rational basis. Distrust may recede and re-appear. Response to reassurance is usually guarded and slow.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Initial guardedness is typical. Trust usually builds with support, a sense of being believed, and demonstration of some understanding of dissociation and ritual trauma. Generally, the individual seeks emotional involvement. Trust is likely to decrease as new difficult material is about to surface. Consistency and "waiting this out" at such times will allow the work to proceed and trust to deepen. Fear reactions may also occur in response to trauma reminders, and are also responsive to the therapist's consistency. Personalities who emerge later in treatment are usually receptive to help, although they may be initially apprehensive and resistant.

Symptom: Counter-transference responses.

Schizophrenia

Clinicians often experience a feeling of confusion and wish to retreat from the interaction, due to the individual's emotional distance, difficulty following the content, and inability to make sense of the person's communication.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Clinicians generally respond to these people with interest, empathy, and a desire to help. Some clinicians experience a desire to retreat from the interaction, due to the painful and frightening nature of the reported abuses (rather than an inability to mentally track the communication), concern that they cannot offer competent treatment, or fear of retaliation by the client's abusers. Some clinicians fear legal actions or professional criticism if they diagnose DID or assess trauma from ritual abuse, which can influence diagnostic determinations and willingness to treat.

Symptom: Social relationships and fear responses to people.

Schizophrenia

Generally lacking in interpersonal involvement, closeness, and empathy. Tendency to distance or isolate and avoid prolonged social interchange. May have a few superficial relationships. Easily overstimulated by human contact. Often fears people, particularly people looking at them. Usually not frightened of people based on particular behaviors or appearance. Mental and social development tend to be globally arrested.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Usually in an approach-avoidance conflict with people. Usually, a capacity and desire for close interpersonal contact, but great fear about whom to trust. Tendency to have a few close enduring relationships, especially if one primary caregiver was positive, consistent and not abusive. Some may have a primarily avoidant attachment style. Tendency to fear people with a particular appearance, actions, or function, related to reported abuses, e.g., people with beards, people who use their hands in ways interpreted to be programming "triggers', police officers, etc. Co-morbid Borderline Personality Disorder is not uncommon. In such cases, interpersonal relationships may be volatile and unstable.

Symptom: Complexity of object relations and narcissism.

Schizophrenia

People are perceived and described as fairly unidimensional. Some people may be described as evil in their intent to harm. The focus is on how the actions of others effect oneself, with little insight into, or awareness of, others' motives. Tends not to think about why alleged perpetrators intend them harm.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

People are understood and described with complexity, with some insight into their underlying feelings, needs, and motives. There is usually a strong need to understand why family abusers committed their abuse. Some perpetrators may be described as evil. Others may be viewed as doing evil acts, but being primarily victimized and controlled. Usually, some people will be described as good. Survivor guilt is common, especially if the person believes he or she assisted in sacrificial rituals. Substantial narcissism, splitting, and deficient empathy can also occur. All of the above may be limited to specific personalities.

Symptom: Laughter and humor.

Schizophrenia

Often absent. If humor is attempted, it is usually strange, tangential, and not related logically to the context. It tends to fall flat. Little or no ability to laugh at oneself.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Humor may be absent due to acute stress and depression. When present, humor is usually intelligent, logical, wry, and/or ironic. Often able to poke fun at one's own trauma, dissociated identities, and dysfunctions. Can use humor appropriately as a defense to allay anxiety.

Symptom: Self-care.

Schizophrenia

Self-care, hygiene, and dress are often odd and/or poor.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Self-care and hygiene are usually within normal limits, but can deteriorate in response to prolonged stress or with concomitant substance abuse. Dress can be normal to childlike to "witchy."

Symptom: Somatization, conversion, and physical health.

Schizophrenia

Medication side effects, poor self-care, little exercise, cigarette and substance abuse, and the chronic stress of coping with Schizophrenia, all contribute to multiple health problems. Somatization and conversion reactions are not expected, unless there is also a significant trauma history.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Stress-related physical symptoms are usually present. Headaches, especially migraine headaches, are prevalent, particularly as personalities "switch" or threaten to switch. Also common are autoimmune (especially fibromyalgia and chronic fatigue), gastrointestinal, genitourinary, cardiopulmonary, and musculo-skeletal problems. These may be true physical disorders caused by, or exacerbated by, stress. Or they may be primarily an expression of psychological distress (somatization). Physical symptoms often occur as specific memories press toward conscious awareness, such as jerking based in memories of electroshock, or swelling at sites of prior injuries. Emerging memories of trauma often also result in conversion reactions of the sensory or voluntary motor system, such as analgesia (decreased ability to feel pain), tactile anesthesia (loss of sensation for touch), hyperaesthesia (excessive sensitivity to stimuli), inability to speak, see, hear, or move a part of the body related to the trauma.

Symptom: Self-importance and grandiosity.

Schizophrenia

Self-aggrandizing; fabricates abilities, accomplishments, and knowledge, to grand proportions, both worldly and spiritual. May claim to be an important religious (e.g. Jesus) or political figure, or to have important roles with these figures. Shame and feelings of worthlessness can also be severe.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Often, shame of cult role. In some cases, pride in cult role and/or abuses endured. Distinct personalities may be boastful about their "power". May claim spiritual powers, e.g., psychic abilities, clairvoyance, the ability to leave their bodies, or astral travel. It is unlikely that individuals would claim to be someone they are not, e.g., Jesus. But, they often perceive such figures within the self, such as Lucifer, Satan, Baphomet, etc. Spiritual experiences are often reported, e.g., having received help from God or angels.

Symptom: Spiritual/religious experience.

Schizophrenia

Delusions of grandeur are common. Individuals may view themselves as major religious figures (God, Jesus, etc.) or as receiving commands from religious figures to do grandly significant things- stop wars, etc., usually with the goals of achieving internal self-importance or recognition as special from others.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

May report a connection, or even encounters (e.g., being spoken to), with spiritual figures (God, Jesus, angels, etc.), as a source of spiritual guidance or support, not to obtain recognition or increase self-importance. May report having a God-given purpose to help others, often with a realistic plan. May feel harassed or possessed by spirits or demons. May view themselves as demonic or having spiritual powers for good. May experience the spiritual presence of other persons, deceased or living, often including a spiritual connection to other children abused in rituals. May be devout in their spiritual beliefs and practices or alternatively experience anxiety or an aversion to God and religion. These attributions may be limited to particular personalities.

Symptom: Experience with famous people.

Schizophrenia

Tends to be boastful, but usually vague. Even when stories are elaborate, they will usually lack concrete, specific details. Claims are often motivated by the wish to portray oneself as physically, socially, intellectually, or spiritually special.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Some individuals report abuse by politicians or celebrities. In some cases, this is reported with realistic details, accompanied by feelings of fear or disgust, and the goal is to be believed. In other cases, details are lacking and the affect suggests a feeling of self-importance, suggesting a basis in a need to feel special.

Symptom: Experiences with media; TV, movies, etc.

Schizophrenia

Usually, personalizes that media are communicating threats or commands directly and specifically to the self (ideas of reference).

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

May report media stimuli "triggering" memories of ritual trauma or setting off mind control programming. May respond with somnolence to media stimuli previously used in programming. In some complex mind control cases, may perceive personal communication from the media.

Symptom: Violence.

Schizophrenia

Sudden violence can occur, with no external logical provocation, based on disorganized thoughts, hallucinatory commands, and/or the perceived need to defend the self from delusional threats. Often cannot control violent responses.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Feeling cornered or being physically restrained can stimulate flashbacks of abuse, and consequent fight or flight responses. If Borderline Personality Disorder is co-morbid, as is often the case, violence can occur within intense relationship conflict, or in response to the therapist. Response to limits on violence is generally good, unless in a state of perceived extreme threat.

Symptom: Self-harm.

Schizophrenia

Self-mutilation is rare. However, command hallucinations to kill oneself may put the person at risk of suicide. Suicide can also result from depression, secondary to long-term Schizophrenia.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Self-mutilation is common (arms, legs, genitals, etc), though not always disclosed and sometimes deliberately concealed. Suicide is a strong risk, subsequent to violating programming to not remember and not tell of the abuse.

Suicidality can also result from depression, secondary to chronic disorders of extreme stress.

Symptom: Eating disorders and food aversions.

Schizophrenia

Overeating and being overweight are common, often related to poor self-care, attempts to self-soothe, and side effects of medications. Fasting and purging occur, but are less common. Food aversions may occur in relation to delusions.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Fasting, binging, purging, being overweight, anorexia, and food aversions and vegetarianism are common. These often derive from experiences with sacrifices of animals or humans and/or ingestion of flesh or excretions (semen, blood, feces, urine, etc). Fasting, binging, and purging may be used to self-anesthetize or self-soothe. Purging is often re-living of trauma, or a programmed need to "re-program" the self. Some psychotropic drugs can result in weight gain.

Symptom: Sexuality.

Schizophrenia

There is generally reduced sexual desire, satisfaction, and access to partners. There is some tendency toward fleeting sexual encounters and sexual victimization. Long-term sexual relationships are rare. Psychotropic drugs can effect sexual desire and function positively or negatively (Fortier, Trudel, Mottard, & Piché, 2000; Raja & Azzoni, 2003).

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

High-functioning survivors often have sexually-fulfilling committed relationships. Sexual aversion is also common in the host personality, and in many traumatized personalities. In many cases, particular personalities have the capacity for sexual pleasure, and may "switch in" during sexual relations. In some cases, there are sexually compulsive personalities. Personalities forced into child prostitution often engage in prostitution as adults. In some cases, paraphiliac interests exist in some personalities.

Symptom: Homosexuality and homophobia.

Schizophrenia

Homosexuality appears to occur at the same rate as the population at large (Raja & Azzoni, 2003). Males with paranoid Schizophrenia may suddenly perceive others as accusing them of being homosexual.

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Many individuals have both homosexual and heterosexual personalities. Some individuals are primarily homosexual, often related to trauma based fear or disgust for the opposite sex. May report demonic presences attempting to involve them in homosexual activity.

Symptom: Overall oddness of presentation.

Schizophrenia

The cumulative effect of the above perceptual, cognitive, affective, social, and behavioral symptoms result in an overall clinical impression of a specific, Schizophrenic variety of oddness, or being “not right.”

Ritual Abuse/Mind Control Traumatic Stress

Overall presentation may be within normal range. In most cases, oddities of presentation contribute to a clinical picture that “does not quite make sense,” until the ritual trauma and dissociative switching are identified. The clinician often feels that “pieces are missing,” but the presentation makes sense when these factors are identified. In rare cases, dissociation and other sequelae of ritual trauma result in more profound overall subjective oddness of presentation, including oddness in vocal quality and nonverbal behavior. This uncommon form of “oddness” feels qualitatively different than that seen in cases of Schizophrenia, and becomes understandable as more subtle details of the clinical picture are discerned. For example, extreme oddness of presentation often includes acute hypervigilance, intense fear of stimuli associated with trauma, rapid switching among personalities, and executive dominance by benumbed, severely abused, previously drugged, childlike, and heavily programmed personalities.

Note: In some cases, an individual will hold both diagnoses. Childhood trauma is clearly a significant psychosocial stressor that may contribute to the neurodevelopment of Schizophrenia. And victims of ritual abuse and mind control are not exempt from the biogenetic determinants that may factor into vulnerability for Schizophrenia.

Conclusion

These guidelines provide an overview of the complex subjects of ritual abuse and trauma-based mind control, the disorders that frequently result from these abuses, factors that often contribute to the misdiagnosis of ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress as schizophrenia, and a differential diagnosis chart for easy clinical reference to distinguish between these disorders.

An expert validation study determined that this differential diagnosis chart successfully distinguished between these two populations in most cases. Using this chart, the mean expert opinion was that 91.6% of patients diagnosed with Schizophrenia were successfully differentiated from patients with Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress, and that 92% of patients with Ritual abuse/mind control traumatic stress were successfully differentiated from patients diagnosed with Schizophrenia.

In complex cases, it is recommended that clinicians not experienced in ritual abuse and mind control traumatic stress obtain consultation with colleagues with specialized knowledge, in addition to use of the chart, in order to make a differential diagnosis. In rare cases, the diagnostic questions will remain difficult.

It is our hope that these guidelines and chart for differential diagnosis will help diagnosticians recognize and properly diagnose and treat people traumatized by ritual abuse and mind control, and that their frequent misdiagnosis with Schizophrenia, and the damage that often follows, will one day be a thing of the past.

CHAPTER 5

Out of the Shadows: Re-envisioning the Debate on Ritual Abuse

Michael Salter

Presently there is no profession or body of literature with a comprehensive understanding of the dynamics of multiperpetrator child sexual abuse in developed nations. In the absence of an established discourse, some survivors of multiperpetrator abuse and their advocates have developed the language of "ritual abuse" to articulate their experiences and generate new models of care and self-management. The initial focus of ritual abuse discourse was on ritualistic forms of multiperpetrator abuse. Over time, "ritual abuse" has developed into a category of abuse that encompasses diverse forms of sexual violence that have been marginalised by mainstream debates on child abuse.

In the literature on ritual abuse, survivors and their advocates have tended to minimise or camouflage the commercial forms of sexual abuse experienced by survivors. This approach is common amongst Western discourses on abuse and trafficking, which are embedded within colonial constructions of the Western nation-state as "civilised", safe and free of systemic human rights violations. By reframing the organised sexual exploitation of children in terms of "cults" and perverse religiosity, ritual abuse discourse is complicit within a dialectic of denial that displaces multiperpetrator sexual abuse in the West onto minority groups and developing nations.

Child trafficking and sexual slavery are emerging as global concerns from which no country is immune. In the international arena, it is well recognised that some forms of sexual abuse by perpetrators of human trafficking are ritualistic in nature. This has yet to be addressed by policy-makers or law enforcement agencies in the West. In the twenty-first century, the challenge for those of us who work with survivors is to move beyond the stasis of hysteria, broaden our evidence base, and work towards an interdisciplinary and empirically grounded understanding of slavery, trafficking, and ritualistic forms of sexual abuse in the West.

Ritual Abuse as Discourse

Since the phrase was coined in 1980, “ritual abuse” has evolved into a discourse with its own vocabulary and literature. A diverse number of men and women throughout the developed world have come to identify themselves as “ritual abuse survivors.” They have in common a life story of organised sexual abuse involving multiple abusers (“multiperpetrator abuse”) with ritualistic features, and a range of severe trauma-related and dissociative disorders (Young, Sachs et al. 1991; Bloom 1994; Leavitt 1994; Jonker and Jonker-Bakker 1997). Survivors’ health needs are complex and they characteristically go unmet, although ritual abuse survivors’ interests are represented by a small number of non-government organisations, and there is an established body of psychological expertise on the treatment of ritual abuse survivors (Sinason 1994; Ross 1995; Mollon 1996; Fraser 1997; Sinason 2002). There is no authoritative definition of ritual abuse, and the term is used by survivors, and by supportive professionals and academics (“advocates”), to refer to both an abusive act, and a category of abuse. As an act, ritual abuse is generally understood to refer to sexual abuse that occurs within a ritual or ceremony, a position encapsulated by McFadyen, Hanks and James (1993, p. 37): “Ritual abuse is the involvement of children in physical, psychological or sexual abuse with repeated activities (‘ritual’) which purport to relate the abuse to contexts of a religious, magical or supernatural kind.” In the narratives of survivors, ritual abuse is often linked to other rarely acknowledged forms of abuse, such as extrafamilial abuse, the production of child pornography, child prostitution, and paedophilic sadomasochism (Driscoll and Wright 1991; Hudson 1991; Smith 1993). Over time, some survivors and advocates have come to use the phrase “ritual abuse” as a category for any experience of sadistic or organised sexual abuse, particularly those that are marginalised by mainstream child abuse discourses.

Debate on ritual abuse has been limited largely to questions about the existence of ritual abuse and the “truth” of the accounts of survivors. This debate has been enacted in both the academic and mainstream media, with a variety of professions and opinions represented within the ideologically-polarised camps. The bulk of opposition to “ritual abuse” has come from organisations and activists who hold that a significant proportion of allegations of sexual abuse are the result of mass hysteria and psychotherapeutic malpractice. The sceptic’s position on ritual abuse is most clearly articulated in the theories of “false memory syndrome” and “moral panic,” which suggest that survivors have drawn on social processes (such as psychotherapy) and cultural images (witchcraft, Satanism, etc) to construct their narratives, and that therefore their narratives are confabulations (e.g. Victor 1993; Guilliatt 1996; Ofshe and Watters 1996; Showalter 1997; Nathan and Snedeker 2001). In what is arguably a misapplication of social constructionist theory, sceptics have successively decentred survivors' lived experience and repositioning their narratives—in fact, the issue of "ritual abuse" as a whole—as disembodied textual productions that can be analysed and critiqued from afar. These positions were popularised in media reports and books throughout the 1990s, and whilst both "moral panic" and "false memory syndrome" have been robustly critiqued (Herman 1995; Hunt 1997; Olio and Cornell 1998), they continue to inform public and academic debate to some degree.

There has been little thought given to the social construction of ritual abuse discourse by people who hold survivors' accounts to be largely true. Whereas sceptics have argued that survivors' accounts are entirely fabricated, survivors and advocates have treated one another's narratives as naturalistic productions unshaped by social context or cultural milieu. Nonetheless, the briefest purview of ritual abuse literature provides ample demonstrations of the progressions of survivors and advocates from wordless shock towards the language of "ritual abuse". Hudson (1994) provides an insight into the key moment in which she connected "Satanism" to the extrafamilial abuse of her young clients:

> It became apparent that neither I nor the combined experts of several local investigative agencies had previous experience with this particular form of multi-level/multi-perpetrator/multi-victim case. For instance, we understood the modus operandi but we did not have the motivation. Sexual perversion—yes. Child pornography—yes. Sadism—yes. But why? Finally, one parent said "It sounds like Satanism." I asked "What's that?"…
> …If anything was going to be done to solve this conundrum, I would have to do it myself. So, since 1986, I have studied in depth the available literature on contemporary occult theory and practice. I have become aware of the destructiveness of certain cults and I have learned something of the techniques of cult-related sadistic abuse. (74)

Hudson's account is not unusual in the manner that the least explicable aspect of survivors accounts becomes, paradoxically, the explanatory lens through which the client's entire experience is viewed. Unlike child pornography and sexual sadism, ritual sexual activity eludes contemporary psychological and criminological analysis. As seen in Hudson's case, clinicians confronted with ritualistic multiperpetrator activity have often drawn on the existing literature on cults to fill in the gap in their understanding. In doing so, they have positioned ritual as the primary, and eventually definitive, aspect of the experiences of multiperpetrator sexual abuse, which has driven the development of ritual abuse discourse.

This emphasis on ritualistic forms of multiperpetrator abuse, and the consequent designation of perpetrator groups as “cults”, is problematic in that it presumes that the “ultimate end” or purpose of perpetrator groups is perverse religious worship. Survivors rarely, if ever, report that their primary experience of abuse is ritual sexual activity, and, where the belief systems of ritually abusive groups has been analysed, they appear idiosyncratic and synthetic, rather then doctrinal and systematic (Kent 1993b, 1993a; Scott 2001). The frequency of survivor’s reports of non-ritualistic extrafamilial abuse, and exploitation in child pornography and prostitution, also challenges the argument that perpetrators primary motivations are religious in nature (Finkelhor and Williams 1988; Bybee and Mobrey 1993; Jonker and Jonker-Bakker 1997). For many survivors, their primary abuser was a parent or relative (Driscoll and Wright 1991; Smith 1993), and their life histories include abuse within intrafamilial, extrafamilial, ritualistic and commercial settings (Lorena and Levy 1998; Scott 2001). In ritual abuse discourse, “cult” serves as an umbrella term for these fundamentally distinct contexts of abuse, and “cult member” designates all the abusers who assault the child, whether they are family members, perpetrating group members, or paying clients of the group. Within the “cult” frame of analysis, non-ritualistic and “mundane” experiences of abuse are minimised or ignored, and all abusers are presumed to be motivated by a spiritual conviction. The available evidence does not support the notion of a homogenous taxonomy of ritually abusive perpetrators and groups presumed by this position.

Ritual abuse discourse has tended to provide functionalist explanations for ritual forms of abuse. In the literature, ritualistic forms of abuse are most often characterised as either an attempt to perpetuate a perverse belief system (Core and Harrison 1991; Ryder 1992; Smith 1993; Boyd 1996), or to control and silence children during sexual exploitation (Hudson 1991; McFadyen, Hanks et al. 1993; Pooley and Wood 1994). Both of these accounts presume that perpetrators enjoy a transparent understanding of their own motivations, and of the full consequences of their actions. This presumption flies in the face of research findings on cognitive distortion and empathy deficits in sexual offenders (Abel, Gore et al. 1989; Blumenthal, Gudjonsson et al. 1999; McGrath, Cann et al. 2004). The functionalist account provided by ritual abuse discourse employs a dichotomy between belief and practice that enables commentators to avoid discussing the least palatable aspects of survivor’s disclosures; the role that the body and pleasure has to play within the perpetrator’s ethos of sexual terrorism and atrocity. The predominance of paraphiliac elements in ritual abuse survivors stories adds weight to Lanning’s (1992) argument that multiperpetrator ritual activity is not necessarily “religious” in nature, but may be more closely related to sadistic pleasure-seeking and sado-sexual experimentation. For perpetrators, ritualistic forms of abuse may have intrinsic identity-affirming, status-building, knowledge-creating or thrill-seeking value within abusive familial or subcultural environments.

Regina Louf, a survivor of the infamous Belgium child prostitution scandal, testified to the use of ritualism within a perpetrating group, describing how children were “initiated” into the group through a drugged mock-marriage to “Satan.” However, her account emphasised the polymorphously perverse sadism of the group members, who found pleasure in the transgressive nature of illegal sexual practices. Children were victimised within the group for years, although Louf challenged the notion that group members were “paedophiles” at all: I find the expression “paedophile network” misleading. For me paedophiles are those men who go to playgrounds or swimming pools, priests… I certainly don’t want to exonerate them, but I would rather have paedophiles than the types we were involved with. There were men who never touched the children. Whether you were five, ten or fifteen didn’t matter. What mattered to them was sex, power, experience. To do things they would never have tried with their own wives. Among them were some real sadists.(Louf quoted in Bulte and de Conick 1998)

Whilst Louf’s account is commensurate with narratives of ritual abuse, she resists the totalising script of “cults” and “cult members.” Louf describes instead her grandmother and mother’s responsibility for her sexual exploitation, the child traffickers who procured her for organised abuse, and a clientele of sado-sexual adventurers who found pleasure in “the power to decide over pain, life and death” (Bulte and de Conick 1998). The ritual activity Louf described was neither the primary function nor expression of the perpetrating group, but rather, inextricably bound up within a black market in sexual terrorism fed by abusive families.

Kluft, Braun and Sachs (1984) use the term “pseudo-normal veneer” to describe the stable, nurturing facade that many abusive families maintain to camouflage their true nature from observers. Louf’s account troubles the “pseudo-normal veneer” not only of transgenerationally abusive families, but of her society as a whole. Her testimony suggests that complex criminal infrastructure can be constructed and maintained within developed nations over long periods of time to facilitate the traffic in child prostitutes and pornography, and that this trade is largely dependent on the complicity of exploitative parents. In contrast, ritual abuse discourse strenuously protects core cultural images of the “family” and “society” by displacing child trafficking and sexual slavery onto “cults”, and then sublimating those crimes beneath a framework of perverse religiosity. It should not be surprising that, to date, there is not a single Western government that has responded comprehensively to the issues raised by the life histories of ritual abuse survivors. Where ritually abusive networks are uncovered, it is usually by accident rather then the product of law enforcement or surveillance (see Kelly 1998; Lyman, Johnson et al. 2005). Survivors and advocates are wont to blame this inaction on the sceptics who have discredited them and the public that has ignored them. I contend instead that the psychosocial dynamics of "ritual abuse" discourse reinforce individual and collective forms of denial, creating a hermetically sealed mechanism that contains, negates, and ultimately silences, the very voices that constitute it.

The Displacement of Sexual Slavery

Ritual abuse survivors and advocates are not alone in their reluctance to acknowledge commercial abuse and the role of the family in child trafficking in the West. These are recurring forms of denial throughout the broader debates on child sexual abuse and child trafficking. In policy and law enforcement, "the paedophile" is characterised as fixated, deviant, homosexual, more likely to have large numbers of victims and to share these victims with other offenders (Willis 1993). In contrast, sexually abusive fathers, and men who abuse girls, are considered "regressed" offenders who commit less frequent and less serious abuses "in the context of a normal sexual preference structure" (Howells 1981). These typologies were initially introduced by Groth and Birnbaum (1979), and they continue to be highly influential today, although they are based on strict distinctions between intrafamilial/extrafamilial and heterosexual/homosexual offenders have been contested by research (Abel, Becker et al. 1988; Abel and Osborn 1992).

The hegemony of a paraphiliac definition of "paedophilia" has created a disenabling environment for the serious consideration of multiperpetrator and commercial child sexual abuse. When the only policy lens on child sexual abuse is mental illness, then the factors that drive multiperpetrator abuse—such as profit, subcultural norms, social bonds and familial control—become invisible. The enduring appeal of Groth and Birnbaum's typologies to policy-makers may lie in it's displacement of "real" paedophilia onto the homophobic stereotype of the extrafamilial, homosexual pederast, which neatly circumvents uncomfortable questions around the prevalence and frequency of incest within the family and sexual attraction to children within the general community. Research has consistently demonstrated that a substantial minority of "normal" men self-report sexual interest in children (Crepault and Couture 1980; Briere 1989; Malamuth 1989), and one study found that a quarter of a sample of male volunteers demonstrated physiological arousal to a child that equalled or exceeded arousal to an adult (Hall, Hirschman et al. 1995). The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children estimates that child pornography constitutes 20% of all pornography on the Internet (2003: 3), and so we can presume not only that many men are active consumers within the child sex trade, but that their interests are being catered to by profit-driven, organised groups and networks.

Despite evidence of a substantial pool of men in the community with a sexual interest in children, as well as a multi-billion dollar black market in child pornography, there has been very little research undertaken into organised abuse, child prostitution and child pornography in the West. The paucity of discussion and consensus can be seen in the absence of a standardised vocabulary to describe the phenomenon. Descriptions of multiperpetrator abuse ranges from "sex rings" (Burgess, Hartman et al. 1984), "poly-incestuous families" (Faller 1991), "trauma-organised systems" (Bentovim 1992), "multi-dimensional child sex rings" (Lanning 1992), "Satanist abuse" (Sinason 1994), "organised sadistic abuse" (Goodwin 1994), "network child sexual abuse" (Cairns 2000) and "prostitution rings" (Cambridge Area Child Protection Committee 2006). Each of these definitions accords priority to different aspects of multiperpetrator abuse, without necessarily acknowledging the complex array of relationships and abuses which constitute these cases. Very little is known about multiperpetrator abuse, the nature of perpetrator groups, or the experience of children victimised in multiperpetrator contexts. Research into multiperpetrator or ritualistic abuse has tended towards surveys of psychotherapists and clinicians regarding their encounters with survivors (Youngson 1994; Andrews, Morton et al. 1995; McMinn and Wade 1995; Bottoms, Shaver et al. 1996; Schmuttermaier and Veno 1999) or overviews of the symptoms and experiences of small samples of survivors (Burgess, Hartman et al. 1984; Kelley 1989; Snow and Sorenson 1990; Driscoll and Wright 1991; Smith 1993; Lawrence, Cozolino et al. 1995). Few researchers (Kent 1993b, 1993a; Itzen 1997; Scott 2001) have been willing to undertake qualitative research with survivors to explore the complex dynamics of multiperpetrator abuse and the inner world of perpetrator groups.

Lacking a well-developed empirical or theoretical base, policy-makers in Australia have formulated speculative models of "organised paedophilia" that marry the homosexual pederast of "paedophile" discourse with stereotypical, Mafia-like visions of organised crime. The Paedophile Inquiry of the Wood Royal Commission was announced in 1996 to address allegations of organised paedophile activity in the state of New South Wales, Australia. The Inquiry treated intrafamilial and extrafamilial abuse as mutually exclusive categories, and its primary focus was on homosexual perpetrators and male victims (Cossins 1999). A number of submissions were made to the Paedophile Inquiry regarding multiperpetrator sexual abuse involving female victims, familial abusers and ritualistic behaviour, and Wood's (1997) dismissal of these accounts neatly summarises the implicit barriers to understanding shared by both the public and professionals:

> While it must be recognised that apparently respectable and successful members of the community do commit child sexual abuse, a quantum leap in credibility is required to suppose that they would do so in the bizarre, ritualistic way described, which includes the infliction of serious, even fatal injury and mutilation upon their own children. (671)

Woods' response is reflective of a widespread belief that intrafamilial abuse involves non-aggressive and relatively harmless sexual acts (Stermac, Hall et al. 1989). Whilst Wood could accept that intrafamilial abuse occurs, he was unable to accommodate sadistic sexual violence within his frame of reference for parenting, the family and society at large. After dismissing testimony suggesting that intrafamilial abusers were complicit in the extrafamilial sexual exploitation of their children, Wood investigated networks of homosexual offenders without significant result.

Broadly speaking, there is an unwillingness amongst policy-makers and law enforcement in the West to consider forms of sexual abuse that challenge their epistemic assumptions about transparency and predictability of their social world, and the impermeability of its regulatory systems. Recent allegations of ritual sexual activity and multiperpetrator abuse in indigenous communities in Australia (Jones 2006; Khadem 2006; Overington 2006; Smith 2006), and in migrant African communities in Britain (Clayton 2004; Vallely 2005; Woolcock 2005), have sparked timely responses from the government and credulous media coverage. In contrast, parallel claims of ritualistic, multiperpetrator abuse in urban communities in Australia and Britain (Brindle 1990; Humphries 1991; The Independent 1991), and the successful prosecutions of white ritually abusive perpetrators, (Shaw 1993; Tate 1994; Davies 1998; Towers 1998; Oberhardt and Keim 2004) have prompted neither supportive media coverage nor a targeted response by authorities. This differential is reproduced in the international arena, where, in 2002, the United Nations designated "the misuse of some ritual practices to intimidate women and girl victims of trafficking" as a research priority (Committee of Human Rights 2002). Other international organisations have noted the association between ritual sexual activity and child trafficking in developed nations (Beddoe 2005; United Nations Children's Fund 2005; Amnesty International UK 2006). As yet, the only international non-government organisation that publicly recognises ritualistic forms of abuse in Western countries is the International Organisation of Migration (2001). The United Nations and its agencies have remained largely silent on the matter, despite submissions and presentations on the ritualistic abuse of children in Australia, Canada, Costa Rica, England, Germany, Scotland, and the United States (Muntarbhorn 1992; Sarson and MacDonald 2004).

Accounts of multiperpetrator abuse evoke the "body horror" that accompanies the abject violation of physical integrity, a type of horror that the West locates outside itself and defines itself in oppositional relation to (Taylor 1998). Spectacular forms of violence are produced by the Western media as characteristic of "zones of fear" overseas, in contrast to the apparent order, safety, and transparency of the developed nation. Narratives of multiperpetrator and ritualistic abuse challenge this distinction, bringing "exotic" forms of violence into the normative spaces of the every-day, such as the family, day-care centres and churches. Survivors' life histories undermine faith in the efficacy of Western systems of law enforcement and governance, in the omniscient eye of the media, and in the fundamental benevolence of fellow citizens. Whilst the public, media, and policy-makers have largely rejected the accounts of survivors in urban and white communities, similar claims of multiperpetrator and ritualistic child abuse in black communities and developing nations has not met the same resistance. This differential may be explained by a prevailing anglo-ethnocentricity that associates ritualistic and sadistic forms of violence with racial and cultural "otherness."

Across a range of discourses, the issue of multiperpetrator sexual abuse has been displaced onto gay men, black communities, and developing nations, and sublimated within homophobic and racist stereotypes. Ritual abuse discourse is complicit in this pattern of displacement with its emphasis on cults and perverse religiosity over and above poly-abusive families and commercial sexual exploitation. The actors in this dialectic of denial range from sceptics to survivors, from journalists to clinicians, from policy-makers to the general public. They may be diametrically opposed to one another within their own sphere of debate, however, what they have in common is a desire to protect and maintain the premises upon which citizens of developed nations base their understanding of their social world. The life histories of survivors of multiperpetrator and ritualistic abuse disrupt these fundamental beliefs, and discourses on child abuse and human trafficking have been shaped, at least in part, by a desire to contain and negate the full impact of survivors' disclosures.

Beyond Denial and Displacement

The ‘bizarreness’ of the ritual ordeal, and the severity of victims’ psychological and physical distress, belies the commonplace nature of the ties that bind victims to their abusers. Ritual abuse discourse, and other discussions on child abuse and trafficking, has traditionally located non-normative forms of relationships (Satanic cults, networks of predators, etc) at the heart of organised criminal activity. However, accounts of survivors of multiperpetrator abuse (Itzen 1997; Lorena and Levy 1998; Scott 2001) paint a picture of the heterosexual family as the primary site for the organisation and camouflage of extrafamilial abuse, where a child may be prepared from birth for a lifetime of sexual exploitation by family members and their contacts. Ritually abusive groups are often constituted of two or more extended, poly-abusive familial networks who trade their children with one another and with other groups (Bentovim and Tranter 1994). Kelly notes “just as with domestic violence and child sexual abuse, most trafficking is more mundane, involving everyday, routine power and control relationships.” (Kelly 2003)

Addressing multiperpetrator sexual abuse in the West requires an expanded vision of “child sexual abuse” that can accommodate notions of slavery, trafficking, and ritualistic forms of sexual abuse. “Trafficking” and “slavery” are implicitly racial constructs that are rarely applied to Western-born victims of sexual violence. There are striking similarities between the description of child trafficking networks in Africa and ritually abusive perpetrator groups in the West. The International Organisation of Migration (IOM) notes that, in Africa, “[c]hild trafficking networks are secretive, informal, and involve rituals and cults” (2005: 83), mirroring the description of European paedophile networks provided by a German high commissioner as “secret societies” with “many different criminal organisations in active connection with each other, networks, and alliances that remain unrecognised and undetected.” (Paulus 1999 in International Organization of Migration 2001: 2108) The complicity of victims’ parents in extrafamilial abuse, and the involvement of female perpetrators in managing and grooming children within the abusive network, has been noted in both developed and developing nations (Finkelhor and Williams 1988; Itzen 1997; Scott 2001; Pearson 2003).

Cross-cultural commonalities in sadistic ritual activity in organised sexual exploitation of children include forced captivity, churches and shrines as a site of ritual activity, sexual assault, animal sacrifice, ritual scarification or branding, torture, the harvesting of bodily tissue or fluids to make a “blood pact” or “curse”, the viewing of dismembered body parts and the forced ingestion of taboo substances such as blood (Somerset 2001; di Cortemiglia 2003; Zimmerman, Yun et al. 2003; Aghatise 2004; Amnesty International UK 2006; Houreld 2006). Terror, silence and obedience are common responses to ritual abuse amongst trafficked women and children in both the West and developing nations (Kelly 2003; Aghatise 2004). Given the similarities between child trafficking groups in Africa and Europe, it is no surprise that the IOM has found linkages between them: The counselling centre Zartbitter in Cologne has for years frequently learned about the exploitation of minors in the framework of satanic rituals and the production of so-called "snuff-movies." "Children who have participated in cults report to us that primarily dark-skinned babies have been abused," says an employee. (International Organization of Migration 2001, 108–109, my italics)

Evidence from around the globe suggests that ritualistic forms of abuse are intrinsic to child trafficking and organised sexual exploitation. The precise role that ritual forms of abuse play in child trafficking has yet to be understood. Ritualistic abuse is not fully accounted for the paraphiliac model of "paedophilia" discourse, the functionalist model of ritual abuse discourse, or the profit-driven model of trafficking discourse. Fresh lens of analyses are required to move towards an understanding of perpetrator behaviour as embodied, social and iteratively related to (rather then determined by) ideology, profit and subculture. In searching for new and more comprehensive frameworks of understanding, the multidisciplinary approaches of Scott (2001) and Noblitt and Perskin (2000) may offer a new direction. They have opened ritual abuse up to the insights of anthropology, social theory and phenomenology, and, in doing so, moved beyond the insularity that has transformed the field of ritual abuse into an esoteric psychological curiosity, patrolled by "experts," and unable to draw from, or contribute to, related disciplines and bodies of theory.

In the narratives of survivors and advocates, the trauma of the ritual ordeal has overshadowed the mundane, everyday relationships that constitute child trafficking in the West, and the banal spaces of everyday life that camouflage it. Our challenge in the twenty-first century is to look beyond the costumes, ritual props, and perverse symbolism of perpetrator groups to confront the simple, brutal forms of exploitation and financial exchange that drive the traffic in the bodies of ritually abused women and children in the West.

The Politics of the "False Memory" Controversy: The Making of an Academic Urban Legend

Carl Raschke

In the spring of 1988 a small conference was convened at the Neuropsychiatric Institute (NPI) of the University of California at UCLA in Westwood. Host for the meeting was the late Dr. Jolyn West, then chairman of the NPI. West, a controversial public figure, was also at that time one of the prime movers in the anti-cult movement, while performing various advisory or leadership functions for the Cult Awareness Network (CAN) and its more credentialed professional counterpart the American Family Foundation (AFF). In attendance were various psychiatrists, professors, and administrators, including myself, some of whom were closely affiliated with CAN and AFF. I had been asked a year or so earlier to contribute my academic expertise on New Age religion and satanism to several "research projects involving cults that were overseen by AFF.

The main agenda of the select gathering was not only to provide an occasion for the various luminaries to get to know each other, but also to discuss and eventually map out a strategic plan for a new, strictly scholarly, organization that would expand significantly the "cult studies" mission of CAN and AFF. The conferees were looking to brainstorm an interdisciplinary, or "metadisciplinary," set of tasks that might possibly embrace religion, philosophy, sociology, and linguistics—to name a few fields—over and beyond the dominant psychological model of "mind control," or "coercive persuasion," which anti-cult activists routinely invoked with almost "theological" fervor. The tentative name for the new association was the Society for the Study of Social Influence (SSSI)—phraseology that had been chosen by West himself.

I gave a "theoretical" paper that was politely received, but obviously not much understood, perhaps because it sought to change both the discourse and the disciplinary approach with which the audience was comfortable. After my presentation we adjourned for lunch at a local restaurant, and it was during the casual conversation at our table over dessert that I became a participant in a series of exchanges which seemed relatively inconsequential at the time, but in retrospect can be viewed in a much more important light.

The topic was “Satanism.” The last two years of the decade of the Eighties brought the height of media coverage of satanic killings and publicized accounts by victims of what was coming to be called “satanic ritual abuse” (SRA). These trends culminated in the national shock and horror at the murder in Matamoros, Mexico during the spring of 1989 of a young Texas student named Mark Kilroy at the hands of a drug-trafficking ring that was deeply enmeshed in the occult. Because combating “destructive cults” was the mission and aim of just about everyone who had come from all over the country to Westwood, I presumed there could be little disagreement over both the scope and severity of the problem. I was wrong. One of the conference participants, who went on to publish a major book in the early 1990s lambasting what critics would term the “satanism scare,” began to fume about the torrent of reports coming from therapists and clients alike concerning SRA. Without offering justification for his position (he was not a psychologist), he went on to offer a “theory” as to why the reports were suddenly flooding in. He explained them as the result of hypnotic suggestions introduced, either deliberately or inadvertently, by the therapists themselves. He attributed such a theory to the late military psychiatrist Martin Orne, though he admitted it had not been experimentally borne out. The theory had no name, but within a few short years it would be trumpeted far and wide as the “scientific” basis for virtually all the claims of SRA. The “theory” would come to be known as “false memory syndrome (FMS).”

The SSSI never got off the ground. Indeed, it was never mentioned in subsequent communications from the organizers of the Westwood conclave. But by the early 1990s just about everyone who sat around the table at that restaurant were prominently represented in numerous conferences, newsletters, and publications as proponents and advocates of FMS.

What is, or “was,” FMS? The idea that something can be a “syndrome” suggests a pathology that has been observed, documented, analyzed, discussed, and accredited by the medical, or at least the psychiatric, community as a whole. “Syndromes” are usually symptomological patterns that are first recognized by doctors or other professionals, scrutinized, and tentatively explained in medical literature, whereupon other researchers assess their findings and refine what has already been set forth. After an appreciable period of time, which may be years, decades, or even generations, these accounts are validated in the professional literature and by professional review and standard-setting bodies as something that might legitimately be dubbed a “syndrome.” “False memory syndrome,” however, did not go through any such development or vetting. Even to this day it has not been recognized by either the medical or psychological community as a "syndrome."

Most such current syndromes are listed in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders—Fourth Edition (DSM-IV), published by the American Psychiatric Association. The manual is described on its cover as the "diagnostic criteria for the most common mental disorders including: description, diagnosis, treatment, and research findings." The "false memory syndrome" of course is not listed in the DSM-IV, which an FMS proponent might argue is understandable, inasmuch as the last edition of the manual came out in 1994. But if that were actually the case, there should still be a respectable mass of published literature that would somehow provide "description, diagnosis, treatment, and research findings." FMS advocacy groups in their own minimalist way do meet the first criterion. They depict "false memory syndrome" as the phenomenon of having "false memories," which begs the question. As for "diagnosis," the slope becomes much more slippery. In the early to mid-1990s it was common for false memory zealots to contend that memories of satanic ritual abuse were somehow "implanted" by therapists in the subconscious of their patients. This "theory" derived from a loose analogy with the phenomenon of "hypnotic suggestion," which has been identified, but not completely comprehended, by psychological researchers for far more than a century.

Most "suggestion" obviously is performed systematically and logistically by the hypnotherapist, although the regular use of the concept in social psychology, particularly when applied to group dynamics, tends to be metaphoric. The early version of the exposition of "false memory syndrome" stressed that some therapists for various nefarious reasons deliberately sought to persuade their clients while in trance that they had been ritually abused as children. But generally, and increasingly over the years, the notion of an intentional induction of bogus memories blended with the older, and quite legitimate, principle that our recall after a while is often clouded by, or conflated with, more immediate images, sensations, or other incidents for which we have lost the temporal reference. This process is known as "confabulation," and a few more recent experiments allegedly "illustrating" false memory on analysis turn out to be simple demonstrations of confabulation. The so-called "shopping mall" experiment is a case in point. Common sense, rather than psychiatry, shows that memory is fallible and often concocts a certain amount of content to "fill in the holes" where details are lacking. Childhood memories are even more problematic. The real question is whether memories can be routinely and systematically created ex nihilo without any biographical template behind them. According to false memory syndrome, they can, although the agency, other than “iatrogenic” or therapist-induced mechanisms, is never spelled out.

When it comes to “treatment,” false memory partisans have no recommendations, let alone data. The only “treatment” of the “syndrome” would be for other professionals to deny its existence. Virtually all of the literature on “false memory” is both political and polemical. Some of it might also be characterized as “hysterical,” even while FMS adherents themselves are fond of “explaining” both ritual and sexual abuse claims as due to generalized social hysteria inflamed by a sensation-seeking mass media. In an article entitled “The Memory Wars” Elizabeth Loftus, a well-known, but controversial academic psychologist currently employed at the University of California at Irvine, recounts how her discovery that memory is “malleable” led to extensive and unwarranted persecution.

“Sometimes the battle for truth in science comes at great personal cost,” the article begins. “Elizabeth Loftus knows that firsthand. Her decades of research showed that memory—whether eyewitness testimony in a court or our most private and personal recollections—is malleable and easily distorted. But these discoveries landed her in the middle of a cultural war that changed her life irrevocably and continues to this day.” According to her own accounts, Loftus’ files were seized by the University of Washington after she investigated the personal story of an anonymous abuse survivor and debunked it in the pro-FMS magazine The Skeptical Inquirer. Loftus was accused by the survivor of violating her privacy and by the university of violating human subjects research statutes, which are subject to tough enforcement by the federal government. The university eventually was compelled to back down because Loftus’ article in the Inquirer did not meet the strict legal test of “human subjects research.” But the fracas prompted her to take another position at UC Irvine, where she continues the fight against “false memory.” “It is an unsettling fact that we can manufacture, wholesale and out of pure nothingness, whole events and pasts that never occurred. This fantastical creative ability of our minds may be treasured when it produces King Lear or War and Peace, but it can sometimes destroy lives and families when applied to ordinary, daily life. When it comes to legal cases—and the fate of a defendant—precise memory about even the tiniest of details can be crucial.”[1]

Loftus clearly has an agenda. In a way that is quite atypical of university professors, she has converted her once narrow academic specialty into an advocacy campaign. She has taken her battle against “false memory” out of the classroom and into the courtroom and pressroom. According to an article written by a reporter for The Orange County Register, the local newspaper for UC Irvine, Loftus “has testified for the defense in more than 250 cases, saying that you can’t trust memory." She was even sought by the defense, according to the article, in the case of John Demjanjuk, the Ohio autoworker who was eventually found guilty of holocaust-related war crimes at the Nazi death camp Treblinka.

Fancifully and gratuitously describing Loftus as "the most influential female psychologist of the past century," the article recounts how the national press is beating down her door to get the genuine skinny on the science of memory. "Less than a month into her new job in Irvine, an "NBC Nightly News" crew is in her office. Down the hall, waiting their turn, are folks from the Discovery Channel. CNN is calling at 2 p.m. She is absolutely at ease, citing her own research, explaining in sound-bite fashion how memory, especially of a crime, gets distorted. The phone rings. 'Why do people lie in such cases?' she repeats into the receiver. 'I could guess, but I'm not an expert on lying. You're going to need to find yourself another psychologist." The Baltimore Sun reporter rethinks his position and asks another question. She begins to explain what she is an expert in. That would be the porousness of memory, how it can adapt itself to new information and make it its own; how it can be fooled; how it can invent; how it can be recounted with confidence, emotion and detail and still be wrong. She proved in study after study that the mind is not some videotape device that we can count on for accuracy and clarity. She has shown that memory is highly susceptible to seduction by suggestion. That what we remember is colored by what we expect to see, what we're told we've seen, what we want to see, what we are asked to see."

According to the piece in the Register, it has been Loftus' dogged crusade, particularly against "recovered memory therapy," that has "turned the tide" against the legal and common-sense view that memory is generally trustworthy. "At a meeting this year of the American Psychiatric Association, a team of panelists determined that Recovered Memory Treatment controversy was dead."[2] Well, not exactly. The website of the American Psychiatric Association has a quite different take on where the "controversy" is at present, and where it is going. A statement posted in 1996 notes that the APA's board recognizes "that the problem of separating false from true memories of abuse is compounded by the complex nature of memory itself." The statement quotes then APA president John S. McIntyre. "'Human memories are not like fixed images in a family photo album. They can be shaped by a variety of influences at the time of the event and in later years."

The statement notes a number of coping stratagems of sexually abused children which "result in a lack of conscious awareness of the abuse for varying periods of time. Conscious thoughts and feelings stemming from the abuse may emerge at a later date." Furthermore, "there is no doubt that sexual abuse of children and adolescents leads to severe negative consequences, and is a risk factor for many classes of psychiatric disorders. Child sexual abuse is a public health problem that must not be swept under the rug either in the community or in the doctor's office, but must be dealt with forthrightly and responsibly." According to McIntyre, "we are especially concerned that the public confusion and dismay over this issue and the possibility of false accusations not discredit the reports of patients who have indeed been traumatized by actual previous abuse."[3] The APA has neither "settled" the memory debate, nor has it in any way signed off on the FMS version of why strange and horrendous memories are routinely "recovered" through therapy. It still stands for the most part by the official DSM-IV account of "recovered memory," codified in 1994, which clearly recognizes the legitimacy and symptomatology of the phenomenon in general. What the FMS ideologues term "recovered (i.e., 'false') memory" the DMS-IV dubs "dissociative amnesia." "Dissociative amnesia is characterized by an inability to recall important personal information, usually of a traumatic or stressful nature, that is too extensive to be explained by ordinary forgetfulness…. The reported duration of the events for which there is amnesia may be minutes to years…. Some individual with chronic amnesia may gradually begin to recall dissociated memories."[4]

One of the basic problems with the so-called "memory debates" is that they do not really add up to a scientific controversy at all. If "false memory syndrome" is put forth as "science," it is at this point in history nothing more than junk science. If one carefully follows the etiology as well as the rhetoric of these "debates," one quickly discovers that they constitute nothing more than claims and counterclaims by high-visibility and media-savvy protagonists, some of whom do indeed have serious academic credentials, that rarely rise beyond the level of mere opinion or conjecture. It is remarkable that the media itself, which gave wide berth to the "debate" at its onset in the early 1990s, has never bothered to examine the measure of scientific evidence, other than a few inconclusive anecdotes offered by FMS advocates who spuriously purport to have the backing of "science," on which the plausibility of the alleged "syndrome" is founded.

The "debate" has also been increasingly driven not by new experimental findings, as one would expect of a bona fide "scientific" wrangle, but by expanding rosters of PhDs who either support or discount the existence of "false memory syndrome." Sometimes it comes down to nothing more than whether a particular professor loves or hates Freud. Many would-be FMS "supporters" have no more technical competence in the psychology of memory than English professors who protest against the Iraq war have expertise in foreign policy. The polarization of the field, echoed in countless Internet websites, forums and email discussion lists, has not come about because of substantial conflicting research data about the reliability of memory. It boils down to an ongoing series of passionately moral polemics concerning whether the “true” victims of sexual and ritual abuse are those who have recovered their memories of past traumas or those who have been (wrongfully) accused as perpetrators.

As with any witness testimony in a forensic setting, much more than the content of the testimony itself is at stake. The reliability of the testimony is just as much the question. Whereas in the past the general reliability of human memory—even to a large extent “recovered” memory—was never seriously questioned, the FMS publicity campaign has had the odd effect of casting doubt on whether memory itself can be trusted. The long-term consequences of such a change of public attitude can be staggering, particularly when it pertains to rules of evidence in a court of law, since the FMS “methodology” is anchored in the raw epistemological presumption that all memories can easily be altered, or manipulated, by both witting and unwitting agents of influence.

While the limited quantity of psychological research demonstrating the fungibility of human recollection, frequently referenced by “false memory” proponents, is actually founded on intentional subterfuges crafted by the experimenter, FMS arguments take one giant, additional stride and contend that pseudo-recall is just as likely to be the outcome of unconscious intervention on the part of sundry “helping professions,” or even mysterious and unquantifiable social factors such as “mass hysteria,” whatever that implies. The gang-messaging in the media by FMS enthusiasts fosters the deceptive impression that a purely political ideology somehow has a solid academic foundation beneath it.

Whereas the FMS movement may have had the salutary effect of heightening skepticism about “memories” that in some cases may have been given too much credibility in criminally convicting reputed perpetrators, the benefits have been grossly outweighed by its undercutting the role of witness testimony overall. As Martin Korn argued at an APA gathering, memory “is often the critical factor in analyzing the impact of the event and determining a suitable course. Memory is frequently fragmentary, however, and is experienced only as sensory perceptions. Subsequent life experiences may alter memory of the event. This makes accurate reporting of the event difficult. The validity of recovered memories has come under increasing scrutiny because of the possibility of false accusations. In one study, the rate of documented trauma was approximately 74% in both recovered as well as always-remembered memories. It should not be assumed that recovered memories never occurred or that always-remembered memories actually took place.”[5]

But that assumption is increasingly becoming the norm, thanks to the FMS campaign against the authenticity of memory. One of the most acerbic and influential instruments in the FMS propaganda arsenal has been a book published in 1994 by Richard Ofshe and Ethan Watters titled Making Monsters: False

Memories, Psychotherapy, and Sexual Hysteria. Ofshe is a professor of social psychology from the University of California at Berkeley. Watters is a self-described "freelance magazine writer" who wrote for the far-left political rag Mother Jones prior to partnering with Ofshe and, more recently, published Urban Tribes, a Soho-style, self-aggrandizing stab at pseudo-sociology that offers the remarkable thesis that Generation-X America is exactly like the now defunct television show Friends. Promoted on the book jacket as "the definitive account of the most pressing social and psychological issue of our time," Making Monsters is described as well as "groundbreaking science with powerful stories." Of course, the book contains very little science and it does not even bother to review even the minimal body of scientific literature on memory. Instead it is a relentless drum riff of sarcasm and innuendo, paraphrasing carefully culled news accounts of high profile abuse cases that are rarely dissected, but merely held up to gratuitous ridicule. The book takes particular exception to pop psychology and feminism in a consistently melodramatic style that leaves the misogynistic impression that women in general, and women therapists in particular, are flighty, hysterical, paranoid, or stupid, while such "hard-nosed" observers as the authors have assembled the true facts of the matter. "The promoters of recovered memory therapy have begun to claim that they are the targets of a 'backlash' organized by a well-funded conspiracy of forces aligned against women and victims. To be inside the recovered memory movement is to be in an echo chamber in which only information that confirms the effectiveness of the therapy and the reality of repressed memories is allowed."[6] The authors even go so far as to refer to "recovered memory" as an "epidemic" as if it were some kind of disease that their brave new "science" will, like the erstwhile scourges of cholera, yellow fever, and polio, effectively eradicate.

What do other scientists say, however, about the "science" of false memory? Apart from the false memory flacks themselves, the consensus is not overwhelmingly flattering. Ken Pope has pointed out that the notion of "recovered memory"—what was classically termed "repressed memory"—is neither an "iatrogenic" disorder nor a pseudo-science, as Ofshe and Watters contend. It is an established psychiatric theory—not just Freudian speculation—with landmark experiments and confirming data going as far back as the 1930s. Even Loftus, who has lately excoriated "true believers" in recovered memory, was once a true believer herself.[7] Rather than representing a pseudo-scientific and journalist-abetted craze of the 1980s, as Ofshe and Watters portray it, recovered memory was actually a loose consensus of the psychiatric community until the real pseudo-science of "false memory syndrome," which went to the media long before it could convince the professional world of its claims, came along.

There is serious skepticism as well about Ofshe and Watter's paradigm story to illustrate the "science" of false memory studies. In building his career Ofshe has made much of his own allegedly groundbreaking "experiment" in the late 1980s that unearthed the artifact of false memories. Ofshe and Watters recount this episode in detail in their book, which was the subject as well of Lawrence Wright's Remembering Satan, again published in 1994.[8] The episode involved accusations against Paul Ingram, a respected leader in the Olympia, Washington community, by his two daughters, who believed their father had sexually abused them. Ingram admitted to the crime after detectives assisted him in recovering his own memories of the incidents the two girls alleged. Ofshe was called in as an "expert" to help the district attorney make progress in the case, and he purportedly made a "discovery" about Paul's process of remembering what happened that helped generate the discourse of "false memory syndrome."

In their abstract to an article titled "The Façade of Scientific Documentation: A Case Study of Richard Ofshe's Analysis of the Paul Ingram Case," psychologists Karen Olio and William Cornell comment as follows: "The case of Paul Ingram, a man who pleaded guilty to sexually abusing his daughters, has received widespread media attention. Richard Ofshe (1992, 1994) set forth a narrative of the case which included his account of an experiment to test the veracity of Ingram's confessions and concluded that the inadvertent use of hypnosis during Ingram's interrogation resulted in the creation of pseudo-memories that convinced Ingram of his guilt. On the basis of an examination of the original source documents, the authors discuss the errors of fact, methodological flaws, and confounding factors in Ofshe's rendering of this case of alleged child abuse. They also cite examples of the extent to which Ofshe's imperfect narrative of this case and pseudoscientific conclusions have been uncritically accepted and repeated in the literature, thus becoming an academic version of an urban legend."[9]

How did this "urban legend" emerge? Ofshe and Watters give their own account of what happened, which is interesting to say the least. "While interviewing Paul, Ofshe began to suspect that Paul was not confessing to crimes he had actually committed but was self-inducing trance and imagining crimes suggested to him. To confirm his suspicion, Ofshe conducted an experiment. He invented and told Paul the story that one of his daughters and one of his sons had accused Paul of forcing them to have sex with each other while Paul watched. This accusation was entirely fabricated… Asked if he could remember the event, Paul replied that he could not… [Then] Ofshe instructed him to attempt to remember the scene. Paul closed his eyes and sat silently for several minutes and then said he was beginning to see the scene that Ofshe had outlined." Later, according to Ofshe and Watters, Paul described the confabulated scene in detail. "Presenting the written confession to Ofshe, Paul seemed almost proud of his memory work. He was confident that his memory was accurate and that the scene had take place the way he said it had."[10]

In other words, a deliberate and thoughtfully devised subterfuge of false memory induction is used to inaugurate the universal claim of "false memory syndrome." That is like saying the deliberate making of a phony bomb threat "demonstrates" that all bomb scares are hoaxes, which is of course ridiculous. As an anecdotal note Ofshe, who happened to be a visiting lecturer at my own university about the time of this "experiment," claimed the outcome of the Ingram case would "disprove" all satanic ritual abuse claims. Ofshe and Watters deduce from this "experiment" that the detectives interviewing Ingram inadvertently "implanted" the memories of sexual abuse in his mind, a fallacy of "scientific" reasoning if there ever was one. The common sense explanation of what happened in the Ingram case leaps out from the authors' own account. Ofshe did not merely "suggest" to Ingram under hypnosis that he had forced his daughter and son to have sex with each other. As an "expert" hired by the DA, he reported the claim—and not at all while Paul was in a trance state—as a genuine accusation. Since Paul already believed he was guilty of sexual abuse, it is not extraordinary that he might "fill in the details." The event only "proves" that Paul had an active imagination, not that he had been "coerced" into confessing a crime he did not, in fact, commit. It is not up to a prosecutor to dissuade someone from their own confession any more than therapists are supposed to tell clients they are imagining things from the past, when in fact they have no basis to draw inferences either one way or the other. The irony is that Ofshe, according to his own version of the story, could not "dissuade" Paul even by means of the subterfuge that he was mistaken about a memory that the experimenter somehow "knew" he did not commit. "While to Ofshe the experiment proved that Paul had created a false memory, the encounter had a negligible effect on Paul's faith in the memories he was uncovering… [Paul] is now serving out a twenty-year sentence in prison."[11]

As an update, Ingram was released from prison in May 2003 and required to register as a sex offender. He subsequently took a polygraph test in which he denied having sexually touched his daughters. He passed the polygraph test, which consisted of only three questions. In the meantime, an entire organization based in Spokane, Washington has been formed to champion Ingram's innocence and to publicize his conviction and incarceration as one more grievous miscarriage of justice due to the implantation of false memories. Daniel Brailey, founder of the Ingram organization, writes on its website: "This is the story of Paul Ingram, an active charismatic Christian in Washington state who was admired not only among his Christian friends at the Church Of Living Water, but also in the community, where he was a long-time Thurston County deputy sheriff and chairman of the local Republican party. In 1988 his two daughters accused him and a number of prominent men in the community of satanic ritual abuse and sexual abuse. There were months of whispered rumors, extensive questioning, and finally, arrest, incarceration, interrogation, and even an exorcism to 'cast out' the evil that Paul's pastor was convinced caused Paul to perform such insidious acts. After all this Paul confessed, pled guilty without a trial, and served a lengthy sentence in a state prison. What is especially startling about Paul's case, however, is that neither he nor many people with the most knowledge of the case believe he is guilty. Instead, he has become a victim of the child abuse/satanic ritual abuse hysteria of the late 1980's."[12]

The above is stereotypical FMS rhetoric. It employs a formulaic medley of factual distortions, exaggerations, emotionally charged language and ideological codewords, pseudo-scientific assertions, indignant protestations of bigotry and persecution, mockery of religious belief, and the usual tiresome "witch hunt" metaphors to convince the reader that there can be no debating the merits of the case. No matter what the circumstances of the case, the syntax is always the same, and the plot line is as predictable as a 1920's silent movie. Everyone accused of abuse is somehow the victim of overzealous religious fanatics, who make unwarranted, irrational, and self-serving charges, which are incredibly accepted uncritically by virtually all social service and criminal justice professionals assigned to the case, who are responsible for "brainwashing" the alleged perpetrator or witnesses to the crime. This mysterious process of "mass hysteria" is then amplified in the media, which feeds back upon itself, which finally causes a total travesty of justice which the FMS people in the white hats are duty-bound to redress. By reading FMS literature one could easily draw the conclusion that the entire American justice system is no better than that of the rural south in the days of lynchings and the Ku Klux Klan. The Salem witch trials of the seventeenth century are always the touchstone for comparison.

But what really happened in the Ingram case? Writing in the Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy and citing actual court documents, Paul Cassell observes: that "three psychologists testified for the state and 'generally agreed that Ingram's statements were real recollections and not the products of any alleged trances or hypnosis.' One, a family counselor hired by the defense, submitted a report 'that reflected statements by Ingram acknowledging long-term abuse of his children and involvement in 'incest, sodomy, and homosexual activity.'" According to Cassell's account, the judge in the case noted that Ingram had made his confession before interaction with therapists, or anyone capable of planting "false memories" in the way that the FMS model stipulates. He also determined that the three state psychologists were more credible in their expert testimony than Ofshe. Finally, he pointed out that since Ingram was a law enforcement official himself who knew all about the rules of evidence and the standards of confession, it would have been highly unlikely for him to have admitted guilt merely as a result of hypnotic suggestion. “In addition, the judge found that Ofshe conducted an ‘odd’ experiment in an effort to show Ingram was spouting back information fed to him by the police. While Ingram confessed to a scenario fed to him by Ofshe, Ofshe had chosen facts that ‘came pretty close to what one of the victims had accused the defendant of’ rather than something ‘totally foreign from anything that could probably be true.’ With respect to Ofshe’s claim (based on ‘reading a dry record’) that Ingram was in an ‘hypnotic state, or in a trance’ when he confessed, the trial judge stated: ‘I find that to be strange. I wonder if that can be done [i.e., determining that someone is in a hypnotic state from merely reading a transcript]. I have great cause for concern with that.’ The judge also found it strange that two weeks after Ingram pled guilty, Ofshe contacted him. Ofshe told Ingram, ‘You’re innocent,’ to which Ingram responded, ‘No, I’m guilty.’ A few weeks later, Ingram switched to agree with Ofshe.”[13]

It is clear that the FMS movement is more than a purveyor of “urban legends,” which are unself-conscious byproducts of human communication and information dissemination rather than a sustained agenda to disrupt the judicial process itself and to create a handy, pseudo-academic covering theory for defense cases in which witness confusion or intimidation is present. The technique is purely propagandistic and political, and exploits to the hilt the fair-minded observer’s anxiety that innocent parties, regardless of the evidence at hand, might somehow be railroaded or maligned.

In the early days of the FMS campaign this propaganda tactic successfully converted growing public concern about occult-related crime, which was documented not only in news accounts but also in court records and continues to be reported worldwide, into what cult-apologist Jeffrey S. Victor cleverly named “satanic panic,” arguing that various grisly murders, church and cemetery desecrations, and teenage suicides were themselves nothing more than a “legend” contrived by “moral crusaders” invoking a “scapegoating metaphor about the origins of evil forces which are threatening the moral order of society.”[14] “Satanic panic” was regularly summoned as a covering theory to bolster the idea of “false memory syndrome.” The sinister “Christian fundamentalist” always popped up as the counterfoil to the paradigmatic “evil Satanist.” As with all covering theories, these accounts were routinely short on data and long on bombastic “explanations.” Genuine information that could be dispassionately evaluated was surgically excised. Whenever pretending to reference actual “cases,” both “satanic panic” and FMS adherents always cited extreme situations, or absurd testimonies, which had already gained public visibility and later collapsed, as if somehow these straw men were somehow reflective of the whole. Their literature constantly recounts various "rumors" in rural or small-town contexts, many of which were never reported in even the local papers, but are somehow considered counterevidence to the very hypothesis of "satanic crime." After the propagandists had declared their victory over "satanic panic" in the mid-to-late 1990s, they turned their attention to "false" or "forced confessions" purportedly elicited by "overzealous" cops in apprehending notorious criminals, or serial killers. Another "epidemic" had to be staunched. In this age of terrorist alerts and the search for Al-Qaida operatives in America, the dastardly FBI interrogator will probably replace the "hypervigilant," squint-eyed Christian fundamentalist in the FMS advocate's gallery of villains.

Every scheme of martyrology, of course, must have its arch-atrocity, if not its historically defining moment. For both FMS and "satanic panic" enthusiasts that incident is the McMartin pre-school case of the 1980s. A stock prejudicial summary of the McMartin case can be found today on the website www.religioustolerance.org, operated by the Ontario (Canada) Consultants on Religious Tolerance, an anonymous for-profit organization with a major web presence that aggressively promotes the view that all religious practices, no matter how noxious they may appear, are somehow deserving of "freedom" and "respect." Although it claims to air "all sides" in any debate, the website merely parrots the FMS propaganda line with regard to repressed memories and allegations of satanic crime.

"'McMartin' was one of the first Multi-Victim Multi Offender (MVMO) child abuse cases," an entry on the website declares. "It lasted six years—the longest US criminal trial in history. At a cost to the state of $15 million, it was also the most expensive. No convictions were obtained. The main evidence of abuse was based on what the children testified were memories of repeated, sadistic, ritual molestation. Years later, child psychologists realized that such memories can be easily implanted in children's minds by the interview techniques which were used at the time. Since psychologists and police investigators have changed their methods of interrogating young children, no more MVMO cases have surfaced in the U.S. and Canada… The hoax adversely affected the lives of hundreds of children, who are now young adults… Many feminists and others still believe that the children were subjected to horrendous abuse at McMartin."[15]

Obviously, the FMS propaganda would like to have everyone believe, there never was any substance to the allegations. Pre-school children, aided and abetted by their parents, the media, psychologists, and the courts, crafted an elaborate and sophisticated prank of some strange sort. "Scholars" like Victor go even further.

“The ritual abuse scare is the social creation of a late twentieth century witch hunt,” he pontificates. “There is no verifiable evidence for claims about a Satanic cult ritual abuse conspiracy. However, there is abundant evidence that an increasing number of moral crusaders are creating a form of deviant behavior, which exists only in their preconceptions. The victims of this rush to judgment include children who are traumatized by the emotional overreaction and repeated interrogations by well-meaning child protection workers. The victims include children who are taken away from parents who have been falsely accused of ritual sex abuse.”[16]

However, a funny thing happened on the way to the propagation of another “academic urban legend” concerning McMartin. Evidence matching the testimony of the children at the pre-school was, in fact, found. The evidence was gathered by a professional archaeological team digging at the McMartin site after the trial was over. The crux of the children’s testimony about ritual abuse involved their collective contention that they had been taken to ceremonial sites in tunnels beneath the pre-school. The original investigators for the district attorney’s office were unable to verify the tunnel claims, and FMS advocates for years have ridiculed the “failure” to find the underground passageways which the kids swore they had traversed. The report is lengthy, detailed, highly technical, and contains numerous photographs of the tunnels that were excavated as well as some distinctly “occult” objects amid the dig, including a plate with a pentagram. “In terms of the second and major goal of the project,” the report comments, “to ascertain the presence or absence of the tunnel(s) and/or underground room(s) under the preschool based on reports made by the children… the following recovered data is relevant. The feature first encountered in Classroom #1, Unit q (toilet and adjacent floor area) was followed into the Office (Unit 1) and from there to the Office toilet room… The feature that conforms scientifically to those attributes that identify it as a tunnel was the one uncovered under the northern E/W axis of the preschool… There was an identified entrance, large enough for adult human passage, leading from the surface down to the underground. It is notable that the entrance was located in the exact area that was concentrated upon by the District Attorney’s archaeological excavation in 1985 due ‘to the reports of the children’ of a tunnel entrance and buried ‘room.’”[17]

The report, finished in the early 1990s, concludes that the construction date of the tunnels is after 1966, and that the space had been “recently” filled in. “It is remarkable that the McMartin Preschool site was not properly investigated for such evidence,”[18] the report observes with an allusion to what most experts agree was a botched investigation on the part of the DA’s office. “It is concluded that the District Attorney’s Office archaeological project was inappropriately restricted in where excavation could take place.”[19]

While a few, scattered web commentaries by FMS hacks have tried to question the credentials of the archaeological team, which requires some imagination, and to offer rather flimsy contrary interpretations of the evidence, their efforts have been unsuccessful. The short historical memory of the American public as to the McMartin case itself, the relentless propaganda of the FMS claque, and the lack of press interest in a case that legally cannot be easily re-opened, has fostered the misleading impression that the SRA controversy and the "memory wars" have been settled once and for all. The opposite is true. Now that the twin academic urban legends of a "false memory epidemic" and national "satanic panic" have run their course, it may be time for serious professionals without an intemperate ideological axe to grind to start digging again into what really happened in the 1980s and early 1990s.

CHAPTER 7

Interrelated Moral Panics and Counter-panics: The Cult Brainwashing Panic and The False Memory/ Ritual Abuse Moral Panic

Martin H. Katchen

Moral panic theory, first defined by Cohen (1972) and defined more extensively by Erich Goode and Nachman ben Yehudah (1994), has been a useful theoretical construct, enabling students of social deviance to explore just how it is that a given behavior becomes defined as deviant. But there are certain drawbacks to moral panic theory as Goode and Ben Yehudah define it that limits its usefulness as a research tool.

Firstly, the criterion of disproportionality (Goode & ben Yehudah, 1994, pp. 43–44) is problematic (Schneider 1985). Goode and Ben Yehudah claim that by limiting the definition of moral panic to issues where objective criteria of disproportionality are met, the concept is protected from strict social constructionist criticism. Social constructionists allege that since all views of reality are relative and subjective, there can be no "panic" since there is no objective reality against which to measure social concern (ibid. p.36). Goode and ben Yehudah claim that it is possible to remedy this defect by using objective criteria of disproportionality including 1) exaggeration of figures in claims of the seriousness of the problem 2) the attention paid to a given social problem exceeds the attention paid to another social problem whose damage is as great or greater according to objective criteria such as lives lost or economic cost and 3) whether the attention paid to the problem is greater than it has been before or after without an equivalent change in the damage caused by the problem (ibid. p. 42). The problem with this definition is that there is little evidence that social concern is mobilized any differently in cases where Goode and ben Yehudah's criteria of disproportionality are not met. Panic is an emotion and a pattern of behavior and it is possible to see it in situations where a vigorous response is seen to be appropriate as much as when a vigorous response is seen in retrospect to have been inappropriate. Wilson Goode points up the fact that in the War on Drugs, which has spanned eight decades, certain procedures for fomenting a moral panic were followed. The enemy (drugs, drug dealers, and sometimes drug users) were made into folk devils. Atrocity stories about drugs were told. Politicians and activists from Henry Anslinger (banning marijuana in 1937) to New Jersey Governor Christine Whitman (prosecuting needle exchanges) engage in moral entrepeneurship, profiting politically by the issue. And the prohibitionist response to the problem, according to Wilson Goode, is greatly disproportionate to the actual harm that illicit drugs cause, as the Swiss recently concluded when they agreed by referendum to supply heroin to addicts.

The problem is that moral panic is also fomented in response to problems, which are severe and serious, by any objective standard. The lead-up to World War II was marked by the demonization of Nazis and "Japs," which resulted in Japan being embargoed for its refusal to withdraw from China. Atrocity stories (true) about the Rape of Nanking were told in the press, with similar atrocity stories being told in press and film about the Nazis. The movie Casablanca is a good example of propaganda which just happened to be largely true aimed at mobilizing public opinion in favor of American involvement in World War II. And Winston Churchill and Franklin Delano Roosevelt acted as moral entrepreneurs, gaining politically as they convinced their respective countries that war was justified. And there are far fewer grounds for the opinion that the British and American decision to fight Nazi Germany and Japan was disproportionate to the problem the aggressive behavior of those two nations posed to the peace of the world. We see the same procedures for fomenting a moral panic, including making the enemy into a folk devil, atrocity stories and moral entrepeneurship being followed in both examples.

Secondly, moral panics rarely exist independently of one another. Moral panics do not necessarily end either by vanishing without a trace as the consensus for it evaporates or by becoming routinized or institutionalized. In many cases, moral panics can end because the behavior of those moral entrepreneurs identified by the public with the moral panic can be perceived by the public as outrageous enough to create a moral counter-panic against the moral entrepreneur and the original moral panic. Such was arguably the case when the public behavior of Joseph McCarthy in his crusade against domestic Communism in the US became so outrageous as to create a moral panic against McCarthyism. A more contemporary example was the current moral panic against the Clinton Administration and the counter-panic fomented by the Democrats against Kenneth Starr and the Republicans who were prosecuting the President.

Moreover, this process need not and often does not occur sequentially. Just because another group of people defines a group of people as deviant does not mean that that group of people being so defined will passively accept that definition. The response to being defined as deviant very often results in the group that would be defined as deviant to attempt to mobilize to rectify that status by creating a moral panic against the first group (impeaching the prosecutor). Thus one can have ongoing mutual moral panics between elements of society or between different societies with each being seen as the folk devil of the other. This is especially true in cases of war between nations. In fact it is difficult in an age of mass communications and mass mobilization to sustain a war between nations without generating a moral panic among one's citizenry against the designated enemy.

Thus to abandon the disproportionality criterion for moral panics makes the concept of moral panic much more useful as a tool of analysis than to attempt to limit the definition to cases where disproportionality can be proven to exist. To restrict the definition as Goode and Ben Yehudah have done requires the researcher to prove disproportionality in order to use moral panic theory. Conversely the researcher must use the other criteria in order to prove that the amount of energy given to a particular social problem is disproportionate to the problem and thus to ridicule a social problem as a moral panic. This may be useful if the researcher is engaging in polemic, but it can be intellectually dishonest. The disproportionality criteria restrict the utility of a concept that can be quite useful in understanding a wide variety of social situations where mobilization occurs. The expanded definition of moral panics is thus more illuminating and therefore more useful to the social scientist.

An analysis of the interrelationship between the moral panics over brainwashing in the 1950s, the debate over brainwashing by "destructive cults" in the 1970s and 1980s and the moral panics over satanic ritual abuse and false memory syndrome will serve to illustrate this point. Brainwashing, cult brainwashing and false memory syndrome form a chain of moral panics which are in many ways linear successors of one another, with the ideology of each moral panic being used as a foundation upon which the next is built. To understand one as the successor and in some cases, adversary of the other can illustrate how moral panics interrelate with one another.

Prelude: War in the Age of Ideology

World War I marked the end of the 19th Century Age of Imperialism. During the 19th Century, Western nations had competed with one another for power and influence and to carve out spheres of influence in the rest of the World. The dominant social ethos of that time was nationalism with a greater or lesser degree of representative government. Loyalty to one's country was accepted as a given.

The devastation of World War I opened the door to a number of very different models of social organization. Beginning with the formation of the Soviet Union out of the Russian Empire in 1917–1921, states began to be formed and previously existing states shaped by ideologies. These ideologies were coherent belief systems that purported to justify new methods of social organization and state formation on purportedly scientific premises. These ideology based states were often (though not invariably) highly authoritarian with political power and authority centered in a relatively small group of people (or party) that purported to be the most advanced or vanguard elements of the new society according to the ideology.

The formation of the Soviet Union according to the ideology of Marxist-Leninism proved to be only the first of the modern ideological states. It was quickly followed by Italy under Mussolini's fascist ideology. Later, during the Great Depression, Germany became an ideological state under Nazism and Japan under its Kokutai or Imperial mythos. Still later, the Marxist Leninist People's Republic of China would be formed under the leadership of Mao Ze-dong.

The United States became an ideologically oriented nation at this time as well, although without the anti-democratic social organization of the Soviet Union or the other previously listed states. During the Progressive Era, an ideology developed that melded the social conscience of the Social Gospel Movement of Rauschenbusch and others with the logical positivism of Thomas Dewey and the missionary internationalism of Woodrow Wilson. Eclipsed during the 1920s by nativism and isolationism, this ideology fell once more into favor during the 1930s during Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal.

All of these ideologies emphasized the importance of mobilizing the people that made up their societies to work hard and sacrifice for a better tomorrow. To accomplish this, all these ideological societies, using the theory of Georges Sorel, constructed unifying myths. This myth could be world socialism in the Soviet Union, lebensraum in the case of Nazi Germany, or even the revived vision of a world without war in the United States during the World War II years. In each case, keeping one's countrymen believing in the ideology and the mobilizing myth became a key concern, particularly when ideologically based nations moved to war with other ideologically based nations.

September 1st, 1939, marked the beginning of a conflict between ideologies and belief systems that was to last fifty years, until the fall of the Berlin Wall and may yet be resumed. During this conflict, both Germany and the U.S. made heavy use of guerrillas, local partisan units and fifth columns. Germany formed many Waffen SS units from captured prisoners-of-war. Moreover, even in the United States, Nazi-sympathizer groups such as the German-American Bund agitated against American entry into the war right up until Pearl Harbor. Nazi psychological warfare capabilities began to concern the Allies. This concern was heightened after the defeat of Nazi Germany, when it became apparent that the Soviet Union would not accept American world hegemony and intended to continue the ideological struggle.

Moral panics rarely begin with mass mobilization. Before a situation can be seriously considered to be a problem serious enough to merit a mobilization or moral panic response, the original moral entrepreneur must first sell a discrete segment of the community or institution on the seriousness of the problem and mobilize it. In the case of brainwashing, the initial approach and moral panic was within the military and the budding intelligence community in the United States and Great Britain. Serious concern over the ability of enemy intelligence services to psychologically manipulate American servicemen into collaborating with the enemy led to psychological research aimed at manipulating enemy servicemen as well as preventing one's own forces from being manipulated during World War II. As part of this early effort, tests were made for a truth drug that could loosen reluctant tongues, which included such agents as barbiturates, cocaine, scopolamine, and cannabis (Lee & Shlain, 1992 p. 3–5). As early as (1944), George Estabrooks, Professor of Psychology at Colgate University was claiming that it was possible through the use of hypnosis to induce what we now know as Dissociative Identity Disorder. Estabrooks thought that this could create more effective intelligence operatives who could maintain "covers" and not reveal classified information under torture because they would be amnestic for their other life unless triggered by a code word (Estabrooks, 1944). There is evidence that the Office of Naval Research during World War II (Ross, 1996) employed George H. Estabrooks and that he was well respected by colleagues that included Ernest Hilgard and Martin Orne (ibid, 1996, p. 8). Orne would later feature prominently in the cult brainwashing moral panic and the False Memory Syndrome moral panic.

At the same time, more basic research was taking place into the effects of trauma on the human central nervous system. This research would make up one of the bases for both the brainwashing moral panic of the 1950s and the cult brainwashing moral panic of the 1970s and 1980s as well as much of the current scientific understanding of the effects of trauma. William Sargant attempted to apply the behavioral observations of Joseph Pavlov from the early 1900s to the urgent question of how to best treat what was then called combat fatigue and what is now known as post-traumatic stress disorder.

> Sargant's research interest centered on what Pavlov called "brain inhibition or transmarginal inhibition (Sargant 1957). Sargant, paraphrasing Pavlov, states that both animals and people go through three stages of transmarginal inhibition before final emotional collapse. In the first stage, the equivalent stage, all stimuli of whatever strength will produce the same emotional response. In the subsequent paradoxical stage, smaller stimuli will produce a greater response than a bigger stimulus. (Sargant 1957 p. 11–12) Finally, in the ultra-paradoxical stage, long-standing behavioral patterns change. A normally docile dog will bite its master. A prisoner may adopt the ideas of its captors. And a religious conversion may take place.

Sargant's initial work in this area involved the treatment of what was then called combat fatigue and what is now called Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder. Sargant, along with Grinker and Spiegel found that the treatment of PTSD by drug or hypnotic abreaction led to a much better prognosis. Later, Sargant generalized his theories to include a physiologically reductionist theory of religious conversion which was then applied to the issue of brainwashing.

The Korean War Brainwashing Panic

From the October the West had perceived Revolution in Russia in 1917 onward, Communism as a fundamental threat to world peace and order. Indeed, the struggle between capitalism and communism was along the lines of a religious war. The early 1940s were an interlude in this struggle.

World War II had forged a united front between the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union against the common threat perceived to have been posed by Nazi Germany. Immediately thereafter, it became apparent that the Soviet Union was not about to acquiesce to Anglo-American world hegemony. Communist governments were set up throughout Russian occupied Eastern Europe. When the one democratic and unoccupied nation in Eastern Europe, Czechoslovakia, fell to a Communist government in 1948 and a Communist insurgency threatened to overthrow the government of Greece, President Harry Truman committed the United States to contain communism and resist its spread. A moral panic began in the United States against Communists, foreign and domestic.

In the meantime, events in East Asia were to deepen the atmosphere of moral panic in the United States considerably. The Chinese Communist Party discovered in the 1930s that the way to power lay in the creation of a moral panic against "bourgeois" elements in peasant villages. These elements included the traditional village gentry as well as rich peasants. These elements were identified as class enemies and denounced as such (Hinton, 1966 p.112).

One of the reasons the Chinese Communists were effective was that they had mastered the group dynamics of group criticism and group self-criticism. This they practiced amongst themselves before going out among the peasants and workers and teaching it to them. Everyone from class enemies to prospective cadres were obliged to publicly confess their shortcomings and to hear, also in public, humiliating criticism from the audience (Hinton, p. 335-368). In doing so, they learned in a highly traumatic fashion to reinterpret their lives according to Marxist Leninist doctrine. In this manner, a person's thoughts could be reformed.

This process, properly named szu-hsiang-kai-tsao, translated as ideological remolding or thought reform (Lifton, 1961 p. 4) proved to be highly effective, not just with peasants and local landlords, but often even with captured officers of the hated Kuomintang. Following the successful takeover of China by the Communists (which took the West totally by surprise) in 1949, the Chinese began to apply the techniques to Westerners who had remained in China and were accused of espionage. From there, it was a short step to applying thought reform to captured American prisoners-of-war. As China fell to Mao Zedong's People's Liberation Army and Russia exploded its first atom bomb, ending the American nuclear monopoly, the atmosphere of moral panic in the United States deepened. When the communist government of Kim II Sung, which had been established in North Korea by the occupying Russians attacked the American sponsored government of Synghman Rhee in South Korea in 1950, the US succeeded in gaining United Nations approval for military action against North Korea.

Domestically, the United States was at the time preoccupied with recriminations about who lost China to the Communists and who sold US nuclear bomb secrets to the Russians. The situation became more serious when the United States entered the Korean Conflict in 1950. By 1952, captured American pilots began to make confessions that they had been engaged on biological warfare missions that involved spreading disease through such means as germ infested leaflets and straw chaff dropped from aircraft. There is some evidence that these allegations might well be true (Endicott & Hagerman, 1999).

With Senator Joseph McCarthy making accusations that the U.S. Army was infested with Communist agents, explanations for the behavior of captured airmen, whether valid or not, were necessary. Those explanations were not long in coming.

Members of the intelligence community and military had been concerned over the potential vulnerability of servicemen and others to coercive persuasion since the early 1940s. Now that concern began to be expressed in a relatively candid fashion to a press and public that was predisposed by sympathy and solidarity with America's fighting men to accept it.

The first popular account of "brainwashing," which was derived from the Chinese term "hsi nao," literally to "wash brain," was written by Edward Hunter who wrote in 1951, Brainwashing In Red China: The Calculated Destruction of Men's Minds. Hunter was a CIA employee who had joined the CIA at its inception in 1949 and formerly had been a propaganda specialist with OSS. He worked under Frank Wisner in the Office of Policy Coordination (Scheflin & Opton, 1978, p.226). Thus the popularization of the term brainwashing in the form that it took amounted to a CIA sponsored moral panic.

In August and September of that year, following a truce and major prisoner exchange (Operation Big Switch), a team of psychiatrists and psychologists began to interview the returning POWs on the troop ships that took them home. They were transported home by ship rather than by air as the first group of POWs in Operation Little Switch had been (April 1953), in order to provide time for them to be interviewed and become readjusted to life in the United States according to Robert Jay Lifton (1956). According to Lifton, military psychiatrists were impressed with the degree of isolation and apathy that was apparent in the earlier group of returned POWs.

This group of psychologists from Walter Reed Army Hospital Institute of Research included Edgar Schein and Robert Jay Lifton, who would write the two seminal texts on coercive persuasion in 1961, Coercive Persuasion (Schein) and Thought Reform and the Psychology of Totalism (Lifton), as well as Margaret Thaler. Margaret Thaler, after adopting the married name of Singer would go on to distinguish herself as a moral entrepreneur in both the cult brainwashing and false memory syndrome paradigms while Robert Jay Lifton would distinguish himself a prominent moral entrepreneur in the cult brainwashing paradigm in the late 1980s.

The results of the interviews conducted on the General Pope, the troop ship that brought the former POWs repatriated under Operation Big Switch home did not begin to see print until 1954. Robert Jay Lifton's (1954) initial report was primarily descriptive, emphasizing that most POWs "played it cool" by detaching themselves from the experience. Repatriates were described as "…dazed, lacked spontaneity, spoke in a dull monotone with marked diminished affectivity. At the same time he was tense, restless, clearly suspicious of his new surroundings" (Ibid, p. 735) and both collaboration and resistance were explained in terms of a common reaction of resistance to authority (Ibid, p. 736).

Lifton's article came out against the backdrop of the downfall of Senator Joseph McCarthy, who had attacked the U.S. Army as being infested with Communists. This proved to be a complete falsehood. However, the POWs returned to an Army that had been stung by these allegations and needed to vindicate itself. A moral counter-panic against the Communist Chinese that emphasized the atrociousness of its treatment of its POWs, medicalized the deviance of the 14.8% of the POWs who collaborated to the extent that they were recommended for court martial or dishonorable discharge (Segal, 1954, p. 32), and treated them as victims met the Army's political needs far better than well publicized court-martials of collaborators would have in 1954. Thus the returning POWs met a far more sympathetic reception than they might have had they been accused of collaborating with the Nazis while prisoners-of-war eight years earlier. The stresses that POWs had been under and their reaction to them were an objective fact as Lifton documented and as other researcher would document in 1956 and 1957. But the spin that was put on the POW experience was a social construction to meet a particular social reality.

Thus we see Harvey Strassman and Margaret Thaler's documentation of the apathy reaction to severe stress that most POWs exhibited during their captivity (Strassman et al., 1956). Edgar Schein documented the Chinese indoctrination program as a form of re-education (Schein 1956). And I.E. Farber and Louis Jolyon West (who would later also be prominent in both the anti-cult American Family Foundation and briefly the False Memory Syndrome Foundation) wrote of a condition of learned helplessness similar to hypnosis brought about by "debility, dependency and dread" (Farber, et al. 1957).

One can easily see that the brainwashing issue was constructed in such a way as to best benefit the U.S. Army at the time. The returning POWs in Operation Big Switch were sequestered from reporters and public long enough for them to be debriefed by sending them home by ship. This minimized the possibility that some former POWs would say something that would embarrass the Army and get themselves into a great deal of legal hot water, such as saying how good and how lenient the Chinese were, let alone engage in apologetics for Communism. This would have been particularly a problem in the case of unintegrated attitude change (which we would now call dissociated attitude change) in which the repatriate would make statements to the press confessing their crimes and extolling the Chinese, but sounding like a broken record (Schein, 1961, p. 162). People who had integrated the prison experience into their value system, according to Schein tended to be concerned about being selfish and adopted a collective outlook on life without switching allegiance to Communism (ibid. p. 166).

It was a good thing for the Army and the POWs that they did beg many questions because in the late 1950s, a great many questions were being asked of them. Hearings on Communist interrogation and exploitation of American military and civilian prisoners were held before the Senate Committee on Government Operations in 1957 and on Commiunist psychological warfare before the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1958. The issue of communist Chinese brainwashing gradually began to subside in the late 1950s. China was far away and the US had no intentions of attacking it and the POWs had long since returned to civilian life. The US Armed Services and intelligence communities took the lessons of the Brainwashing panic to heart and devised means of training personnel to resist it. The CIA continued its research into brainwashing and behavior control with increased funding through project MKULTRA as a result of the panic. By 1960, the moral panic over a Communist fifth column had abated. But brainwashing was to become ironically. an element in the critique of the conservative anti-communist, conformist society of the 1950s by a resurgent left.

The Brainwashed Confession Moral Panic

Robert Jay Lifton and Edgar Schein both published books on brainwashing in 1961. Lifton's work, Thought Reform and the Psychology of Totalism (1961), is best known for an analysis and definition of the factors which make a given environment or milieu a thought reforming milieu. Edgar Schein in his work Coercive Persuasion focused on the assault on the identity and self-concept in the person being thought reformed. Schein's model revolves around the basic assumptions that the beliefs, attitudes and behavior of an individual tend to be integrated with each other and organized around a person's self-worth or self-concept. One changes an individual by attacking the person's self-concept and preventing the person from reestablishing equilibrium except by changing in the desired direction (Schein, 1961, p. 119).

Both Lifton's model and Schein's model furnished yardsticks by which a given situation could be measured as being a coercive one. And by the early 1960s American society was increasingly being criticized as being inequitable, controlling and conformist. Edgar Schein wrote of treatment of patients in mental hospitals as having elements of coercive persuasion (Ibid. 1961, p.273). This critique was amplified in 1962 by Ken Kesey in his best selling novel One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. Kesey dealt with the resistance of a sociopathic petty criminal named Randle P. McMurphy who had survived a Chinese prison camp and how he resists the coercion to conform of the forces of society as epitomized by the Big Nurse, Miss Ratched. Later, it would become a part of the New Left critique of American society.

But it was in the area of police confessions that the brainwashing paradigm had its most immediate and concrete effect on American jurisprudence and society. And from the issue of coerced police confessions would ultimately come the issue of police hypnosis which would create definitions of hypnotic coercion which would help define the recovered memory debate of the 1990s.

Already in October of 1954, the United States Supreme Court had ruled that a confession in which a defendant, already physically exhausted by a day and night of police confession was broken to an almost trance-like submission by a skilled psychiatrist who was knowledgeable in hypnosis (Leyra vs. Denno, United States Reports 98L.ed. 952). This precedent had not stopped police from continuing to devise more and more sophisticated techniques for extracting confessions from subjects. Some of these techniques borrowed extensively from what had been learned from the Russians and Chinese (Scheflin & Shapiro, 1989, p.46). Nevertheless, the door to the use of hypnotic techniques to secure confessions was not fully closed until 1966 when Miranda v Arizona put strict limits on police questioning of defendants without the presence of attorneys (Ibid.). In making an issue (and a minor moral panic) over the use of involuntary hypnosis against criminal defendants, civil libertarians kept the brainwashing issue alive. Throughout the 1970s, coincidental with the rise of the cult brainwashing paradigm, civil libertarians would oppose plans to use coercive persuasion to rehabilitated convicted criminal defendants. Later, in the early 1980s, the use of hypnosis to enhance the memory of witnesses would become an issue as well because of the question of whether hypnotically refreshed memories led to confabulation and the acceptance of false facts. This issue would contribute to the moral panic environment in the false memory syndrome moral panic.

The Cult Brainwashing Moral Panic

During the 1960s, a violent reaction on the part of young people set in to the conformity and repression that their elders had created during the 1950s. This reaction was in many ways, a backlash on the part of the Left. The failure of McCarthyism began to be used more and more to criticize the political conservatism that had been prevalent in the United States since 1948. In this, they were aided by a growing concern for civil rights of minorities. A discussion of the evolution of the 60s is beyond the scope of this paper but an evolution took place in the attitudes of parents toward their children as their rebellion manifested itself.

Initially, parents tended to be supportive of their children’s stands on behalf of Civil Rights in the early 1960s. As the youth movement evolved into an anti-war movement, parental attitudes became more ambivalent. The GI generation had grown up with an obligation to go to war, however, in the case of college age young people, the thought of having one’s child’s education and career interrupted by a stint in the Army was daunting to many parents, especially when draft deferments were canceled as the war dragged on.

Parents were far less enthusiastic about their children's experimentation with psychedelic drugs as they became popular in the late 60s, but again, balanced a wish to keep their children drug free against a fear that they could go to jail. But as the youth counterculture came under greater and greater attack during the late 1960s, changes occurred that marked the beginning of a parent centered moral panic against the new religious movements that their children began to turn to as an alternative to psychedelics.

For beginning in 1969, the response to this opposition increasingly became to join communes and withdraw from society (Gitlin, 1988). For their part, the communes were subjected to an increasingly stringent weeding out process. Communes which were liberal in outlook tended to dissolve in conflicts about how to accomplish day to day existence while communes which were authoritarian and controlled the thought and action of members tended to be more likely to survive (Zablocki, 1978).

At the same time, young people were belatedly reaping some of the rewards of their activism in a way which would dismay many parents. Although the Vietnam War continued on, largely unabated, young people were granted a sop in the form of a lowered age of majority. The age of majority had traditionally been set at 21 since the Middle Ages. Historically this had been in order to secure a seven-year period in which a 14-year-old artisan could serve as an apprentice. This convention meant that college age youth were to be considered minors for most of their undergraduate careers. In loco parentis restrictions such as college residence curfews and other restrictions on sexual behavior had traditionally been a reflection of this perceived minority of college age young people.

But by the late 1960s, students, along with agitating for an end to the Vietnam War, were also agitating for a lowered age of minority and the repeal of in loco parentis restrictions such as dormitory and college curfews. Previous generations had respected these restrictions in order to protect young women from the disgrace of premarital sex and pregnancy. But the Baby Boomers saw them as a violation of their civil rights. Politically these requests were relatively easy to grant. Thus the late 1960s resulted in college age students increasingly financing their own education through government grants and loans, living independently and often cohabiting with members of the opposite sex, and increasingly being treated as adults from the age of 18 onwards. The 26th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution that lowered the voting age to 18 nationwide sealed this trend (although it would be reversed with regard to the drinking of alcohol in the 1980s).

Parents thus had little recourse when faced with the prospect of their offspring whom they had invested at least eighteen years of love and care in joining and remaining in highly authoritarian religious movements that denied their parents' values, often to the point of fascism. When one examines the background of the development of the Anti-cult Movement and the willingness of middle class parents to often go beyond the law to gain access to their adult children, one must remember that most of them, particularly in the 1970s, still felt that adulthood began at age 21.

It was at that point that parents of members of Children of God contacted a public relations liaison officer with then Governor Ronald Reagan named Ted Patrick. Following the attempted recruitment of his own sons, Patrick decided to infiltrate the Children of God when a delegation of parents reporting similar occurrences asked him to act in his official capacity of ombudsman (Patrick, 1976, p. 43). Patrick found a pattern of behavior that was for him an old story. Growing up poor and black in Chattanooga, Tennessee, with a speech impediment, Ted Patrick found himself prayed over by every black preacher that passed through town, including such luminaries as Sweet Daddy Grace (Patrick, 1976, p.226). In the African-American community, many preachers tended to behave almost as feudal lords, gathering up the limited resources of the community, dispensing resources and favors to supporters, and keeping a goodly proportion to feather their own nests (Williamson, 1986, p. 55). For Ted Patrick, as with most black Americans, the exploitative black preacher or cult leader was almost a cliche. Everyone knew churchmen behaved like this. When he was engaged for the first time to deal with white parents with children in Children of God, Ted Patrick found another cliche to be true. Problems of this nature, like drug abuse, tended not to be taken seriously by the white power structure until it affected their own children.

After his attempted infiltration of Children of God, Ted Patrick began to research brainwashing, (Conway & Siegelman, 1978). Following the successful deprogramming of his son (Ibid), Ted Patrick, in his capacity as the then Governor of California Ronald Reagan's Community Relations Liaison, had been contacted by a number of parents of young people who had joined Children of God (Patrick, 1976). It is unclear whether the parents who initially contacted Patrick were black or white. But Patrick's initial response was straight out of the Civil Rights Movement. The abduction of young people from the Children of God by their parents was intended as an act of civil disobedience, just as a sit-in at a segregated lunch counter was. Placing the newly deprogrammed ex-member before the TV cameras with his or her parents was calculated to highlight the abuses of the Children of God. Prosecutors would be forced to a choice between prosecuting parents for kidnapping their children and moving against the Children of God.

In this, Ted Patrick was behaving as a moral entrepreneur. Like most African-Americans of his generation, Patrick had come of age with the crusade and tactics of Dr. Martin Luther King. To Ted Patrick, kidnapping a child from a Children of God commune was as appropriate an act of civil disobedience as participating in a sit-in at a segregated lunch counter. In both cases, the objective was to raise an issue to public consciousness and foment a moral panic among the public. If arrested, he hoped that prosecutors would be forced to choose between prosecuting him and the adult child's parents and focusing in on the excesses of the Children of God.

If the idea of kidnapping young people out of cults was an act of civil disobedience out of the Civil Rights struggle, the techniques that Ted Patrick used to deprogramme devotees were straight out of William Sargant. Although Ted Patrick attempted to redefine deprogramming as reversal of brainwashing, the emotional confrontations with ex-members that Ted Patrick orchestrated while they were confined in basements or motel rooms amounted to the induction of abreactions. Just as Pavlov would increase the stimuli on his dogs to the point where their conditioning would be nullified and Sargant would get his patients to relive and abreact their wartime trauma, Ted Patrick forced an abreaction of the soon to be ex-member's "cult" experience. Patrick utilized angry confrontation of the new member's beliefs and the presence of the member's parents to raise the members' emotions to a crescendo. Inasmuch as the abducted devotee's new beliefs were generally not integrated, he was usually successful in forcing the devotee to switch back to the pre-cult personality under stress. If the devotee did not switch back to the cult personality or fragment after the pressure was off, the deprogramming would be successful and the now ex-member would not return to the group.

The similarity between what is done in involuntary deprogramming and the stressful recruiting methods of new religious movements has been noted by Solomon (1980, p.168). It becomes difficult to argue against the position that if what high-demand religious movements do in inducting their members is brainwashing, then forcible deprogramming, by objective behavioral criteria is not re-brainwashing. The deprogramming had to end at some point and the devotee or ex-devotee might then be free to return to the "cult." This did not however negate the fact that trauma was inflicted on the person without his or her prior informed consent both by the totalitarian religious movement and by Ted Patrick. Moreover, the question of whether the individual had a free choice after a forced deprogramming was a valid one. Just as cults have their shibboleths and thought terminating clichés to prevent members from questioning the values of the groups, so do families. The deprogrammers might be gone, but familial pressures might remain. Objectivity and free choice are difficult to guarantee under conditions of emotional blackmail, whether by religious movements or by parents. For that matter, it is questionable whether objectivity and free choice existed for the liberated Korean War POWs. They faced court martial, dishonorable discharge and possibly prison in the United States unless they accepted the Army's version of their reality.

Perhaps this equivalence between the tactics of cult groups and that of Ted Patrick can help explain the pattern of ambivalent passivity and nondecision making by policy makers and authorities which frustrated Ted Patrick in the early 1970s. It was this pattern of inaction and nondecision making that led to Patrick's decision to engage in deprogramming as a full time occupation, and which has characterized the "cult" issue until the 1990s. Non-decision making is, according to Bachrach & Baratz(1970), "…a means by which demands for change in the existing allocation of benefits and privileges in the community can be suffocated before they are even voiced; or kept covert; or killed before they gain access to the relevant decision making arena; or failing all those things, maimed or destroyed in the decision-implementing stage of the policy process" (Bachrach & Baratz, 1970, p.44).

Nondecision-making can involve according to Bachrach and Baratz "one that invokes an existing bias of the political system—a norm, precedent, rule or procedure—to squelch a threatening demand or incipient issue" (Bachrach and Baratz, 1970, p. 45).

This form of nondecision-making has characterized the "cult" issue for the past 20 years. When Ted Patrick attempted to secure action against the Children of God, California authorities demurred, claiming that any effective action would violate constitutional First Amendment protections of freedom of religion (Patrick, 1975). When Children of God and later other groups attempted to secure action against Ted Patrick and other deprogrammers, they ran into a wave of public sympathy for parents and deprogrammers. Most people in the United States tended to believe and still do, in the validity of the brainwashing hypothesis (Richardson & van Driel, 1990). This sentiment has translated into a reluctance of prosecutors to take action against deprogrammers unless the person "deprogrammed" returns to the high demand religious movement and presses charges against them. Even when this happens, juries have until very recently tended to acquit deprogrammers, who have historically been given wide latitude to defend themselves under "choice of evils" statutes that exist in most American jurisdictions. Finally in the late 1980s, deprogramming abductions were made largely obsolete by more efficacious strategic intervention work. This work was pioneered by Steven Hassan (1988) and begins with the exit-counselor coaching parents on how to enhance communications with “cult” offspring in preparation for an intervention that is voluntary in the sense that the offspring is not physically prevented from leaving the scene. The intervention involves counseling the offspring to remain outside the high demand religious group for a period of re-evaluation. This has had the effect of reducing the legal exposure of parents and deprogrammers which was still by no means negligible.

Lawsuits against deprogrammers have tended until very recently to result in low judgments against deprogrammers. Lawsuits against high demand religious movements, although appealed vigorously and often reduced on appeal, have tended to result in high judgments. In this manner, the stalemate between “pro-cult” and “anti-cult” forces have been played out against a backdrop of non-decision-making on the issue by policymakers.

The brainwashing theory as applied to religious movements received a major boost in 1974 with the arrest, brainwashing defense, and subsequent conviction of newspaper heiress Patricia Campbell Hearst. Ms. Hearst had previously been kidnapped by the Symbionese Liberation Army, a Marxist ‘terrorist’ cell. Following months of captivity in a closet while held by the SLA, Ms. Hearst joined the SLA in fear for her life and subsequently proved her loyalty to them by participating in the robberies of a bank and a sporting goods store. After a nationwide year long manhunt, Ms. Hearst was apprehended and charged. Her defense on the grounds of brainwashing was unsuccessful, but finally resulted in a pardon three years later from newly elected President Carter. The trial of Patty Hearst focused national attention on the issue of brainwashing in a way that had not previously occurred since the Korean War. The expert witnesses in the case included Margaret Thaler Singer, who soon rose to prominence as the leading professional spokesperson for the Anti-Cult Movement (Singer, 1979).

Besides involving Margaret Singer in the Anti-Cult Movement, the Patty Hearst case brought the brainwashing paradigm back to public consciousness and demarginalized the Anti-Cult Movement. But it was the Unification Church and its participation in the Koreagate Influence buying scandal that kept it going for several years and the Jonestown tragedy, for several more, into the 1980s. In the early 1970s, fear of an American withdrawal from South Korea led the South Korean government to authorize an unprecedented campaign to buy influence in the US Congress (Boettcher, 1980, p. 85). As part of this campaign, Reverend Sun Myung Moon was authorized by the South Korean government to expand his church and business empire in the United States. By 1973, when Moon relocated permanently to the US to supervise the growth of the Unification Church, the U.C. was attracting thousands of college age middle class people to its lectures and workshops. These often led to full time membership, which involved young people dropping out of universities and pursuing careers as itinerant candy and flower sellers. Outraged parents hired deprogrammers to recover their offspring, generally with a high degree of success. The atrocity tales that these young people told coincided with concerns by congressional liberals that Korea actually had the temerity to buy influence in the US Congress the way the US bought influence in many foreign nations.

By 1976, the deprogramming of Unification Church members was becoming more than just harassment. Deprogramming was actually doing serious damage to the San Francisco branch of the Unification Church. In San Francisco, forcible deprogramming of members of the U.C. and other groups became possible under ex-parte temporary guardianships. A chain reaction effect developed, in which people who were deprogrammed and rehabilitated contacted the parents of their friends who remained in the Unification Church and persuaded them to have their friends deprogrammed out (Underwood & Underwood, 1979). The effect of this rash of deprogramming induced defections appears to have been effective well out of proportion to their numbers. This particular group of Unificationists seems to have functioned as a middle management clique in the Oakland Church, which was highly successful in the United States and being groomed for national leadership. (Mose Duerst, the head of this “family” later became the President of the Unification Church in the United States). By decimating the middle management of the Oakland Family of key people, this rash of deprogrammings appears to have stung the Unification Church into mobilizing serious resources into defense against deprogramming.

Thus, civil libertarians and social scientists that were critical of deprogramming were mobilized to defend the civil liberties of members of the Unification Church. Common cause was made between the Unification Church (which follows a de facto Christian Reconstructionist theology developed 20 years before Gary North, the Pentecostally oriented Children of God and the Church of Scientology, which in many ways is a reprise of 2’d Century gnosticism. That these ideologies were diametrically opposed to one another did not prevent cooperation against the common threat. This new Alliance for the Preservation of Religious Liberty was not successful in stopping the Cult Brainwashing moral panic, which gained new impetus after the Jonestown tragedy. But with the help of the ACLU, APRL was successful in overturning the use of California guardianship law for deprogramming purposes, although guardianships continued to be obtainable in other jurisdictions well into the 1980s and abduction deprogrammings, which peaked in numbers in 1984, continued into the mid 90s. But the 1990s brought an increasingly hostile environment for Cult Awareness Network. This was occurring for several reasons.

To begin with, the Cult Awareness Network was becoming increasingly irrelevant. It started as an umbrella group of parents who were concerned about the propensity of their upper- middle-class offspring to join totalitarian new religious movements. While this had been a major concern during the 1970s, which was the tail end of the Boom Awakening period, Generation X, which came to maturity in the 1980s was not as inclined to join high demand religious movements. In fact they weren't inclined to look for religious solutions to their problems at all. The Awakening period had passed.

More fundamentally, the early 1990s was a period of great skepticism toward big government. Government intervention had been the preferred remedy to social problems by the GI generation in general and was Cult Awareness Network's preferred remedy to the problem of high demand religious movements. But government intervention is something that Baby Boomers are extremely ambivalent about on a variety of issues, and government intervention into religious matters is a difficult issue for Baby Boomers.

During the last years of the 1980s and first years of the 1990s, Cult Awareness Network continued, growing less and less relevant. The issue of satanic ritual abuse turned out to be one, which Cult Awareness Network proved unable to deal effectively with. Although there had been deprogrammings of young people from occult groups as early as the 1970s, the first educational lecture on Satanism was conducted by Linda Blood at the 1984 CAN Annual meeting. By 1989, CAN was conducting its first seminars on satanic ritual abuse, and finding it difficult to formulate coherent strategies for dealing with the issue. CAN was not set up to deal with people from abused backgrounds, many of whom had Dissociative Identity Disorder. Work with teenage dabblers was something that CAN was more familiar with, and that was the aspect of Satanism that CAN ultimately focused on.

Behind the difficulty that CAN had in coping with the emerging satanic ritual abuse issue was a set of biases that defined what CAN was and was not. First and foremost, Cult Awareness Network was an organization of parents of cult and sect members. It was not an organization of ex-members themselves and ex-members never had control of the organization.

As such, it was set up to deal with the concerns of parents, who were generally upper-middle class. Its primary means of helping families involved the counseling of parents in the means of maintaining communication with adult offspring against the day when it would be possible to counsel the offspring. This would be accomplished either by abducting them, holding them when they came on a visit, or counseling them voluntarily when they left or were disfellowshipped from the cult or sect they were in. This counseling typically involved a one to three-week intervention followed by a month to two-month period of rehabilitation. The format greatly resembles the Hazeldon Method for treating alcohol and drug abuse, which also became popular at that time.

What this meant was that CAN had little to offer walk-aways from cult groups, many of whom had been born and raised in them. These people often have very deep-seated psychological problems, including Dissociative Identity Disorder, that cannot not be resolved within a two-month period of rehabilitation. And this was especially true of many people who were alleging that they had survived ritual abuse at the hands of satanic and other black magic cults.

Moreover, Cult Awareness Network was becoming more and more critical of various forms of psychotherapy. By the mid-1980s, CAN contained a growing contingent of casualties of pop psychology movements such as Erfiard Seminar Training (EST) and Lifespring. While people coming from these groups did not, for the most part become involved in false memory issues, they taught CAN members that psychotherapy groups could abuse clients and patients with serious results (Singer & Ofshe 1989; Singer, Temedin & Langone, 1990).

This resonated with the fact that there are cults and sects who have ex-members who affiliated with CAN that apparently do foster false memories in people. Former members of Transcendental Meditation have reported having a belief that they have seen people levitate while in the movement; a belief that is seen to be false and delusional once the ex-member has left. And Scientology, in the course of its auditing procedures convinces people that their problems and illnesses are the result of trauma in previous lives, which can be cured by the recovery of memories of the trauma in the course of auditing.

On a professional level, Margaret Singer had found there to be more demand for expert testimony in the area of psychotherapy “cults” than there was for testimony against high demand religious movements simply because therapy cults are considered more lucrative by personal injury lawyers in the United States(Richardson, van der Lans & Dirks 1986). Psychologists are legally required in many states to carry malpractice insurance leading to the possibility of a relatively quick and easy contingency fee settlement. Third party malpractice insurers are not willing to spend years litigating a case over a matter of principle. Moreover, psychiatrists and psychologists usually do not have the financial wherewithal to sustain lengthy litigation, even if they have, in fact been profiting by making patients and clients emotionally dependent on them and controlling them thereby.

By contrast, well-heeled totalitarian religious movements have historically proven to be harder targets for plaintiffs. They have the resources to exhaust lawyers considering litigating against them, are able to make cases against them drag on for years with appeals, and often have fanatical followers capable of many harassing acts against plaintiff and counsel alike. This can have an effect on the number of cases an expert witness will receive of psychotherapy “cults” as opposed to religiously based “cults.”

This may go a long way toward explaining how Margaret Singer developed a jaundiced view of the recovery of memories of abuse. Singer’s clinical experience stretches from the troop ships that carried the Korean prisoners of war home to the current cult controversy and on into the false memory syndrome issue. In the course of her career, she has had the occasion to see several thousand clients for relatively brief periods. Most of them appear to have been paid for by parties other than the client, either parents in the case of cult aftercare or attorneys in the case of expert witness cases. Most were treated unethically by the groups that they exited including many who were the subject of unethical treatment by licensed psychotherapists.

On the other hand, Singer did not appear to have had much clinical experience with adults who were abused as children. She has done extensive work of a more conventional nature in Borderline Personality Disorder with Otto Kemberg (Singer, 1975). Singer can thus be seen as the product of her career and experience. She has experienced cases where groups and therapists have appeared to induce false memories in her clients. She has not experienced cases in which parents did the same or worse and she has had experience working with dissociative disorders. Accordingly, her denial of the existence of Dissociative Identity Disorder (Singer & Ofshe, 1995) in which she postulates and proceeds to demolish her construction of “robust repression” is understandable given the nature of her clinical experience, if somewhat bigoted.

Accurate research that document the last days of Cult Awareness Network has yet to be undertaken, but anecdotal information suggests that in the early 1990s, CAN became split by the false memory issue, roughly along generational lines. The issue seems to have pitted older CAN veterans such as Margaret Singer who saw cultic tendencies in what they called ‘recovered memory therapy’ against younger exit counselors and former members of high demand religious movements. Many of these former members, such as Joe Szimhart, Kevin Garvey and Linda Blood, have had experience counseling ritual abuse survivors. The split seems to have left CAN divided and unable to face the political realities that existed after the Waco debacle.

What role CAN played in the decision of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the FBI to make a case against David Koresh remains a matter of a great deal of controversy. There appears to be evidence that CAN gave advice to the FBI in the Branch Davidian case, but there is also evidence of allegations by others, notably Marc Breault. Certainly CAN cannot be held responsible for FBI attempting to force David Koresh to surrender in front of his entire flock rather than waiting to arrest him on one of his trips into town, which precipitated the siege and conflagration. But Waco defined as an atrocity galvanized large segments of the Christian Right into a potent, aggressively anti-federal-government coalition with civil libertarians, opponents of gun control and ultimately, it would seem, the Church of Scientology.

Certainly Waco seems to have had a great deal to do with the willingness of a fundamentalist Christian sect to accept the help of Scientology in a class action suit against CAN which finally succeeded in linking it to a failed deprogramming. And it may have been a factor in the jury's returning of a high verdict against CAN, which had the effect of bankrupting it and leaving its name, office and files in the custody of the Church of Scientology. And although efforts are being made to resurrect the Anti-Cult Movement, in no large part due to the efforts of ex-Scientologists such as Larry Wollersheim and Dennis Ehriich, no one can be sure what will come of it or what form it will take.

The Satanic Ritual Abuse Moral Panic

Scientific research is seldom confined for long to the purposes for which it was originally conducted. The research into trauma and its psychological effects was no exception. Out of the same research by Sargant (1941,1957), Kardiner (1941, 1945) and Grinker & Spiegel (1943,1945) had come a basic understanding of human reaction to stress and trauma. This understanding had been expanded upon during the 1950s by research into coercive persuasion, like that by Edgar Schein, Robert Jay Lifton, and Louis Jolyon West among others. Concurrently, a tremendous amount of research had been conducted into hypnosis by such luminaries as Martin Orne (1951,1959) and Ernest Hilgard (1965) to name but a few.

By the end of the 1970s, Ernest Hilgard had been led by his research to revive the concept of dissociation. This concept had been pioneered by Pierre Janet and largely discarded by several generations of psychologists and psychiatrists who had been taught by Eugen Bleuler's texts to subsume the existence of multiple personalities into hypnosis while simultaneously treating manifestations of it as evidence of malpractice of hypnosis. Flora Rheta Schreiber (1973) had documented Cornelia Wilbur's treatment of a woman with Dissociative Identity Disorder using psychoanalysis. By 1980, with the publication of DSM-111 and the formal dissociation of the diagnosis of Multiple Personality Disorder from schizophrenia, the way had been cleared for research and treatment of DID to move forward.

By this time also, social conditions had changed markedly. Perhaps the most radical changes that the 1960s and 1970s had wrought were in relations between the sexes. The Sexual Revolution coupled with the Women's Movement had changed social norms to the point where most women were working outside the home and incest was no longer an unspeakable subject. Coupled with this was an acceptance of child abuse as a social problem instead of the traditional acceptance of brutality against children, physical and sexual as a social necessity. And at the same time due to the efforts of the Anti-Cult Movement, people had been educated to see sects and cults as potentially dangerous and controlling of their members.

So when Michelle Smith and Lawrence Pazder (1980) wrote a book about Michelle's alleged childhood experiences growing up in a Satanist coven, it sparked an outpouring of similar stories and the beginning of a moral panic. Therapists began to hear more and more stories of ritual abuse while recovering memories from patients. And horrific stories of abuse in day care centers began to circulate as well.

The idea that there are cults that practice sadistic acts on children is paradoxically plausible from an anthropological and historical point of view and implausible from a sociological point of view. There is historical evidence of the existence of human child sacrifice (Tierney, 1989) and of diabolism (Katchen, 1992; Henningsen, 1980 p.15). On the other hand, witchcraft is considered to be a social stereotype by which societies define ultimate evil and therefore a phantasy (Cohn, 1975). This view informs much social scientific thinking on the subject of satanism and ritual abuse (Victor 1993, Ben Yehudah, 1985).

The two paradigms strangely enough are not mutually exclusive. Gustav Henningsen, despite the evidence that witchcraft was, at least in the case of the Basque region that he studied in depth were an anti-religion and a construct bearing no basis in reality (Henningsen, 1980, p. 94) accepts the existence of Satanism. This he considers to be much different than the world of the witches and which he considers having yet to be subjected to a thorough and sober investigation (Henningsen 1980 p. 4). In support of the existence of Satanism, Henningsen offers several secondary sources including Gerhard Zacharias (1964), Caro Baroja (1961), Francis King (1970), and Henry T.F. Rhodes (1954) as well as two instances of actions taken against collective Satanism (in 1653 and 1803) which he found in primary sources in the Spanish Archivo Historico National (Henningsen, 1980, p. 440).

It is necessary to bear these facts in mind while examining the ritual abuse "panic" of the 1980s and 1990s, for a similar situation exists with regard to ritual abuse in the 1990s.

It is fallacious to suggest that no physical evidence of ritual abuse has been found. Physical evidence has been found of rituals occurring where ritual abuse survivors claim they have occurred on numerous occasions (Greaves, 1991, p. 66-67). Highly publicized evidence of ritual cult murder of people has been found on a number of occasions, the most well known of which was the Matamoros cult killings in 1988 although the group's rituals were Afro-Cuban /Aztec rather than Anglo-Celtic Satanic (Schutze, 1989). And at least in Great Britain, the Beacon Foundation, a Christian ministry serving the needs of ritual abuse survivors identified several occult organizations by name, alleging that they had engaged in ritual abuse. These organizations included the Temple of Set, the Ordo Templi Orientis, Temple of Olympus (aka Ordo Astrum Serpentis) and Temple of Britannia (Beacon Foundation, 1991, p.9).

On the other hand, evidence of a classic moral panic can also be found in the controversy over satanic ritual abuse. Many people working in the area of ritual abuse come from a pre-millennial Pentecostal Christian perspective and they have often made untenable claims. Allegations of a worldwide-unified satanic antichrist conspiracy (File 18 Newsletter #92–3 p.4) have generally been disproved (Langone & Blood, 1990). Some rather spectacular stories of ritual abuse that were based upon a Christian perspective were disproved in the late 1980s and early 1990s. These allegations, included those of Dr. Rebecca Brown (1986, 1987) whose account was proven to be a hoax (Blaskett 1994) and Mike Warnke (1972) who recanted his allegations about being initiated into Satanism in the 1960s (Passantino, 1992). Ritual abuse however, throughout the 1980s and into the 1990s was one of the few issues in which premillennial fundamentalist Christians could not only find common ground with feminists who were normally their mortal enemies, but also cooperate on a day to day basis.

To be sure, there were tensions between the two perspectives. Far more serious however, was the tension between the forensic perspective and the therapeutic perspective in documenting ritual and any other form of sexual abuse that had become apparent by the mid-1980s.

The role of psychotherapist and the role of forensic investigator are incompatible with each other. The therapist's duty is to facilitate healing in his or her client or patient. This can mean accepting the patient's narrative truth as valid for the patient at least and helping the patient work it through within the therapeutic relationship. Critical judgment on the part of the therapist is likely to impair the therapeutic alliance between therapist and patient (Greenberg & Shuman 1997, p. 52).

In contrast, the forensic evaluator is hired either by a defendant's attorney or by the State or Crown or by the Court. His or her job is to be neutral and objectively evaluate the psycholegal issues involved, including the mental state of the defendant or plaintiff/complainant and the objective facts of the case. For the forensic evaluator narrative truth is merely a vehicle that may or may not get one to the historical truth. And the historical truth is paramount (Ibid.) By the late 1980s, it was becoming apparent that the two roles were in conflict in many cases of child sexual abuse and ritual abuse.

In the case of children, social workers with minimal or no formal training in social work (B.A. or Associate Degree), no training or background in investigation or police work and heavy caseloads were increasingly being expected to gather evidence for use in criminal proceedings. They often had few or no guidelines (Brown, Scheflin & Hammond p.7). As the focus shifted from identifying children at risk of abuse and intervening appropriately to finding fault and making cases against perpetrators, social workers were increasingly expected to act as police and decide whether or not allegations were valid (Ibid.) Excesses inevitably occurred and in the late 1980s increasingly such investigations were tarred by defense attorneys as presumptive of guilt (Ibid.). Excessive and often suggestive interviewing techniques were used, including systematic leading and misleading questions and even direct coercive tactics that confirmed preexisting biases regarding allegations. These sloppy interviewing techniques often enabled perpetrators to go free because the child witness was irretrievably contaminated and increased the rate of false accusations of abuse that never occurred, which was damaging to innocent parties (Ibid., Ceci & Bruck 1995).

Therapists who were treating adults with sexual and ritual abuse were being thrust into forensic roles as well.

Child protection professionals, police and psychotherapists attempted to cope with this apparent epidemic of satanic abuse which either had recently developed or had existed beneath the surface of society for years. The results were mixed, to say the least.

Teenage dabblers and self-styled satanists were readily uncovered and prosecuted (Raschke 1990). Attempts to convict day-care center operators were more problematic. Convictions were obtained, such those of Frank and Ileana Fuster who were convicted of sexually abusing children in their charge in the context of Santeria rituals (Hollingsworth 1986). But other cases, particularly the McMartin Day Care Center case in Manhattan Beach, CA resulted in long trials; the McMartin Trial remains the longest court trial on record and ultimately resulted in acquittals for all defendants. Defenses centered on raising the issue of suggestive and often intimidating interviews of children by child protection advocates. It would be fallacious to say that allegations of ritual abuse are totally unfounded, because by the mid 1990s, a number of convictions for murder in the context of religious rituals had been rendered and sustained on appeal. These cases included People v St. Joseph (226 CaI.App-3d 289) Penick v.State of Indiana, (AppelleeNo. 17200-9404-CR-389) and Sexton v State of Florida,. (No. 86,132 July 17, 1997).

Other convictions in which satanic ritual abuse was proven involved sexual assault charges such as State of Utah v. Alan B. Hadfield 788 P2d 506 (Utah 1990) Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Rickie Jay Gaddis, 432 Pa. Super. 523; 639 A.2d 462,)In the Matter of DANIEL "DD"' et al.,Alleged to be Abused andNeglected Children530 N.Y.S.2d 314 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1988, 530 N.Y.S.2d 314 and State Of North Carolina v. Patrick S. Figured 1446 S.E.2d 838. In all of these cases, the facts of the case involved ritual abuse. In all of these cases, the facts of the case were proven beyond a reasonable doubt to a judge or jury. In all of these cases the verdict was upheld on appeal. And the list is by no means exhaustive.

While the issue of ritual abuse in child day care contexts was being fought out in the courts in the mid-1980s, there was great optimism regarding the treatment of Dissociative Identity Disorder in adults. It appeared that the treatment of DID through abreaction of traumatic memories offered new hope for patients who had previously been diagnosed as difficult to cure Borderline Personality Disorder patients or even Schizophrenics. Because this care was thought to involve highly traumatic abreactions piled one on top of another, DID was treated on an inpatient basis at private psychiatric hospitals. These hospitals welcomed the clientele. Health insurance providers, for their part, were willing to pay for treatment which offered hope of curing patients who otherwise might make repeated suicide attempts that would result in trips to emergency rooms and claims against insurance companies. And in a significant number of cases, abreactive therapy was highly effective. The issue of multigenerational ritual or sadistic abuse, which apparently was responsible for many of the cases of DID being treated was not nearly as easily resolved. Therapists were increasingly being expected to act as forensic evaluators of their patients and the two roles conflicted with one another. The acceptance of the patient's internal world that is necessary for a psychotherapeutic relationship to develop is not conducive to the sort of critical evaluation of a patient's testimony that forensic evaluation requires.

Patients for the most part do not go to therapists seeking to bring abusers to justice. They go to therapists seeking relief from symptoms that are making them miserable. And when patients, particularly patients with Dissociative Identity Disorder, recover memories they tend to recover those memories that are relevant to their current misery. Those memories are often in the form of disjointed flashbacks and bodily sensations. Joyce Seyse Dorado gives an example: Cynthia's first recognizable memory was of her father forcing oral sex on her. Prior to this memory for as long as Cynthia could recall, about once a month just as she was falling asleep, she would have a sensation in her mouth, a feeling that her mouth was full, with an object that was "soft on the outside" but "hard"" underneath the soft outside. After she remembered the abuse, she recognized the sensation as a physical reexperiencing of an erect penis inside her mouth, which she believes was her father's penis during sexually abusive incidents."(WiIliams & Banyard 1999 pp. 103–104)

During the process of therapy, disjointed dissociated memories such as this are pieced together in the form of a narrative. In this way, they are processed so that they become part of the patient's autobiographical memory. In this manner, the patient is able to put some distance between him or herself and the memory and place it in perspective alongside other life experiences.

Errors can develop during the process of integration of traumatic memory. Memories are not always accurate. Sometimes neither the patient nor the therapist can be totally certain of the identity of a perpetrator, such as when a patient's back is turned to the perpetrator during the course of the abuse. Other times, two or three different abusive incidents by two or more different perpetrators may be confused. These are not necessarily a serious issue in therapy. Therapeutic closure and healing can take place if the patient is mistaken about details such as this. But it can lead to tragedy and miscarriage of justice when an attempt is made to hold an alleged perpetrator legally accountable. And when therapists attempt to be the forensic evaluators of their own patients or when they attempt to push the pace of therapy, often in order to finish before the patient's insurance benefits run out, these errors can be magnified.

The situation is even more difficult when religious or magical ritual is part of the abuse and the abuse anchored in a coherent belief system. In situations such as this, with multiple perpetrators acting in pursuit of a "higher" objective, to be credible the patient must recall not only the abuse and the identity of the perpetrator but the belief system as well. It is common for abuse survivors to recall enough detail to credibly hold single perpetrators accountable for discrete incidents. But when abuse becomes routine and persists throughout the patient's childhood, as is often the case when patients develop Dissociative Identity Disorder, it becomes harder to identify discrete incidents and easy to confuse them. And when abuse involves organized perpetrator groups, and particularly religious ritual, details that would serve to identify the group and its belief system often are not reported or are reported very poorly.

This can occur for several reasons. Firstly, the patient recalls those things that they are the most therapeutically relevant. Details of ritual that would help to identify places, specific times, perpetrators and beliefs often are not therapeutically relevant, particularly since much of the abuse that was most traumatic can occur in early childhood when such things are not understood. And finally, organized perpetrator groups or black lodges or black magic cults can protect the group and its teachings by including false details for lower level members or deliberately including fantastic details that are unbelievable. The patient's perceptions can be confused by the use of drugs and deliberate manipulation of the patient's dissociated states and the patient can be intimidated against revealing the inner teachings of the group. The patient can even be given false details to divulge if the pressure to divulge something becomes too great.

Given the pitfalls that an organized secretive group can lay, it is not surprising that few organized groups have been uncovered in their entirety or have their existence conclusively exposed even when enough evidence is found to indict and convict some individual perpetrators. The typical reports of ritual abuse survivors that have been reported in print involve generic satanic practices that may well be a cover for the true beliefs of a number of different groups. The reports of Ross (1995) and Noblitt & Perskin(1998) are notable exceptions, and have involved patients from a number of diverse groups including vodun sects, Ku Klux Klan rituals and neo-pagan or druidic rituals. Stephen Kent(1993a, 1993b, 1994) has found while analyzing the reports of ritual abuse survivors, variations in reports of Satanism that enable one to discern fundamental Christian or Mormon origins. But these are recent exceptions to the rule.

It is not surprising therefore, that as the 1990s progressed, that a backlash against the recovery of memory gained momentum and became a moral counter-panic all its own. This backlash, the False Memory Syndrome moral panic, would amplify concerns that were developing over memory recovery and synthesize them with the destructive cult paradigm that had been developed in the 1970s.

The False Memory Syndrome Moral Panic

By 1992, the concern over sexual abuse including ritual abuse had generated a moral counter-panic; one which treated parents accused of sexual abuse of their children as innocent victims rather than their offspring. This was the False Memory Syndrome moral panic. The False Memory Syndrome Foundation was founded in 1992 by Peter Freyd, a Mathematics Professor at University of Pennsylvania and his wife, Pamela. Their daughter Jennifer is a Professor of Psychology at University of Oregon. In 1991, Peter and Pamela attempted to enlist Jennifer's aid and support for the False Memory Foundation. According to Jennifer, when she declined to do so, her parents contacted the Psychology Department at University of Oregon and attempted to persuade the department to deny her tenure. It was only then, that Jennifer Freyd publicly denounced her father as a sexual abuser.

Besides the Freyds, the initial membership of FMSF included Ralph Underwager and Hollida Wakefield, Dr. Harold Lief, a personal psychiatrist of Peter Freyd's, Martin Ome, (who had been active both in research into misuse of hypnosis, as we have seen, and research into brainwashing) and Margaret Singer (who as we have seen both participated in the original research into brainwashing of American servicemen during the Korean War and was heavily active in the Cult Awareness Network). Thus, from the start, the FMSF included strands from at least three other moral panics.

These moral panics are: 1) the witch hunt against paedophiles moral panic 2) the coerced confession/misuse of hypnosis moral panic and 3) the cult brainwashing moral panic. With the exception of the first, these moral panics have been covered earlier. Table 1 describes the intellectual affiliation of members of the FMSF Advisory Board of 1994 who have been active in these preceding moral panics. It is by no means an exhaustive list but it serves to illustrate the influence in terms of key personnel of these other movements, particularly the Cult Brainwashing moral panic.

There has been an intellectual tradition defending paedophilia throughout the 20th Century. In the 19th Century, John Eddington Symonds (1964) defended paedophile practices by pointing out that the Greeks engaged in it. More recent defenders of paedophilia include J. Z. Eglinton (1964), Brongesma (1986), Sandford et al. (1991) and Feierman (1990) who notes the prevalence of paedophilia across many cultures.

With the publication of the Kinsey Report in 1948, a veneer of behavioral science was added to the voices advocating the legalization and legitimation of sex between adults and children. The Kinsey Report would be considered unscientific and unethical according to contemporary standards of research. Kinsey's research was unscientific because he refused to publish the actual questionnaire that he used (Reisman 1998, p. 57, his research was subject to systematic errors of unknowable magnitude due to selective sampling bias and the use of a sampling population that was radically different from the composition of the white male population (Ibid. p. 58, Cochran et. al 1954) and discrepancies in his sample leave 57% of his male research sample unaccounted for (Ibid. p. 53). Kinsey violated the research ethics of his time as well as contemporary research ethics by coercing answers from research subjects (Ibid. p. 63) and by the use of genital experiments including filming the sexual stimulation of children (Ibid. p. 66). This not only involved the inclusion of data on orgasm at very young ages that had been collected by paedophiles who collaborated with the Kinsey Institute but included validation by senior Kinsey institute staff including Paul Gebhard, Wardell Pomeroy and Albert Kinsey himself (Ibid. p. 146-148, Masters et. al. Kinsey p. 177).Yet his research methodology received remarkably little media scrutiny when it was published in 1958 and 1953 and informed the intellectual thought of several generations of Americans.

The message that Kinsey promoted was that paedophilia and incest, among other sexual activities were essentially harmless. A generation of paedophiles took the message to heart, particularly once the decriminalization and demedicalization of homosexuality gathered steam. Indeed, many of the early Gay Rights activists such as Harry Hay (Timmons p. 296), Tom Reeves (In Pascal 1990 p.47) and David Thorstad (founder of the Gay Activist Alliance) were open and avowed paedophiles and Reeves and Thorstad were founders of NAMBLA (North American ManBoy-Love Alliance) in 1978 (NAMBLA Bulletin September 1992 p.2).

In the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, Ralph Underwager and his wife, Hollida Wakefield, represented this stance. Underwager has made a career out of appearing as an expert witness on behalf of people accused of sexual molestation and impeaching the credibility of children testifying that they were abused. In 1991, Underwager and Wakefield interviewed with Paul Geraci, the editor-in-chief of Paidika, a Netherlands based magazine advocating paedophilia. Underwager was quoted by Paidika as saying: Paedophiles spend a lot of time and energy defending their choice. I don't think that a paedophile needs to do that. Paedophiles can boldly and courageously affirm what they choose. They can say that what they want is to find the best way to love. I am also a theologian and as a theologian, I believe it is God's will that there be closeness and intimacy, unity of the flesh, between people. A paedophile can say: "This closeness is possible for me within the choices that I've made." Paedophiles are too defensive. They go around saying "You people out there are saying that what I choose is bad, that it's no good. You're putting me in prison, you're doing all these terrible things to me. I have to define my love as being in some way or other illicit." What I think is that paedophiles can make the assertion that the pursuit of intimacy and love is what they choose. With boldness, they can say, "I believe this is in fact part of God's will." They have the right to make these statements for themselves as personal choices. (Geraci 1991)

For her part, in the same interview, Hollida Wakefield lamented the intellectual climate in the United States regarding paedophilia:

> But your point is that potentially there can be good, healthy, positive relationships between men and boys. It would be difficult to come up with sexual research for that in the United States because it would frankly be suppressed. When I did a review of the literature on boy victims of child sexual abuse, some of the studies show not just negative effects in some of the boys. The authors try to explain this away. Their rationale is that because they didn't find negative things in their study, does not mean there are none. They just > haven’t shown up yet! If anyone in the United States were to do a study that showed positive outcomes and then wrote it up as a scientific paper, they probably would not succeed in getting it published. It could only be published if they found a way to explain away any positive findings (Ibid.).

Following the Paidika interview, Underwager was obliged to resign from the Advisory Board of False Memory Syndrome Foundation. Hollida Wakefield remained on the board, however and represents the positive paedophilia position on the FMSF advisory board to this day. The misuse of hypnosis strand of FMSF thought includes some luminaries in the field of hypnosis such as Martin Ome, John Kihlstrom, Theodore Sarbin, Ernest Hilgard and Campbell Perry. They make up the moderate wing of False Memory Syndrome Foundation, with the exception of Martin Ome. But it is the Cult Brainwashing Paradigm that has given the False Memory Syndrome Paradigm and moral panic much of its coherence, public appeal and political effectiveness.

The claim, in so many words that therapists who recover memories are engaging in thought reform with their patients is made by Richard Ofshe as well as John Hochman (1994). In his work, Making Monsters (Ofshe & Watters 1995), Ofshe claims that “recovered memory therapists” foster dependence in patients, which Ofshe argues is greater than in other therapy situations (Ibid. p. 111). Patients are encouraged to break with family members and the therapy is alleged to promise a surrogate family that will replace the one destroyed during therapy (Ibid. p. 112). The use, in many cases of hypnosis, according to Ofshe aids in the creation of pseudomemories (Ibid. p. 147). And the patient’s mental health often deteriorates during the course of therapy, fulfilling the prediction that the patient must get worse to get better (Ibid. p. 159).

Even the apparent presence of Dissociative Identity Disorder, according to Ofshe is the result of suggestions that the patient manifest the symptoms of the disorder (Ibid. p. 214). Thus, according to this theory, Dissociative Identity Disorder is iatrogenic, a disease created by medicine (McHugh 1993, Spanos & Weeks 1985).

Being iatrogenic, according to this view, therapists can be sued for malpractice when DID occurs or when therapists lead patients to believe false memories. These suits are usually brought by retractors of abuse allegations but have also been brought on a number of occasions by parents who contend that therapists by persuading patients that their parents abused them have broached a duty of care to avoid harm to innocent third parties.

Suits by retractors have generally resulted in out of court settlements by malpractice insurers rather than being brought to trial and precedents entered. Suits by third parties have yielded mixed results. In the New Hampshire case Hungerford v Jones (97–657), the New Hampshire Supreme Court ruled that therapists indeed had a duty of care to parents to prevent false allegations from being made against them by children. However, in California, the Fourth District Court of appeal upheld a therapist's immunity from third party lawsuits arising from recovered memories in therapy, ruling that to permit such lawsuits would be to oblige therapists to serve two masters (Pfeifer 1999).

The cult brainwashing paradigm became the model for a federal criminal indictment of Judith Peterson and four other defendants in the Spring Shadows Glen case that was vacated in February 1999 by a mistrial. As the prosecution alleged in its indictment:… "the defendants and others would and did fraudulently elicit statements of satanic ritual abuse and cult activities from the admitted patients, through non-traditional treatment modalities, including the use of leading or suggestive questions during therapy sessions while the patients were: under hypnosis; under the influence of a drug or combination of drugs; isolated from their families, friends and the outside world; denied certain privileges and freedoms, including uninterrupted sleep; held down by excessive or medically unnecessary physical restraints; or, otherwise by employing the use of techniques commonly associated with mind control and "brainwashing," in order to conduct their fraudulent insurance payment enterprises." The case resulted in a mistrial on February 8, 1999 as a result of a number of jurors being disqualified for various reasons (Smith 1999). The State declined to re-file the case. Besides legal means of redress, the False Memory Syndrome moral panic has resulted in some extralegal activity. In Seattle, the local head of FMSF, Chuck Noah has engaged in Operation Rescue style harassment in front of the office of David Calof, a local DID therapist. The extensive picketing has involved harassment of patients, intimidation of family and colleagues, harassment of Calof's landlord with the aim of forcing the landlord to evict Calof, bogus complaints and lawsuits and even physical assault against one of Calof's staff on at least one occasion (Calof 1998).

Thus we see how the False Memory Syndrome moral panic is in many ways the outgrowth of several other moral panics, the Cult Brainwashing moral panic in particular. In both cases, parents are the immediate victims and in both cases, the brainwashing hypothesis is applied in a highly inconsistent manner. Both in the case of the Cult Brainwashing paradigm and in the case of False Memory paradigm, the idea that parents can be engaged in brainwashing or in parenting that is abusive enough to be tantamount to brainwashing is totally ignored, much less denied. This is a major oversight. Perhaps the need to maintain that oversight was the reason why Cult Awareness Network was so ineffective with persons who had been cult raised but had left. But without this oversight, the brainwashing paradigm collapses into the traumatic dissociation paradigm. And that would make brainwashing far less useful as a means of legitimating authority. Thus we see a chain of moral panics against social problems of varying seriousness. Each evolved in a number of ways into the next. This serves as evidence that moral panics can and do occur around issues that are truly serious. However, an atmosphere of moral panic is generally not conducive to rational thought and reality testing. That remains the fundamental problem with attempting to solve social problems with moralistic crusades and moral panics.

Re-Searching for New Perspectives:Ritual Abuse/Ritual Violence as Ideologically Motivated Crime

Thorsten Becker

Terrorism in the 21st century, most notably the events of September 11, 2001, calls for new perspectives regarding the motivations of organized criminal groups and destructive cults, as well as governmental agencies covertly involved in mind control procedures on their citizenry. I contend that the term “ritual” does not adequately portray the fundamental nature of the reported violence that these groups have perpetrated on children, adults, and animals. As Becker, Karriker, Overkamp, and Rutz (in press) write, “The ‘ritual’ connotation fails to encompass many of the tortures, threats, confinements, mind control procedures, violence and other types of unlawful or immoral exploitation that participants have endured.”

The Controversy

Ritual abuse, especially when the adjective satanic is used, is a controversial topic. Even though this phenomenon has been discussed in the professional community for almost three decades, there is no consensus regarding its definition. I understand the concept as ritual violence:

> Ritual violence is a severe form of abuse of adults, adolescents and children intended to traumatize the victims. It consists of physical, sexual and psychological forms of abuse which are planned out and systematically used in ceremonies. These ceremonies may have an ideological background as well as being staged for the purpose of deception and threat. Symbols and activities or rituals which have religious, magical or supernatural connotations are used. The purpose is to confuse, threaten and terrorize victims and to indoctrinate them with religious, spiritual or ideological beliefs. Ritual violence rarely consists of a single episode. Most often these experiences happen over an extended period > of time. (Becker & Froeling, 1998) When Ulla Froeling and I developed this description, we had two issues in mind: (1) that a ritual can be staged to make a victim believe that the ideological background is real, i.e., a child is made to think she has murdered a baby as a sacrifice to Satan or another deity, (2) that whether or not a ritual is staged, the victim is bound into the real or faked belief system of the perpetrator(s).

Mental health and law enforcement professionals frequently use the word unbelievable when faced with clients/victims who report ritual violence. Supporting factors for a defense strategy of not believing include a lack of education and training about ideologically-based ritual abuse and torture-based trauma and their aftereffects, and a lack of supervision for working with persons with these histories. Without this knowledge and support, professionals may perceive clients/victims as confused, chaotic, paranoid, delusional, etc.; however, as Coleman (1999) points out, "We must remember that survivors only become patients because of the appalling things that have been done to them, not because they are mentally ill."

In an article offering a law enforcement perspective on allegations of ritual abuse, Lanning (1992) fails to give a precise definition of the term. Although he is often quoted as having conducted a seven-year FBI study that gives evidence that ritual abuse does not exist, when Noblitt and Perskin (2000) requested a copy of his study from the FBI, "the bureau responded in writing indicating that no such study existed" (p. 179). Contrary to the way his paper is cited to show that there is no evidence of ritual abuse, what Lanning writes is: I do not deny the possibility that some of these allegations of an organized conspiracy involving the take-over of day-care centers, abduction, cannibalism, and human sacrifice might be true. But if they are true, then it is one of the greatest crime conspiracies in history. (pp. 131–132)

Bennetts (1993) asked Lanning if he had trouble disbelieving the stories of the women he interviewed. "To my surprise," she writes, "he admits he has never talked to a ritual abuse survivor" (p. 62). Reportedly, he later said that he had spoken unofficially with several dozen survivors.

Two years later, the ritual abuse controversy that had begun in the mental health and law enforcement fields spread to the public arena. On October 24, 1995, when public television's "Frontline" aired "The Search for Satan," viewers in the United States were told that satanic ritual abuse reports were "false memories." The program began, "Two troubled women. Both sought help from some of the top doctors in the country. The diagnosis? Satanic ritual abuse… After millions of dollars in treatment, the women now say, 'The doctors were wrong.'"

Mary Shanley and Patricia Burgus, two former psychiatric patients, were featured. Shanley had sought help from Judith Peterson, Ph.D. at Spring Shadows Glen in Houston. After her release, Shanley filed a lawsuit against Peterson and others claiming they had implanted false memories and misdiagnosed her with Multiple Personality Disorder (MPD). Shanley's lawsuit eventually settled quietly under a gag order.

Patricia Burgus had been treated by Bennett Braun, M.D. at Rush-Presbyterian-St. Luke's Medical Center in Chicago. Burgus, her husband and her two sons filed lawsuits against Braun and others claiming false memories were implanted and MPD was misdiagnosed. In a deposition on January 17, 1997, Burgus testified that Braun had not implanted any false memories. She stated that she had originated all her own memories; that Braun had only passed on "information from other patients" who reported seeing her participate in cult-related activities (Burgus, 1997, pp. 912–913). Why the Burgus lawsuit was not renegotiated at that point remains undetermined.

In October 1997, the Burgus family announced they had accepted a settlement offer in their false memory lawsuit, a record-breaking $10.6 million (Belluck, 1997). Braun's medical license was suspended for two years by the Illinois licensing board in response to a complaint filed by Patricia Burgus. Braun initiated a lawsuit in 1999 against his malpractice carrier alleging the carrier had settled the lawsuit without his permission in violation of the contract terms. The matter remains undecided.

Peterson was also in the news in October 1997. She and four others at Spring Shadows Glen were indicted on charges they had conspired to "fraudulently treat the insured patients for MPD" and "did fraudulently elicit statements of satanic ritual abuse and cult activities from the admitted patients" (United States, 1997).

Shanley, the government's star witness in the criminal trial against Peterson, and the other defendants took the stand in September 1998. Under cross-examination, Shanley retracted her prior testimony that her therapists had implanted false memories. She acknowledged that she had recalled cult-related memories long before she saw Peterson and admitted that Peterson had helped her become "stronger, more assertive and a better communicator" (Smith, 1998). The federal government dropped all charges against the defendants in March 1999. Eventually, the Texas licensing board dismissed all complaints filed against Peterson.

The impact of the Braun and Peterson cases, lawsuits against other therapists for allegedly implanting false memories of ritual abuse in their clients, and the fact that leaders and organizations in the dissociative disorders' field provided little support for the accused, seemed to shut down the debate and controversy about the reality of ritual abuse. This effectively silenced many therapists of ritual abuse survivors who had previously published and talked about their work in public forums, at professional meetings and during group supervision.

There is no way to determine the number of therapists who continued to work with survivors with little support from peers and professional groups. I do know that in 2007, 451 persons from 20 countries responded to the online Professional Extreme Abuse Survey (EAS Team, 2008) for therapists, counselors, clergy and other persons who have worked professionally with at least one adult survivor of extreme abuse including, but not limited to, survivors of ritual abuse and/or mind control (RA/MC).

A New Perspective

Instead of limiting the term to ritual abuse or satanic ritual abuse—which is sometimes reduced to a picture of the world-wide intergenerational satanist practices said to involve child murder and baby-eating—I prefer to use a more inclusive term when describing crimes that involve ritualistic, ideological or religious issues. In my work as a case consultant with law enforcement in Europe, I use the term ideologically motivated crimes (IMC) to describe crimes that "were perpetrated in the name of some greater good or evil (as perceived by secular perpetrator groups) or some greater god or devil (as perceived by religious perpetrator groups)" (Becker et al., in press).

Deliberately inflicted trauma in service to an imposed ideological or religious belief system differentiates IMC from other abuse-related traumatic experiences. For example, indoctrinating victims, especially child victims, with the belief in a deity or demons enhances the power of perpetrators. Speaking specifically about Satanism, Coleman (1999) observes that:

> Children recruited in ritual abuse may not initially be aware of the religious significance, but most survivors who claim they were born into and abused within generational Satanism tell us that they were taught from a very early age that Satan was their god. All those that I worked with were under no illusions as to what it was about. They talked about the cult as other people may talk about the church or a political party. Although individual memories had been repressed or dissociated, the awareness of Satanism was not a recovered memory. They had always recognized that this was the background to their personal trauma that made them feel different from other people.

Victims sometimes report that leaders have told them that a watchful eye and ear will always be present in their lives and will report back to the group if they ever disclose the abuse. Often these threats are connected to a deity who will punish the victims immediately if they tell. Understandably, these threats are likely to cause problems when survivors begin to acknowledge that serious crimes were committed against them.

Perpetrators apparently rationalize these crimes they commit as common religious or ceremonial practices. Allegedly, this abuse had been experienced previously by others in the group, peers as well as leaders, and is an immanent feature on the way to religious or ideological goals or group positions, often declared as knowledge or wisdom. Trauma, as a requirement for a belief system, justifies the suffering of a victim and seals a bond to the perpetrators. If a victim releases this bond and escapes from the group, he or she might experience a spiritual vacuum. This could present a "condition that may be a focus of clinical attention" as listed in the DSM-IV (American Psychiatric Association, 1994): "Religious and Spiritual Problem" (V62.89).

Below is a summary of my current thinking on the meaning behind the term ideologically motivated crimes:

> They are crimes that are committed in the name of and justified by a transcendent religious belief system (e.g., Aum Shinrikyo) or an immanent Weltanschauung, (e.g., Nazi-ideology group). In the former, the physical presence of leaders and perpetrators is supported and/or enforced by gods or deities who are non-terrestrial beings and therefore can be perceived as omnipresent, especially by young children. This is a serious threat and may continue as a stressor to them even when they become adults. In the latter, a group's leadership exists in the temporal world and rewards for suffering or committing criminal activities happen in their earthly lives. (Becker et al., in press) Perlmutter (2004) provides an informative approach for understanding how religious violence is justified in groups that ritually abuse children. She asserts that ideological issues make crimes committed in these groups unique, thus causing special problems for investigators:
> The multiple-victim/multiple-suspect (MC/MS) situation forces the investigator to work with multiple child victims and to investigate multiple suspects. In addition, in ritualistic abuse investigations, an investigator cannot believe everything he hears. Law enforcers have to corroborate everything they hear and need to particularly be aware of clinicians and psychologists whose intentions are good but they do not have to corroborate what their clients are saying from the law enforcement perspective. Finally, take into consideration that inadequate cooperation exists between investigators, therapists and the parents. (pp. 285–286) Perlmutter offers practical procedural guidelines specific for investigations of these cases, some of which address the psychological needs of the victim by building rapport with the child before the interview, by not wearing a uniform, and by not asking leading questions. She also makes it clear that "law enforcers face many legal, spiritual and emotional hurdles when confronted with an alleged occult crime" (p. 287) and encourages them to become educated about the belief systems of the perpetrators to learn how specific groups function and which of their practices may be legally protected and which constitute criminal conduct.

Examples of IMC

From the Media

One of the keys to a successful investigation of IMC is "planning and implementing a specific investigation strategy for ritualistic child abuse crimes related to the occult" (Perlmutter, 2004, p. 283). This strategy is reflected in the ongoing investigation of the "Thames Torso Case." On September 21, 2001, London police recovered the remains of a dismembered, decapitated young boy from the River Thames. He was given the name, Adam.

In an article linking the boy's murder to child trafficking, Contenta (2003) writes: "The investigative work that has brought police close to cracking the case is groundbreaking. It combined unprecedented forensic research with old-fashioned legwork that took investigators to Germany, the Netherlands, the U.S., South Africa, Nigeria, Scotland and Ireland." Police had raided several homes and arrested a group of traffickers who they were pretty convinced had brought Adam to England. In the raids, they had found evidence of occult ritual practices. An expert in African religions said he believed that the evidence showed that the "murderer or murderers sacrificed Adam to gain some sort of power or good luck for an undertaking in Britain."

Cowan (2004) further explains the modus operandi:

> Forensic experts, using skills developed to help identify victims of the September 11 attacks, carried out advanced analysis of his [Adam's] bones, revealing his diet, from which they were able to deduce that he was from the region around Benin in Nigeria… A scientist at Kew Gardens worked out that Adam had been given a potion containing poisonous calabar beans up to 48 hours before his death. The calabar, commonly used in witchcraft rituals in west Africa, causes paralysis while keeping the victim conscious… Children and young people are preferred for sacrifice, and are kept conscious to the point of death because their screams are said to waken the ancestors necessary to give power to the ceremony. Blood is drained from the body and sometimes drunk by the participants.

The following citations, summaries and excerpts from BBC News are representative of how this case of ritual murder was documented in the media:

Torso Murder Reward Offered
Police made national appeals for information about the discovery which led to widespread publicity. However, they have still been unable to identify the boy… Commander Andre Baker [chief of the Metropolitan Police Serious Crimes Group] said, "Just imagine your worst nightmare and that would be nowhere near."…Mr Baker said police would not rest until Adam's killer or killers were caught. (BBC News, December 21, 2001) Thames Torso 'Was Human Sacrifice'

South African pathologist Dr. Hendrick Scholtz reported his findings at a conference of detectives from across the UK: "It is my opinion that the nature of the discovery of the body, features of the external examination including the nature of the wounds, clothing and mechanism of death are consistent with those of a ritual homicide as practiced in Africa." (BBC News, January 29, 2002)

Mandela Makes Thames Torso Appeal
Nelson Mandela has made a global appeal for information about the murder of a young boy whose remains were found in London… The former South African President said the "gruesome" case had left him with "sadness and a deep sense of tragedy."… Mr Mandela praised the "sterling contribution" of South African detectives and pathologists to the case." He added, "Such cruel wastage of the lives of our children and youth cannot be allowed to continue." (BBC News, April 19, 2002) Met Defends Satanic Abuse Course

The Metropolitan Police Force has been criticised for sending its officers on a course which helps identify the satanic ritual abuse of children. The force sent 30 officers on the one-day event in October but has been criticised by some experts who say the ritual abuse does not exist…" (BBC News, December 21, 2004)

'Adam Torso' Remains Are Buried

> The burial service took place on 5 December and was attended by a small group of representatives from across the inquiry. “It was a sad, thoughtful and dignified service to celebrate Adam’s short life,” a police source told the BBC News website. After a five-year probe, Adam has yet to be identified and officers felt the time was right to lay him to rest… Ground-breaking forensic work, which involved taking samples from the child’s bones, linked him to west Africa and then Nigeria… Several arrests have been made in a case which showed links between human trafficking and ritual abuse, but no one has yet been charged. (BBC News, December 12, 2006) McVeigh and Muir (2007) report:

> New DNA techniques developed in hunting for dead boy’s birthplace have helped detectives solve other crimes… The links the Adam inquiry team discovered between human trafficking and black magic in West Africa have also aided other investigations, opening up at least three unsolved cases across Europe. Detective Chief Inspector Will O’Reilly recently told the Guardian that significant progress has been made in the case and said that “Now there is, perhaps for the first time, real hope that Adam will be identified—and his killers will be found.

At Adam’s burial, five years after his torso was found floating in the Thames, O’Reilly said, “Like the unknown soldier, his death should not be in vain—some resulting good must be in his epitaph.”

Emphasis on the ideological motivations behind this crime led to a change of view toward ritual violence for investigators in the United Kingdom. Hopefully, educational trainings will lead them and other law enforcement agencies around the world to a greater awareness of the possibility of ritual or ceremonial backgrounds in internationally-linked crimes.

From Research

Although controversies over the existence of ritual abuse have centered on reports of abuse from satanic cults, results of two studies show that ritual abuse is also practiced in other groups founded on religious or ideological doctrines. In 1997, German journalist Ulla Froeling and German psychotherapist Michaela Huber compiled data from a questionnaire returned by 126 therapists and counselors from 61 locations in Germany (Becker, 1999). The backgrounds of 354 cases in treatment were examined to determine the classification of groups in which survivors had been ritually abused. More than half of the victims reported abuse in more than one category. My co-researchers and I asked similar questions on the Extreme Abuse Survey for Adults (EAS) offered in German and English (Rutz, Becker, Overkamp & Karriker 2007). See Table 1 for a comparison of preliminary results of both studies.

Three additional questions on the EAS asked about abuse in ideologically motivated groups: (1) ritual abuse in a witchcraft cult was reported by 23% of 971 respondents, (2) ritual abuse in voodooism was reported by 7% of 966 respondents, and (3) 26% of 1000 respondents answered "yes" to the question: "Secret government-sponsored mind control experiments were performed on me as a child." Rutz (2001) documents that these torture-based experiments were conducted by groups of doctors in the U.S. and Canada in the name of national security; thus, they could be classified as IMC.

Incidentally, partial data from the Froeling and Huber study were presented to the German Parliamentary Commission on Cults. As a result, the commission made an inquiry to the Federal Office of Criminal Investigation, BKA-Bundeskriminalamt, and the state level offices of criminal investigation, LKA-Landeskriminalamt, of each German state. Only four states reported past or current investigations of these types of crimes. Their answers indicated that, at the time, German police had little knowledge about cases of ritual violence.

The Commission (Deutscher Bundestag—Referat Oeffentlichkeitsarbeit, 1998) concluded:

> The 'data' available thus appear to be contradictory. On the one hand, minimum figures that have to be characterized as bordering on the dramatic, based on an inquiry that was less than comprehensive; on the other, no corroboration of suspicious circumstances by police and other investigating authorities. This largely contradictory data situation—especially the failure of the authorities to establish any hard facts—should not, however, lead us to regard the media reports and accounts of treatment as without foundation. The very gravity of the events described precludes this. What has been said about dissociation and multiple personality disorder shows why it is plausible that investigations of such matters may be particularly difficult, and that proceedings may be quickly dropped. (p. 186) Although there have been some investigations in cases of ritual violence, for unknown reasons, several of the cases I have worked on as a counselor or police consultant have not been reported to the commission. However, the German Bundesregierung—after an inquiry in the parliament—admitted knowledge of three cases. In Germany, the Parliamentary Commission on Cults (Deutscher Bundestag—Referat Oeffentlichkeitsarbeit, 1998) concluded: Special police training, increased sensitivity to phenomena of ritual abuse, and also more intensive investigation of this area—conducted in such way that at first sight 'weird' and apparently 'incredible' testimony does not derail the proceedings and lead to their early abandonment—would appear appropriate… Germany's state level officers of criminal investigation should continue to evaluate the information available in the field of Occultism and Satanism. (p.186) Among other actions, the commission recommended, "Prosecuting authorities should establish a department which will primarily be in charge of prosecuting crimes with an occult background, and officers working in this department should receive proper training and further education" (p. 202).

Unfortunately, these recommendations were not set into action. Police have not only failed to do anything consequential from their investigations, they have also failed to document what they learned about the types of important information that are needed in investigating ritual violence or occult-religious motivated crimes in Germany or elsewhere. To my knowledge, they have not been provided with proper training to know how to deal with aftereffects of cult abuse so severe that the only defense for the victim, albeit unconscious, was to dissociate from the trauma. It is unlikely that investigators have been trained to deal with persons who suffer from Dissociative Identity Disorder (DID). A person with DID could possibly switch to a different identity who under the stress of an interrogation claims no memory of past or present events related to the alleged crimes.

Speaking as a consultant, I do not know of a single case where there is proof that the accusations of ritual crimes are (or were) completely wrong. Most cases, including one day-care case, have been closed because of lack of credible evidence. All of the case investigations that I am aware of have included reports of ritual murder.

Accusations of ritual murder cause tremendous stress for all who work on these cases. In Germany, social workers are required to make reports to law enforcement if a client talks about witnessing or participating in murder. It doesn't matter whether or not the accounts are credible in legal terms. By law, police are required to investigate capital crimes for the public interest, e.g., to prevent future violent crimes and to protect others from becoming victims. Therefore, police have to interrogate the accused persons who, through their attorneys, will have access to the case files. In some cases, perpetrators may have deceived a child into believing that a murder took place; thus, if the child told a social worker about the crime, it would set off an early warning system that the child was disclosing and perpetrators could silence the child through punishment and destroy evidence of other crimes before police found it. This would prevent police from carefully collecting data to support or dismiss accusations in the early stages of an investigation.

Perpetrators of IMC have been reported to use devious means to assure that victims will not be credible in the event of an investigation: (1) by telling the person they will be killed if they talk about the crimes, (2) by using deception or trickery to implant ideas and fears for actions which may have never happened, e.g., the killing of humans, (3) by having perpetrators dress and act like they are therapists, politicians, famous actors, members of the European Royal families, etc., and (4) by faking the setting in which the crimes are committed, e.g., submarines, airplanes, large underground bases, tunnels or castles.

Investigators have been trained to find absolute, non-contradictory truth as a foundation to go for a trial with a foreseeable clear outcome. Deception used in IMC makes it impossible for them to distinguish truth from fiction. Tactics used by perpetrator groups to silence, intimate, and deliberately make their victims not credible cause enormous difficulties, not only for investigators but also for the entire justice system.

From History

Ideological beliefs as motivation for violence are not limited to small destructive cults and sects. The conflict in Northern Ireland demonstrated the violent potential of major world religions; the secular ideology connected to political and racial beliefs of the National Socialist German Workers' Party culminated in the Holocaust. Effective exploitation of humans from birth to death shares much in common with the systematic approach of the Nazis who not only committed the Holocaust, but also, in preparation for war over an extended period of time, exploited German citizens in almost every stratum of society. Four comparisons come to mind: 1. Ideological Training: Between 1933 and 1945 military-like structuring of the civilian society in the so-called Luftschutz (a program designed to minimize the casualties of air attacks) and large-scale training and conditioning enabled the whole German society to observe and cooperate in a program called Vernichtung durch Arbeit or annihilation through work. Ideologically motivated crimes, as well as war crimes by the German army, were committed in a network of concentration camps throughout the Reich and adjacent areas. These crimes, both passive and active, had been justified by the ideology of National Socialism and its tenet that devotees belong to the chosen, superior Aryan race.

What is difficult for most people to understand is that for Nazis, their crimes were part and parcel of German daily life; that they occurred "just in the neighborhood" and were committed by "friendly neighbors." Lifton (1986) uses the term "doubling" to describe this dissociative-like experience that allowed Nazis to commit crimes at work and come home to lead respectable lives in the community.

Another aspect of training involved a systematic manipulation of the nation's youth. Adolescent boys were recruited into HJ-Hitlerjugend (Hitler Youth); adolescent girls, into BDM-Bund Deutscher Maedchen (League of German Maidens). In effect, every decision that these young people made regarding matters of daily living was controlled by the government. They were told what to think and what to believe; where to live and whom to love. They were required to wear uniforms, to conform to the mandates of the party. The state had replaced their families, "caring" for them, organizing their lives, framing their destinies.

2. Victim-Perpetrator Dynamics: Traumatic suffering from the lost First World War (which was, according to the so-called Dolchstoss-Legende, not lost by the fighting troops but by civilians who sabotaged the war effort) was magnified by terms of the "Versaillian Verdict," the peace treaty which required Germany and its allies to admit they were responsible for the war. Germans felt persecuted and wrongly accused. This laid the ground for a mentality of having being victimized and contributed to a never-surrender-again attitude which was hardened by the burning of Germany's cities during the bomb war that effectively began in 1940. This provided justification for a final 'total war.' In the combat zones of field, air and sea, as well as on the home front, victims had been turned into perpetrators who used torture and murder to further the goals of their leaders.

The casualties were not limited to six million Jews or to Russian prisoners of war. They were also mentally ill people and even adolescents who were considered as arbeitsscheu (afraid to work) or unsocialized. Lunatic asylums and social services departments were among organizations that sent people, regardless of their beliefs or race, to the camps—all with the goal of creating the perfect race and society.

3. Silencing: Being German means living in a country where the discussion of the Holocaust at both individual and societal levels was taboo for nearly a half century. Not only had the Germans lost their role of being superior—as the National Socialistic ideology told them—they had also lost a war they had started and had committed horrific crimes against humanity. Few people acknowledged or talked about the prevalence and magnitude of war-related traumatic experiences among the majority of the population.

4. Perpetrators Not Held Accountable for Crimes: Except for the Nuremberg trials against war criminals and against doctors in a second trial and a few minor trials, no visible action was taken to hold Holocaust criminals accountable for their crimes. The Germans created a special word construction for this: Persil-Schein. It stands for an official paper that was nicknamed after a well-known German detergent that, according to a 1965 advertisement, "washes whiter than white." Many German scientists left the country through the U.S. government's Project Paper Clip or escaped to South America with the support of the Vatican, or continued their research in the Soviet Union.

Why it is important to study Nazism in relation to ritual violence?

The most important reason, in my opinion, is because Nazism is the most powerful example of a movement in which its adherents used an ideological background to justify committing atrocities—against common sense and basic principles of humanity. Another reason is because in Germany, a significant number of survivors reporting ritual violence have also reported abuse within Nazi-styled settings.

Table 1 shows that in the 1997 German sample of survivors, 12% reported abuse under a Fascist ideology. Ten years later, 15% of the German-speaking sample of the EAS reported such abuse. Reports of ritual abuse in a Fascist group by 47% of 994 EAS respondents are consistent with the rise of Fascist groups all over the world.

A third reason is because of numerous reports by extreme abuse survivors that some of their perpetrators were doctors and scientists who left Germany after World War II and carried on their concentration camp experiments in the countries to which they had fled. According to EAS results, of the 257 survivors who said they were used in government-sponsored mind control experiments, 185 were from the United States; 25 from Canada, 27 from Europe, and 20 from other or unnamed countries (Becker et al., in press).

Speaking at a conference for survivors and their advocates, Rutz (2007), one of the developers of the EAS and a healed ritual abuse/mind control survivor, said:

> On February 2005, the National Security Archive posted documentation revealing extensive relationships between former Nazi war criminals and American intelligence organizations, including the CIA. (http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/news/20050121/FINAL_Comments_Op_Files.pdf). Many survivors have alleged some of these same war criminals, using aliases, were complicit in their extreme abuse. From the survey sample, ten percent of 965 respondents reported that one of their perpetrators went by the name, Dr. Black; five percent of 962 reported a Dr. Swartz (Black in German); seven percent of 961 reported a Father Joseph; and six percent of 959 reported a Vaterchen (Father in German). These four aliases are names many survivors have independently reported to me as names that were used in their presence by Josef Mengele, the Angel of Death, the infamous Nazi-doctor who performed horrific experiments on the prisoners at Auschwitz.

A direct question about Mengele was included on the subsequent Professional Extreme Abuse Survey (EAS Survey Team, 2008). “At least one adult survivor of RA/MC with whom I have worked reported that the Nazi-war criminal, Dr. Josef Mengele, was involved in his/her abuse.” 15% of 232 answered “Yes.”

Of the 257 EAS respondents who reported secret mind control experiments used on them as children, 69% (177) reported having been abused in a satanic cult (Rutz et al., 2008). This statistic is consistent with anecdotal reports from therapists who have worked with clients who believe that the mind control doctors went to their cults to find already dissociative children and convince or sometimes blackmail or pay their parents to permit their children to be used in the research.

From Terrorism

The terrorist pilots who murdered thousands of innocent people on September 11, 2001 did it, according to their understanding, in the name of Allah—IMC on a mass scale. Their training had been carried out within a society of a different (and targeted) ideological background. Apparently, even the newly developed friendships and relationships during the preparation of the terroristic acts did not lead to their questioning of or resigning from the holy tasks of hijacking planes, taking their passengers as hostages and sacrificing not only their own but also the lives of others for their religious belief system.

The pilots of 9-11 were not a hermetic group practicing their worship in closed settings. Members of this terrorist cell had lived by their own rules which likely incorporated Lifton's (1961) key criteria for mind control: dispensing of existence, doctrine over person, loading the language, sacred science, confession, demand for purity, mystical manipulation, and milieu (environment) control. They lived within the Islamic community in Hamburg, Germany and on their way to their mosque in the central train station area were confronted with the daily life of a multi-cultural society. Because of their ability to live in two contradictory worlds, to live as law-biding members of society until called upon by their leaders to commit ideologically motivated crimes, they have been called "sleeper agents." Their behavior was consistent with Lifton's (1986) concept of doubling.

Six and one half years earlier on March 20, 1995, another act of mass terrorism had taken place in Tokyo when members of the fanatical religious cult, Aum Shinrikyo, released sarin nerve gas on five subways. Lifton (1999) believes that Aum "may have been a kind of bell-weather, an indicator of future trends" (p.273) regarding terrorism. He writes:

> The report on the U.S. Senate's hearings on Aum Shinrikyo speaks of the cult as having crossed a threshold that rendered "the specter of terrorists groups using weapons of mass destruction" an actuality. In that report, Bruce Hoffman, a British authority on political violence, is quoted as referring to "the nightmare scenario that people have quietly talked about for years coming true" and "the cutting edge of high-tech terrorism for the year 2000 and beyond." (p. 273) Lifton (1999) is noted for applying psychological perspectives to historical problems. In his interviews with ten former Aum members, he found psychological parallels in "Jewish fundamentalists who encouraged the > assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, in Palestinian Hamas suicide bombers, and in Hindu and Muslim fundamentalists who act violently on behalf of claims to ancient sacred places on the Indian subcontinent" (p. 4). Specifically addressing apocalyptic inclinations, he named several American groups which share similar views with Aum: "Charles Manson Family, Heaven's Gate, and Peoples Temple, as well as the Oklahoma City bombers, Aryan supremacists, and paramilitary survivalists on the radical right (p. 4)."

Although Aum is most noted for the sarin attack on the Tokyo subways, Lifton (1999) discovered that this relatively small cult had been involved in many other crimes and acts of terror aimed at initiating a global holocaust that would bring about Armageddon. Under the leadership of Asahara, Aum is estimated to have committed over 80 murders of individuals who interfered with the accomplishment of its goals. Over time, the religious cult had evolved into a military-type organization and began to produce and acquire weapons of mass destruction, including anthrax bacillus and botulinus toxin. Unlike the sarin attacks, attempts at using the biologicals were unsuccessful in causing harm to the people of Japan.

In his afterword for the German edition of Destroying the World to Save It, Lifton (2000) describes other disturbing activities of Aum associated with findings against Asahara and other high-ranking members of the group when they were tried for their crimes. In February and March 2000, the Japanese society was shocked by the news that Aum, known for its successful computer business had, under the cover of different hardware and software companies, installed IT-Technology for the governmental departments of Building, Mail/Post, Telecommunication and Education. Other customers of these companies were the Japanese Department of Defense and the Metropolitan Police of Tokyo. Ironically, this enabled Aum to control plans for the patrol cars which were supposed to observe its own group members. The Japanese press called this "From Sarin to Software" (p. 366), pointing out the threat of a cyber-attack, especially since the Japanese telecommunication company NTT was among Aum's customers.

The cult's acquisition and manufacture of weapons including rifles and AK-74 machine guns did not seem "religiously meaningful" to at least one of its members who worked in what was called the "metal factory":

> The key word for me was salvation, saving myself and saving others as well. My image of salvation and of the things that I would do as a renunciant was of performing spiritual practices, guiding others, translating sacred texts. But I was in an isolated location, operating the machine. The word salvation did not fit the work of manufacturing things. (Lifton, 1999, pp. 192–193) Relevant to the example given above of Nazis who committed IMC, Lifton (1999) compares Aum's use of medical doctors with the Nazi's use of physicians to "replace healing with killing in the service of a movement or cause" (p. 136). He writes:

> There are, of course, enormous differences between a national political movement and a small antigovernment religious cult, though the Nazis were cultic in function, drew heavily upon apocalyptic religious symbolism, and wallowed in mystical experience, while Aum became highly politicized and militarized in pursuit of secular as well as spiritual goals. What Aum and the Nazis particularly shared, however, was the frequent tendency of despotic and totalistic groups to seize upon the shamanistic legacy of the physician, a legacy that includes not only the "white magic" of healing but also the "black magic" of killing. For doctors deal regularly with death and can easily be viewed—by despotic regimes and by themselves—as powerful manipulators of life and death, as gatekeepers between this world and the next. (p. 137) Hayashi, a cardiac surgeon whom Lifton (1999) interviewed, said he had joined Aum because "I wanted to help people" (p. 143) and brought his medical knowledge to further the mission of Aum. Lifton thinks this doctor may have been influenced by the work of the prominent Canadian psychiatrist, Ewen Cameron, whose mind control experimentation projects were funded by CIA. The Aum doctor used several procedures on his patients within the cult that Cameron had been known to use at Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal including electroshock to erase memories and an indoctrination technique similar to Cameron's psychic driving in which "a patient had to listen endlessly—sometimes even while asleep—to tape recordings of himself saying words thought to relate to a basic conflict, and similarly to the interpretations of the therapist" (p. 147). Both electroshock and psychic driving were reported by some of the participants on the EAS who said they had been used in government-sponsored mind control experiments (EAS Team, 2008).

When Hayashi went on trial because of his role in sarin attacks, he testified that he had been a reluctant participant, and that his guru had forced him to murder to keep him silent and to increase his complicity in Aum's criminal acts. This is consistent with the tactics used by other cults to keep members under complete control.

Perlmutter (2004) also sees connections between domestic and international terrorist groups. Through her list of "Recent Trends in Domestic Terrorism," she offers a possible direct connection of satanic cults with Islamic terrorists:

The merging of White Supremacy with Satanism and Paganism (racist Odinist and others).

Many of the original leaders of important groups have recently retired or died and the next generation has taken over and is beginning to implement more dangerous ideas and programs.

There have been recent attempts to organize all of the white supremacy groups under one umbrella organization similar to al-Qaeda.

White Supremacists are publicly sympathizing with Islamic terrorists and are reaching out to gain support for each other to overthrow the U.S. government and annihilate Jews. Their current philosophy is “the enemy of my enemy is my friend.”(p. 77)

In a similar vein, Lifton (1999) warns, “Just as we now take for granted the interconnectedness of the global economic system, so must we learn to do the same for the growing global system of apocalyptic violence. Outbreaks anywhere reverberate everywhere” (p. 4).

Implications

Torture, murder, and trauma-based mind control procedures are common practices in groups—large or small, international or local—who justify these horrific acts in allegiance to an ideology. Crimes committed in the name of some “greater good or evil” or “some greater god or devil” are a threat to the view of a safe world. Perhaps this is the primary reason that the reality of ritual abuse is a controversial topic in the mental health and law enforcement fields.

When working with survivors, therapists frequently hear two questions from clients who are struggling with the mental, physical, and emotional aftereffects of ritual abuse: “Do you believe me?” and “Why did they do this to me?” By incorporating the concept of IMC into their frameworks of treatment, therapists may have less difficulty accepting the reality that such atrocities do occur and thereby help their clients develop an understanding of the ideological aspects of ritual violence in terms of (1) their identification to individual perpetrators and groups, i. e., Stockholm Syndrome, and (2) their needs to find some meaning in suffering.

For persons who are charged with investigating crimes that have satanic or other religious or political trappings, the ideological issues need to be amplified. An understanding of the motivation and driving forces of persons who are deeply convinced that they are doing the right thing, justified by “some higher” meaning, is imperative if those who commit IMC are to be brought to justice.

It is my hope that readers of this chapter, especially professionals in the mental health and law enforcement fields, have been challenged to look at the controversial issues surrounding the phenomenon of ritual abuse with new perspectives. Although freedom of religion may be protected by the constitution of one's country, crimes against humanity are not.

I would like to acknowledge the contribution of some colleagues and friends, in particular Wanda Karriker, Ph. D., whose enthusiastic support was instrumental to the conclusion of this article. She once wrote:

> Evil has survived human history. We can't stop it, but we can recognize and respond to it on different levels. As we sweep out closets in the far corners of the world that are stuffed with profits made from the exploitation of women and children, filled with the DNA of transgenerational abuse, and smudged with the fingerprints of perverted power, I trust that we can offer sympathy and empathy and safety to all unwitting initiates into organized evil—those who have been too frightened to tell and those who have been tormented and discredited for breaking the silence."(W. Karriker, personal communication on private online study group, November 1, 2001) References

Terrorism is the Ritual Abuse of the Twenty-First Century

Frances R. Yoeli and Tessa Prattos

Introduction

As the 20th century rolled over into the 21st, the world worried about a computer virus designed to devastate the high tech industry. What the world did not suspect was that it would be an event of such magnitude that it would transform the power balance. While computer experts dabbled in how to fix things, Osama Bin Laden created a complex assault on the world ‘in the name of.’ This was to become the strategic ritual abuse of society of the 21st century. A massive army of servants [serv-(ing) ants]worked over an extended period of time ‘in the name of’ and became the abusers. They functioned in trance states, pawns of the leadership. Their minds were controlled.

It is said that they asked no questions and did as they were told, ‘in the name of.’ And they were instructed or programmed to become gentle people and pilots whose minds and behavior were controlled by Osama ‘in the name of.’ And they were called Al Qaeda, and they did as they were told. And then one day they were told to take their planes and perpetrate the most massive terrorist attack of modern times upon the heart and soul of the world ‘in the name of.’

Stern (2003) explains how opportunistic leaders head terrorist organizations using religion to both motivate and justify and at the same time recruit and enthuse the naïve, and the disenfranchised. She describes the moral fervor, and the transformation of this ‘enthusiasm’ into ‘sophisticated organizations’ seeking money, control, power and international attention. The recruited are indoctrinated and come to believe that their every move is now in the name of ‘God’ while the leaders work towards their goals in the name of ‘money, control, power, and attention.’

Thus, Osama’s systematic, ceremonious mind control over his servants became violent, systematic, ceremonious mind control, abuse of society and of the masses. The world learned the true meaning of (ritual-repetitive)abuse in the form of terrorism and saw the effects of ritual abuse on one and all, via the television, live. Long ago live television encouraged the viewing world to believe that there is right and wrong, good and evil, and that there was a superman who fought the evil in the world in the name of ‘truth, justice and the American-(democratic way) for all.’

In this chapter the following phenomena are being considered. The phenomena of how the elements of ritual abuse, cult and mind control become part of the almost daily routine of western societies; the phenomena of how the ritual abuse, cult and mind control have become the modus vivendi for achieving power and control over the masses; and finally, the phenomena of how this use of the same terrorizing tactics as in ritual and cult abuse leads to dissociative behavior in the individual and becomes globalized, achieving subtle control over masses of people. Defense mechanisms such as denial, dissociation, depression, and anxiety from the 'overwhelm' appear more frequently and are seen in subtle changes in behaviors.

Systematic threats of terrorist attacks on the world's population are for the purpose of mind control. The media report that there are threats and the alerts go to code yellow, orange and red. The audience has no way of knowing what is real. The result is that at the microcosmic level, a fear of annihilation is activated and looms in the heart and soul of each person. The masses react with their own color codes of alert and differing stress levels. This is what can be considered the societal ritual abuse of the 21st century. The precedent to this kind of behaviour in modern times comes from the 1950's and followed through till the 21st century. The threat of nuclear bombs and the experience of the bombing of Hiroshima that closed the Second World War were frightening enough to shake the very foundations of psychological health (Lifton, 1968). Many found psychic numbing as their resource or defense. Their minds were weakened, or deprived of the power of feeling or moving (Neufeldt and Guralnik, 1997). Gregory (2003) wrote that both individually and collectively people withdrew their minds from the contemplation of the awesome possibilities of a nuclear holocaust. Instead, they concentrated as best they could, on other, more pleasant, aspects of living. Resistance would have been futile anyway. The bomb meant, everyone knew, that running away was impossible if dropped nearby. Psychic numbing, the ostrich-like, head-in-the-sand attitude, was certainly a strong part of the means that people used to handle their anxieties (Zur, 1990). This 'dread' (Singer, 1994) that leads to psychic numbing in the form of accommodation, became a global means for the 'population' to accept and deny the overwhelming threat of annihilation (Gregory, 2003).

Psychic numbing is a common symptom of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). This is the emotional anaesthesia which enables or provides detachment from the potential dangers of the outside world. (WorldNow, 2004). Shutting down is a means for an individual to compensate for intrusive thoughts, memories, or feelings of the trauma by becoming numb to internal or external stimuli (Sidran Foundation, 2000).

The term psychic numbing was first used by Robert Jay Lifton (1982), and is freely applied in many situations to describe the way people avoid facing up to difficult issues. Lifton wrote that psychic numbing builds on well-known defense mechanisms, such as repression, denial, and projection, to create an exclusion of feeling and to disconnect. This is one of the processes by which it is possible to dissociate from the bombardment of "the tele-visual culture and media-manipulated images" (Shor, 2002).

The media under the guise of freedom of press, (i.e., you have a right to know and know you will) provide ‘breaking news’ hot off the press keeping the world attuned by being ‘there’ when it happens. The media arrive on the scenes of terrorism so quickly that it seems as if terrorists plan attacks close to press offices. The use of the media in this way creates a situation where while the media are obligated to report the news, they end up as servants to the terrorists and abusers.

The media, systematically and ceremoniously and ritualistically details live and in color the world’s worst events.

Tension builds and anxiety levels rise in the population watching the reports repeatedly. This tension and anxiety is partner to the fear of annihilation. World events become part of our lives, homes and families. This is the aftermath and effect of the media’s reporting of these systematic, ritualistic, ceremonial and violent threats to the society (Rothschild, 2001; Bunney, 2004).

Comprehension of the implications of what the media present is impossible, as the ‘seeing’ becomes so overwhelming that the mind is flooded. “Lack of accurate information, conflicting information, obfuscation and confusion by mass media and those who drive the media and the passage of time” (Gregory, 2003) serve to lull the public into seeing the evils of the world as normal. They have become entranced into believing ‘such is life.’

New euphemisms enter daily communications and carry the messages of the stage and phase of denial and dissociation. One example is ‘it’s a waste of time’ to look for anything else. The meta-message is to stay safe, stay home, stay alive and enjoy what you have. Another new phrase that has become part of the youth genre and even adopted readily by adults is—‘what you have is the end of the road,’ meaning this is the best it gets. The subtle implication is, ‘appreciate what you have here and don’t go down another path that may be less secure.’

As the media draw attention to the daily political decisions, world events and disasters the viewer may have a sense of intimidation or dimunization. In light of the major world disasters and acts of terrorism, the individual often feels irrelevant, inadequate, inconsequential and incompetent. Drawing on Bunney’s descriptions (2004) and personal clinical, anecdotal and empirical observations, the effects of the media are clear. The pain, the shock, the ‘overwhelm’ leads to isolation in light of the horror of the events played out on one’s senses. Some turn inward, and pretend the ‘other’ environment does not exist. Others turn outward toward negative reckless behaviors. There appears to be a full gamut of negative behavior patterns.

Many of these behavior patterns are laced with anxiety resulting from the interaction with the media. Dissociation from global and social events is present in almost all the various changes in behavior patterns. That is the result of the psychic numbing.

Emotional survival depends on the ability to differentiate oneself from the world and current events. Should it be one's turn to feel the impact on a personal level each will need to find the ability to cope and will do so in a different way. The underlying fear is that they will have to cope and might not be able to cope and the underlying threat is death. The dissociation is an energy saver.

The ripple effect of traumatic events as conceptualized by the distance from the trauma—which can be visualized in terms of concentric circles where the event is in the center of the primary circle is huge. The effect on viewers of the media following a disaster is represented by the 8th circle of distance from the impact of the event (van Leeuwen & ben Yochanan, 1996).

This media presentation of disaster of any kind often leads to the subjugation into compliance with the enemy and with the enemies' belief or passive or aggressive behavior patterns as a means of self defense against what threatens 'overwhelm.' The effect of 'overwhelm' is what is considered here to be the subtle and not so subtle 'societal ritual abuse.'

The 'overwhelm' affects the human psyche of the individual, the family and in particular the children, the society, the country and the world. The media report it all: man made disasters, terrorism, accidents, epidemics and natural disasters. This is perhaps the fastest and most efficient vehicle for mind controlling ritual abuse of society available in the 21st century.

Some of us remember the early 20th century movies about the superheroes. Knowing, back then, that in the end, 'right' would triumph, we watched with awe and wonder how the enemies of justice, peace and freedom took over the wavelengths of the world and threatened entire populations with destruction and havoc (a predilection and forerunner to the 'big brother is watching you' concept as presented in Orwell's book 1984 (Orwell, 1949) and to the current state of terrorist activities). The audiences could then fantasize that Superman, Spiderman, and other super strong figures became imagined resources who might come to our rescue when needed. Superman's words still live on, for many of us, in our minds and memory, 'in the name of'… "Truth, justice, and the American way…" Nonetheless, the fear and anxiety live on untended and deeply embedded within our hearts and souls. The clear memory of the anti-heroes' mind controlling methods and messages remains in our memories.

Terrorism and Ritual Abuse: Defining Terms

There does not seem to be a definition that encompasses both terrorism and ritual abuse as a factor in the theoretical development of what is here described and conceived as Societal Ritual Abuse. Acts that are deemed terrorism or ritually abusive by some may be considered justifiable actions or culturally accepted forms of behavior by others. So long as there are diverse opinions, a universally accepted definition of terrorism cannot be agreed upon (Ganor, 2001), neither is there one for ritual abuse. Some countries and cultures condemn acts of terrorism and ritual abuse as criminality of the worst kind, while others condone and justify the abusive actions.

When repetitive terrorist acts occur in western democratic societies, these events have the quality of and are a form of ritual abuse. The terrorists' actions are unannounced. For the most part they have a ritualistic and religious ideology and are unpredictable. This form of terrorism—ritual abuse impacts society in the same way as the one-on-one ritual abuse affects the family, the individual and the society around them. It has a ripple effect that extends across the globe. This is societal ritual abuse of the 21st century.

Terrorism is Categorized as a Cult

Shortly after the World Trade Center and the Pentagon terrorist attacks on 9/11, panelists at a convention session on hatred asked the American Psychological Association to form a task force to investigate mind control among destructive cults. From there, the new category of the 'cult of terrorism' was derived. Terrorist organizations are now being equated with destructive cults (Dittman, 2002; FACTnet. 2001, 2004).

Hassan (2001) concludes that the terrorism as of 9/11 meets the cult definition criteria. The following criteria demonstrate the reason for inclusion into the cult category: terrorist groups, like cults, are the most destructive visible examples of the abuse and use of mind control and cult control techniques; secondly, the terrorist organizations have studied and used the same techniques to indoctrinate and use the recruited members to commit shocking and horrific acts of terrorism. As within any cult it is not the agenda that is the motivation of the terrorist organizations that makes it cult like, but rather it is the means of achieving this agenda through the implanting of rationalizations and values in the minds of the active terrorist pawns; thirdly and finally, an effective means to counter the terrorism has to come from understanding the programming and the techniques used to induct the terrorists into accepting that their actions are right and into performing their assignments without question.

The Cult of Terrorism

A destructive cult may be defined as a closed system or group whose followers have been recruited deceptively and retained through the use of manipulative techniques of thought reform and mind control [undue influence] (Davis, 1996).

The cult aspect of the terrorism can be approached in terms of the element of mind control which is a process of either unconscious or intentional change of an individual's behavior, thought, and emotional patterns through subtle, deceptive, and damaging means by unethical spiritual leaders. The leadership is all-powerful, the ideology is totalistic, and the will of the individual is subordinate to the will of the group. The destructive cult sets itself above society by creating its own values with little or no regard for society's ethics or morals (Martinez, 2004).

PageWise, (2002) suggests conceptualizing terrorism as a synthesis of war and theatre, a dramatization of the most proscribed kind of violence is perpetrated on innocent victims played before an audience in the hope of creating a mood of fear for political purposes. Jenkins (2004) is adament about defining terrorism according to the quality of the act itself–involving violence or threat of violence-, not according to the identity of the perpetrators or the nature of their cause. Whereas the authors consider any form of abuse as an act of violence, terrorism on a global scale in any form must be considered abuse.

Terrorism takes many different forms—from the computer hacker to the suicide bomber. The terrorism related to in this chapter is any terrorizing action perpetrated on innocent others outside the rules [of war], 'in the name of' [control and power], religious and ideological opposition, and is designed to control the mind of the individual and the society. Terrorism is formatted in an environment that has similar elements to what Stark and Bainbridge (1979), define as a cult; evolutionary religious movements with no parent religion and which create a high state of conflict and tension with their surrounding socio-cultural environment.

Pape (2003) has defined three different types of terrorist group action in terms of their purpose, intent and level of danger. Demonstrative terrorism designed to gain recognition while avoiding serious harm; destructive terrorism intended to aggressively coerce while mobilizing support, repressing the victims and demanding sympathy for the cause; and lastly suicide terrorism intended to coerce, while planning the death of the perpetrator and the victims even at the risk of loss of support. This is the most voluble statement of discontent of the 21st century. This new trend of terrorism is conceptualized here as 'the repetitive- ritual abuse' of society of the 21st century.

Elements of the Terrorist Act:

A terrorist act is premeditated, planned in advance and is not impulsive.

The goals of the attack are to achieve political concessions through coercion.

The terrorist act is focused on civilians rather than military targets.

The terrorists are sub nationals and for the most part housed within states or countries but are not necessarily or openly supported by them. And finally

The intent of these attacks is to gain the attention of the survivors for support and/or to maintain the level of fear these attacks achieve in the aftermath. (Ganor, 2002; Pape, 2003; Schweitzer, 2000)

Briefly stated, the crucial components of terrorism are the same as in abusive cults and involve actions of violence an audience, the creation of a mood of fear, innocent victims, and political motives or goals (PageWise, 2002). Bretton-Granatoor (1997) describes cults as being those that commonly recruit new members and engage in fundraising activities without fully disclosing the use of mind-controlling techniques or the real nature of the organization. They often hide behind various front groups. They are frequently secretive or vague with regard to the true nature of their beliefs and activities. They generally lie in order to get members to join and stay.

Terrorism is Mass Societal Ritual Abuse

There are common factors present in cults, terrorism, and ritual abuse. Schmid and Jongman (1988) rank the elements as they appear in terrorist acts in this way: violence, force, politics, fear-terror, threats, psychological effects and anticipated reactions, targets and victim issues, the intentionality, whether systematic, planned or organized and finally methods of combat, strategy and tactics.

Ritual abuse came to world attention when satanic brotherhoods and cult-like groups became more visible allowing the world to see their approach. What the world saw were the tactics of mind control, ritual and sexual abuse, torture and other actions performed ‘in the name of’ (Satanic) power and control. Ritual abuse is: psychological, sexual, and/or physical assault on another willing or unwilling person, committed by one or more people on one or more persons who have as their primary motives a prescribed ritual, a specific goal and the desire to satisfy a perceived need. Noblitt and Perskin (2000) revised the many different definitions and devised a more succinct and inclusive definition of ritual abuse: “any deliberate abuse which threatens death and is carried out in a ceremonial or circumscribed manner in order to create or manipulate the mind to dissociate into different parts” (pp. 47–48).

While the lone ritual abuser perpetrates on one person at a time, the societal ritual abuser uses a messenger as a representative of the organization and as a tool of the ultimate goal—to abuse as many as possible for power and control. While the intentions are somewhat different, the actions are similar. Both enlist mind control techniques and impose their will and power over the other and others. Individual perpetrators form a coalition with the one against the others. Mass societal abusers openly abuse as many of the others as possible. The essence of mass societal ritual abuse is any violent and aggressive act designed to impact and impart a memory filled with terror and threat for a specific goal against many.

The word 'ritual' as used in the concept of societal abuse is defined here to mean an inflexible, stylized, and repetitive sequence of actions. The ritually repetitive inflexible stylized actions are the essence of what may be called 'the dynamics of urban terrorism' (Salwa, personal communication) or more simply stated, societal ritual abuse.

Rituals are prompted by religious belief, fervor or extremism. The general purpose of rituals is to express some fundamental truth or meaning, evoke spiritual, numinous emotional responses from participants, and/or engage a group of people in unified action to strengthen their communal bonds (Wikipedia, 2004). The word ritual, when used as an adjective, relates to the noun 'rite,' as in rite of passage. A ritual is a formalized, predetermined set of symbolic actions generally performed in a particular environment at a regular, recurring interval. The set of actions that comprise a ritual often include, but are not limited to, such things as recitation, singing, group processions, repetitive dance, manipulation of sacred objects, etc. Human sacrifice was practiced in many ancient cultures. Victims were ritually killed in a manner that was supposed to please or appease gods or spirits. On very rare occasions human sacrifices still occur today (WordiQ, 2004).

A ritual act has symbolic power and affects the ritualizer, and ripples through family, community, and society. Rituals are born out of idiosyncratic religious or cultural value systems and basically have no political aspirations. There are exceptions where some rituals have been claimed to be the source of assassinations as in the assassination of Yitzchak Rabin in 1995 (Horovitz, 2004).

According to the newspaper reports, a group of rabbis worked the ritual of the Pulsa De Nura with the intent of removing Rabin from office by death (Brook, 1998). The ritual is performed through the energy focused intent of the group as they enter the secret pathways of the Kabbalah. The Kabbalah is a body of mystical Jewish teachings based on an interpretation of hidden meanings in the Hebrew Scriptures. Rituals are immutable to reason, negotiation, or satisfaction.

Abuse we herein define as any form of violent mistreatment (verbal, psychological, emotional, or spiritual) of a person or animal and the illegal, improper, or harmful use of something or an illegal or harmful or improper practice.

All three groups, terrorists, cultists and ritual abusers have at one time, to one degree or another engaged in the following illegal and unethical practices: child abuse, neglect and death; illegal and fraudulent immigration; drug dealing; smuggling money, cars, guns, gems; fraud and deceit in recruiting, business, financial records, and fund raising; theft; harassment of families and former members with threats, lawsuits and foul play; stockpiling and smuggling weapons and ammunition; beatings; sexual abuse and prostitution; kidnapping; murder; attempted murder; and psychological and emotional damage (Zimbardo, 1997).

The combination of cult elements mixed with terrorist elements is a potent and fear filling aspect of the 21st century. A generation or more ago Burgess (1963) predicted in his novel a Clockwork Orange the development of a strong and aversive negative segment of society. This prediction seems to have fulfilled itself in the 21st century which has given birth to the cult of terrorism which perpetrates Societal Ritual Abuse on mankind.

The motivating factors behind terrorism vary and are numerous. For the most part terrorism uses violence to create a dramatic effect. The violence is a means towards political changes. By demonstrating the coercive power of violence to the masses, mass trauma becomes one means of gaining power and control over much of the society.

Terror… Trauma… The Ongoing Drama

The word trauma is defined in varying ways. The following definition is used in this chapter (Yoeli & Prattos, 2002). Trauma is:

The perception of an event,

As it is experienced by the individual,

As a realistic or interpreted threat to ones life;

Often accompanied by a sense of helplessness and overwhelming anxiety;

And sequentially leading to the development of post-traumatic stress disorder with or without dissociation;

Irrespective of whether there was active involvement in the sudden, unexpected events, and regardless of realistic magnitude of the event.

The terror, the trauma and the ongoing effect it has on persons witnessing and/or experiencing the ‘event’ are the drama. This drama consists of repetitive, continuous events perceived as life threatening, and resulting in multifaceted symptoms, varying from simple anxiety to full blown PTSD.

Drama is the essence of the trauma and is Societal Ritual Abuse. By definition terrorism in the form of Societal Ritual Abuse contains acts of violence. Violence is the essence of trauma.

The trauma of violence comes in many forms of abuse. Abuse is the improper use of power by one person to the detriment of another and can occur anywhere. Terrorism is violent abuse in all forms; psychological, physical, sexual, neglect and acts of omission, discrimination, as well as financial or material abuse.

Coping with constant anxiety and fear of violent abuse is exhausting, and defense mechanisms come into play. Denial is one means of releasing the tension. Depression, depersonalization, derealization and dissociation often follow the repression, suppression, and subjugation effects of the violence of terrorist trauma. These effects are often experienced in the form of trance states or splitting of parts of the person's awareness, the latter being an extreme defense mechanism of the brain. These enhance the power and control of the abuser and leader. The promotion of repression, suppression and subjugation is an integral part of terrorist (and abuser) strategy.

A trance state is one of the symptoms of PTS/D. Other symptoms of PTSD resulting from acts of violence are hyper-vigilance, constant alert, and fear which are the core elements of dissociation. A society coerced into trance and dissociative states resulting from PTS/D is malleable in the hands of the terrorists and abusers.

The Recipe for Mass Societal Ritual Abuse

On a very creative website (Herasimchuk, 2004), the following recipe was found which artistically describes in a simple format how the 'one' affects the whole.

Step 1

One zealot starts the process. He is a fanatic and preaches a 'way,' his own way, to solve 'problems.' Terror, violence, and murder are his 'way.' This reminds the world of the Swiftian "Modest Proposal,"—"to eat or kill the children" (Swift, 1973 ed). Swift's scheme was designed to solve both the poverty issue and population growth problem of his time. This is an interesting yet horrifying way to solve a political problem. Modern day one-on-one ritual abuse is no less horrific and is kin to the preaching of the 'Way.' This lone zealot will use ritual abuse over an extended period of time to gain power and control. The (rituals) abuse (are) is repeated and the physical abuse is severe, sometimes including torture and killing.

The sexual abuse is usually painful, sadistic, and humiliating, intended as a means of gaining dominance over the victim. The psychological abuse is devastating. Both during and after the abuse, most victims are in a state of terror, mind control, and dissociation (Los Angeles County Commission For Women, 1991).

Step 2

This same zealot has convinced a small but growing group of the rightness of his terms of the creation of violent criminals. The nature versus nurture dichotomy is no longer sufficient. Athens' (1992) theory considers the more holistic approach which takes into account the complex and continuous interactions between the individual and the environment and the interaction that leads to the behavior pattern. Leaders of terrorist groups of any kind work to convince and subjugate the neophants, creating a 'we'…'they' system of good and evil.

Step 3

The Means

Converts murder a large group of innocent people to strike fear and emphasize that there is a 'way.' The population at large has been drawn into the ideology of the 'way.' Most have become at least a little anxious. Others have listened to the preaching of the converts about 'the way.' More have been convinced of the 'way.' Many use the methods of striking fear and murdering to control the population at large. Their own safety lies in supporting the leader, the zealot.

By purposefully developing trance and dissociative states, terrorism controls the minds and focus of much of the world's population. This is like the ritual abuse on one person whose mind becomes controlled by the abuser. Similarly, the zealot gains control over his converts. Terrorism maintains that control through threats of annihilation. As mentioned above, ritual abuse contains the element of deliberate mind control through the intensive bombardment of the senses. When the senses are overwhelmed and have no recovery time the individual begins a dissociative process. Trance states and dissociation are some means by which an individual is able to survive the threat of annihilation.

That zealot has become the leader of an organization. His 'way' is 'the way.' Power and control, coercion of the masses, world influence—change is the goal today. And the power-hungry, divisive leaders of victimized countries under the influence of the zealot, engage in a war against others—'any' others and the result is the death of many innocent people. And yet the religious zealot remains ‘a leader at large’ and the act is in ‘the name of.’

The leaders of terrorism deliberately threaten mass annihilations. Governmental acts of retaliation are limited where there are unknown threats. Governments prepare for a war with an enemy they have difficulty finding and defining while individuals fear for their lives and dissociate into denial. Mass societal ritual abuse is abuse in full force. The lone zealot’s hunger for power and control has enabled him become a ‘great’ leader, and a strategist of war tactics. The result is death in almost holocaustal numbers, fear in the hearts of the masses, and innocent people threatened to their core being.

War is devastating for everyone. Dehumanization of the innocent has become part of warfare. Shooting at everything that moves, including children, has become normative behavior. The message conveyed to the soldiers of today is ‘that it’s no tragedy to kill children and none of you (soldiers) is guilty.’ The childhood of tens of thousands of youngsters is being lived from one trauma to the next, from horror to horror. Even children have become a targeted part of the dehumanization campaign of war (Levy, 2004).

Survival requires the ability to adjust, habituate and accommodate (Flavell, 1977). Deceit is one means to do that. Afghanistan is an example of a need to find the means to survive under the decree of terrorist zealots to comply or die. Women were forced to wear the burka veil over their faces, which covered all but their eyes, as an act of submission and subjugation by the ‘leaders.’ Not all the women wanted to wear the burka. Not all women were willing to be forced and intimidated into wearing the burka. Many were defiant and deceptive and went ‘underground’ to hide their rebelliousness. There they took off their burka’s and even danced and played. Out on the streets and visible to the leaders they wore the mask of the burka pretending to accept the leader (LaCayo, 2001).

The duality was a means to dissociate from and to create a false front. Secure in one part of their mind that they could be who they are and want to be, to survive they demonstrated ‘good girl’ behavior. Their lives depended on that.

Living in a constant state of terror, anxiety and dread is debilitating and leads to desensitization where the horrors become ‘normalized’ and just another part of daily life. Depression, depersonalization, and derealization are accessed at the last stage of the peak anxiety. The zealot believes he is in control and has won.

Terrorism and Mind Control

The mind controlling element in terrorism needs to be addressed. Mind control is annihilation of the essence of the individual (Shengold, 1989). Terrorism does not threaten to annihilate mankind per se. The idea behind terrorism is mind control through the annihilation of man's freedom and ability to think for himself and be. It is the murder of man's essence, being and soul. The lone ritual abuser controls the minds of his solitary and individual victims, while the terrorist controls the minds of the masses through societal ritual abuse.

Comprehending the massiveness of these issues and addressing them is essential for the stability of the world as we currently know it. Today's modernized society have their 'inalienable' rights of birth; the freedom to think, to question, to choose, to feel and to be themselves. And when those freedoms are stolen through victimization of the masses the balance of the world is endangered and the idea of global warming no longer refers to the weather.

The Circle and Cycle of Violence

Violence or the threat of violence where there is the capacity and the willingness to commit violence is endemic to terrorists and ritual abusers.

This is the primary factor that produces the terrorism that is the societal ritual abuse of the 21st century (PageWise, 2002).

The development of violent behavior patterns that are seen in cults, ritual abusers and terrorism has been studied by many different researchers. The theory that best answers the question as to why this violence appears and is acted upon comes from Athens (1992) book The Creation of Dangerous Violent Criminals in which he describes how the heinous criminal develops.

Athens' (1992) theory of violentization is one means to conceptualize a basis for understanding the development of violent behavior. It is one means to understand how terrorism becomes unleashed. Grossman (1995) also provides a similar theoretical understanding of how people are able to kill. Athens' violentization theory is an approach which conjoins and integrates the social and environmental experience with the interfamilial trans-generational issues (Hudson, 1999). The theoretical bases for explaining violent behaviors are found in bio-physiological and social environmental theories (Athens, 1992).

Bio-physiological Theory

Mednick (1977) studied the indices of the autonomic nervous system activities, i.e., galvanic skin response (GSR) of criminals and delinquents Mednick's theory claims that children unable to learn from punishment become dangerous violent criminals. The regulation of fear arousal is a function of the autonomic (sympathetic) nervous system. "In the initial stage of threat, a startle or alarm reaction is initiated, in which the sympathetic component of the autonomic nervous system (ANS) is suddenly and significantly activated, resulting in increased heart rate, blood pressure, respiration, and muscle tone, as well as hypervigilance. Distress is expressed in crying and then screaming (Perry et al., 1995 as cited in Schore, 2001, p. 214).

It is the arousal and dissipation of fear which controls whether children can learn from punishment. Mednick's work has been supported by Porges' polyvagal theory (1997) about the affect regulation of the nervous system in the polyvagal theory of emotion which links the evolution of the autonomic nervous system to affective experience, emotional expression, vocal communication and contingent social behavior.

Behaviorally, this first stage is associated with immobilization behaviors. In animals, this system facilitates 'playing possum.' In humans it causes dissociative freeze states and other parasympathetic dissociative symptoms. This is the state of frozen terror. The second stage inhibits the primitive vagal system's influence on the gut, to foster mobilization behaviors necessary for 'fight or flight.' The third stage (ventral vagal complex) is unique to mammals and is characterized by a myelinated vagal system that can rapidly regulate cardiac output to foster engagement and disengagement with the environment, promoting calm and pro-social behavior (Porges, 1997; Bergman, personal communication, 2004; Schore, 2001; Siegel, 1999; Scaer, 2001; Nijenhuis et al., 1998, 2004; Perry, 1995). It appears that there are direct connections between infant post-traumatic stress disorder and child, adolescent, and adult stress disorders as Gurvitz et al. (2000) have reported. They also acknowledged that adult PTSD patients with neurological soft signs frequently report traumatic childhood events.

Social Environmental Theories and the Group

Social environmental theories are based on the idea that a subculture develops around a social problem requiring definition and change in social policy. Post (1990) adds that when an individual or group identifies a negative condition they seek others who think similarly and band together to right the wrong.

Wolfgang and Ferracuti (1967) developed the social environmental theory to explain dangerous violent criminals. They studied the differential rates of violent crimes in different social categories with particular interest in the criminal homicide. They theorized that societies have 'subcultures of violence' which include a system of norms that prescribe, demand and expect violent action and proscribe non-violent actions for settling arguments. Bandura (1996) says that moral disengagement evolves in the subculture of terrorist violence. He describes the four mechanisms of moral disengagement as the insulation elements enabling dissociation from the consequences of heinous acts of violence.

The first is moral justification whereby the individual is able to justify his inhumanity by euphemistic labels or moral justification. The second technique is displacement of responsibility whereby ‘someone’ more important is responsible, and the individual is just a functionary. Cordes (1987) points out a third technique used to minimize or ignore the actual suffering of the victims, as a means of insulation against recognizing their own role in causing the other pain. The fourth technique (Bandura, 1996) is the dehumanization of victims. The victim is seen as less than as in Islamic groups, where the victim is the infidel. In this subculture violence is easily facilitated because aggression become justifiable, the party responsible for felt troubles comes from evil but our group is good. This norm puts the members of the sub-culture in daily conflict with conventional society. (Athens, 1992; Wolfgang and Ferracuti, 1967).

If violence is excusable “in the name of…” then, Bandura (1996) believes, that the precursor for terrorism is the moral disengagement of the terrorist from the action of inhumane and immoral conduct, is one of the binding elements of these groups, and provides the ‘acceptability’ for their actions. (See step 3 above.) Groups that are organized into cells and columns may be more capable of carrying out ruthless operations because of the potential for displacement of responsibility. The group must become the sole source of support and friendship. The sense of belonging, purpose, and identity is locked into the relationships within the group. For Volkan (2002) the solution to understanding the mind of terrorism is in the understanding of the psychology of large group identity.

Neither the bio-physiological nor the social environmental theories can stand alone in Athens’ Theory of Violentization.

Athens’ theory (1992), on why people become violent, developed over a period of 20 years of interviewing hundreds of violent convicts. The elements in his theory are easily extrapolated to provide a means to understand the phases involved in the evolution of modern day terrorism The concept put forth by Athens is that negative social experience, and inner experience during that negative social experience, has a four stage process which, when completed [and without exception] creates the violent format of terrorism where terrorists, societies, ritual abusers become capable of assault, rape, and murder of another human being (Athens, 1992).

DiIullio (2000) succinctly describes the Athens’ four stage violentization process: it begins with “brutalization”: a parent or other authority figure batters a child, allows the child, to witness him physically subjugate others, and then taunts the child into settling violently even minor playground disputes. Next is “belligerency”: the scared youth placates the mentor-menace by threatening peers who give the slightest provocation. “Violent performances” follow: the terror-in-training wins bloody fights, smells fear in others, and likes the smell. Finally, there is “virulency”: the child-predator preaches to himself about the virtues of violence, and bonds socially only with others who share, or can be brutalized into sharing his savage-or-be-savaged worldview.”

Social Experience

Killing innocent people [in acts of terrorism] is heinous (Athens, 1992; Muzaffar, 2002). The violent criminal, and the terrorist, whether considered a freedom fighter, or a militant, by this assaultive action against innocent victims, become undifferentiated.

Athens (1992) quoting Dewey (1929) on the concept of social experience wrote that; … a social experience emerges from the special interaction that takes place between a human organism and his social environment during the process of living. This generates thoughts and emotions in the interaction between human beings. The essential element is that interaction of what is within the organic body and what lies outside in space and time (p.15).

Athens’ (1992) theory of violentization integrates the somatic experience to the social environment based on Dewey’s concept that the organic body and the social environment are indivisible. Careful study of social experiences is the key to discovery of the creation of dangerous and violent people. This is the basis of the Athens theoretical construct.

The violentization process begins with elements of child abuse. It is not the equivalent of child abuse or maltreatment or neglect. It is the first stage that leads to becoming “heinously violent.” Child abuse and maltreatment mostly leads to juvenile delinquency. Cruel treatment by others produces a long term and dramatic impact on the course of their lives, (Athens, 1992) but this alone does not necessarily create a violent heinous criminal. According to Athens, extremely violent people consciously construct violent plans of action before they commit violent criminal acts. This is the formula of terrorism as cult and ritual abuse of the 21st century. To become that heinous violent criminal all four stages need to be completed.

Role and Effect of Violence in Development

Literature has shown that there are three types of recognized violence which cause long lasting reactions and effects in children well into adulthood;

1. Child Maltreatment

Widom's (1989a, 1989b) data, for example, reveal that children with a documented history of childhood abuse and neglect, are at a greater risk for arrest for a violent crime, and are also at greater risk for earlier and more chronic involvement in criminal behavior. Children who suffer from childhood abuse and neglect are left with a sense of conflict, confusion and frustration. Thus, it is not surprising that adolescents, having encountered conflict, confusion, and frustration, often feel disoriented and anxious (Hunter, 1998). These youth are prime candidates for religious cult recruiters as well as for terrorist groups.

2. Inter-Parental and Interfamilial Violence

There is statistical evidence that indicates that exposure to violence is associated with later risk for psychological problems and for being abusive to others (Browne and Finkelhor, 1986; Rossman and Rosenberg, 1998; Kratcoski, 1985). Many children experience or observe violence within the confines of their own homes or within their own neighborhoods (Margolin and Gordis, 2000). The Pakistani conference on child abuse reports on their observations during visits made to fundamentalist Muslim homes: there was "slapping, striking, whipping and thrashing" of children, with constant shaming and humiliation, often the children were being told by their mothers that they are "cowards" if they don't hit others. Physical abuse, they said, of children is continuous (deMause, 2002; Mazharul, 1972).

Children's experiences with violence, either as victims or as witnesses, have been described as a public health problem of epidemic proportions (Glodich, 1998; Koop & Lundberg, 1992; Pynoos, 1993). Glazov, (2001) concurs with Widom (1989 a, b) that intra-familial issues of physical punishment, possible sexual abuse, parental violence, and negligence create a wounded child with a sense of emasculation and a rage reaction. It is not uncommon for these wounded children to seek out groups where 'violence' is accepted and encouraged, and at the other extreme these same people are targeted and recruited by cult organizations and abusively duped and used within the cult.

3. Community Violence

Herman (1997) reported less than 20% of the general population living under ongoing war circumstances, such as in Israel and Kosovo, suffer from PTSD. Laufer, (as cited in Alon, 2003) and Salman (2003) found from their respective studies that children in Palestine and Israel suffer PTSD in the range of 42%–60%. This is greater than the original estimate mentioned by Herman. More research is needed to demonstrate the devastating effect ongoing community violence has on all age groups.

Hendawi (2002) published a newspaper article on the effects on children growing up in what is more or less a war zone. He quotes the director of Gaza city's psychiatric hospital, psychiatrist Abdul-Rahman Bakr, "these children have no idea what a normal childhood is like." In Gaza, the pictures are of battle scenes and the aftermath. Children draw what they see, says Hendawi. Probably, one of the most devastating effects on children in war such as this is that the children have to face their own vulnerabilities as they bury friends and relatives.

The impact of violence exposure goes beyond emotional and behavioral disorders. It affects children's views of the world and of themselves, their ideas about the meaning and purpose of life, their expectations for future happiness (Margolin and Gordis, 2000).

The first three types of violence have demonstrated the emotional effects on the children. According to Perry et al. (1995) there are also bio-physiological reactions. The child is in a persistent state of fear which becomes a trait. This means that the child will very easily be moved from being mildly anxious to feeling threatened to being terrorized. Perry et al. (1995) demonstrate that the human infant's psychobiological response to trauma is comprised of two separate response patterns, hyperarousal and dissociation. In the long run, maladaptive, emotional, dissociation, behavioral and cognitive problems rooted in the original adaptive response to a traumatic event is what is observed in these children. Dissociation is the end result. When fear is dissociated it becomes impossible for the person's system to learn from punishment (Mednick, 1997) since not all of the system experiences the punishment.

The Future Impact of Societal Ritual Abuse

The fourth dimension: another aspect of family and socio-cultural dynamic is the trans generationalism. Kobrin, in collaboration with Schweitzer (as cited in Chesler, 2004), add a 4th dimension to the cycle that produces what Schweitzer (2001) has named the "human time bombs," that of sexual abuse and mutilation. Kobrin describes below the barbarous cultural background dimension of the suicide bombers: "family and clan dynamics in which children, both boys and girls, are routinely orally and anally raped by male relatives; infant males are sometimes sadistically over-stimulated by being masturbated; boys between the ages of 7–12 are publicly and traumatically circumcised (as cited in Chesler, 2004)."

Children raised in cults or brotherhoods where this similar behavior is experienced follow the same pattern of development. The end result for both groups is a willingness to perform, and perpetrate societal ritual abuse on large populations.

DeMause (2002) expands the perspective into the trans-generational effects of growing up in a violent environment. Reports about a recent survey of Palestinian students indicate that the sexual abuse of girls is far higher in Palestine than elsewhere (Haj-Yahia, 2001). These battered, often mutilated women in fundamentalist Muslim families and societies are less than ideal mothers and reflect their own miseries on the next generation. A culture, in which shame and honor play decisive roles, and in which the debasement of women is paramount, is able to produce a human bomb, says Kobrin. These women are treated very badly as they are considered the main source of that shame and dishonor (Azim, 2004). The female child in certain societies is often sexually traumatized by abuse or mutilation in the form of clitoridectomy and lives under the threat of death should any male other than her husband ever touch her, she will be killed along with the man or if the man is too powerful to kill, in place of him, so as to preserve the paternal and familial honor. Terrorism perpetrated by women as suicide bombers destroys images of women, distorts the concept of motherhood, and the shocking aspect ‘entrances’ or mesmerizes the society as the myths break down about how women are supposed to behave in these cultures—submissive, caring and in the background. It is this ‘entrancement’ that enables the dissociation.

The dissociative personality structure that comes about from the mutilation and abuse in these Islamic cultures is quite often permanently fragmented and dominated by alters. These alters switch in and out of the ‘adult’ personality (deMause, 2002). This is chaotic and confusing for children. This is a dissociative, debased, and traumatized mother raising her children who will become dissociated, debased and traumatized as well (Kobrin, as cited in Chesler 2004; Volkan, 2002). Magai (1999) and Liotti (2002) concur that a shame-sensitive parent establishes means for the intergenerational transmission of the shame affect which characterizes the fearful-avoidant parent. This, Magai says, is accomplished by the use of coercive disciplinary practices.

This concept of transgenerational exchange of dissociative and traumatized anxiety-based experiences is copied within some of the different communal groups considered to be cults. What has come to light in some places is that there are children born and ‘raised’ within the communes. Some of these communes raise their children not necessarily knowing who their real parents are. Some of these environments have been cited as sexually overly stimulating and some have been cited as being physically abusive. Those entering these ‘cult’ groups have been depleted of much of their original personality. As parents they can only pass on what they have left over after their abusive indoctrinations and trainings.

The roots of terrorism and terrorist behavior lie according to deMause (2002), not in an American foreign policy error but rather in the extremely abusive families of the terrorists. Islamic terrorists are often products of a misogynist fundamentalist system that often segregates the family into two separate living areas, for men, and women with children. This misogynistic and paternalistic pattern is transmitted trans-generationally within the society. It is compounded with the environmental circumstances of constant war and ongoing life threatening events. The result is that the possibility of developing into calm, confident, assured, empathic adults are rather limited (deMause, 2002).

The violence children are exposed to may affect them differently at different ages and may disrupt normal development. Evidence indicates that the exposure to this violence can affect not only physical health and safety but also psychological adjustment, social relations, and scholastic work. The child's view of himself may become distorted along with their ideas about the meaning of life, future happiness and moral development. Garbarino et al. (1991), Ney et al. (1994) and Chesler, (2004) concur that widespread child sexual abuse can lead to paranoid, highly traumatized, and revenge-seeking adults.

Violent misogynistic families appear to delimit the ability to empathize. Most terrorists according to deMause (2002) come from these family types. Lack of empathy is another element in the equation that leads to the unleashing of the societal ritual abuser.

Cementing in 'The Violentization': The Role of the Media

In this conceptualization, the media and the concept of freedom of press become a partner in the enabling of societal ritual abuse.

The technology of the 20th century has elevated the abilities of any government and media, and any one leader to control the minds of mankind. The Orwellian prediction of "big brother is watching you" (Orwell, 1949) is evolving rapidly. Today's mind control by the media is only one example of the many forms of ceremonious abuse that rocks the 21st century.

Individuals already coping with internalized and embedded anxiety are now forced to develop newer more effective defense mechanisms to contain the overflow. Many more persons are now enabled or traumatized into using dissociative mechanisms which are methods of denial, depersonalization, derealization and basically a means of distancing oneself from the horrors around. Through media coverage, PTSD and dissociation, resulting from the viewing of current traumatic events, expand and culminate into ritual abuse of entire societies and affecting globally.

Society Abuse and Media Abuse

Abuse has the clear intent of murder of the soul. Its purpose is to gain total submission over its victims. That control is maintained through the constant and consistent threat of annihilation reported over the media waves; someone (never identified) somewhere (unknown) passed on a definitive message that some terrorist group is going to perpetrate some major disaster on specific airplanes and flights. These flights of course are cancelled. The lives of hundreds of people are disrupted without the pe petrators having to do anything more than pass on a message. Society has been suppressed into submission (CBS News, 2004). Similarly, the RA victim lives in constant threat of the abuser and is silenced into submission and secrecy with the subtlest of threats or bribes.

The 21st century with its media bombardment and hot off the field information has enabled a world to configure itself into states of denial, detachment, despair, depression and dissociation. The knowledge that the fear of annihilation is the reality is felt at the global and individual level equally. Consider the effect the repetitive viewing of the replay of the strike on the World Trade Center had on the millions of people who watched, hypnotically entranced. Over and over again the world watched the ceremony of destroy, destruct and take over. Each replay of the event empowered the al Qaeda movement. Each repetition increased the awe (that kind of awe that is reserved only for God). The pains of the thousands were heard in the background to the ‘unreality of the re-creation of the potential destruction of the world by an evil satanistic avenging God. ‘For it was all ‘in the name of.’

In one corner of the world, in Israel, as the entire world watched the twin towers collapse, Israelis were remembering the weekly bus bombings of 1995, and the continuous terrorist acts perpetrated on almost a daily basis since then. They were remembering their own paralyzed state and feeling it again. They thought—now perhaps the world understands the true meaning of terror. They remembered the fear, the anxiety and the sense of being forced to play Russian roulette every day and against their will; a state of total helplessness.

And in another part of the world—in Turkey and Greece, people recalled with trepidation their own recent natural disaster as they sat staring, terrified at this man made horror show. Theirs were devastating earthquakes that shattered the calm of the world in 1999 triggering all the previous ones experienced (war events that shaped their emotional lives); the God of the Bible promised he would never destroy the world again nonetheless their lives, dreams and hopes were shattered in that moment of rumbling earth. And the man made assault on humanity brought back the fears. And the fears became anxiety and the anxiety became panic. And their thoughts screamed out “what more is coming, the world is doomed.”

The anxiety resulting from the perceived threat of annihilation can become system-pervasive and unbearable. Where unresolved trauma is already present the post trauma stress is more likely to develop into a complex PTSD which is one of the prerequisites of dissociative disorders. Denial can manifest itself as “healthy dissociation” if the choice is life supporting and life-affirming. A more negative format is the ‘devil may care’ attitude which is acted out by self-destructive behaviors such as reckless driving, drinking, drugging, risky sexual behavior, vandalism and other petty crime.

In the state of denial and dissociation, emotions are on hold. There is a 10-mile stare in the eye. There is no awareness of their state of mind. And of course, there is no reason for therapy. Other difficult behavior patterns are seen in those who have been frozen in a state of high-panic, which inhibits their freedoms of movement, choice, thought and action (Levine, 1997). The media exacerbate and perpetrate fear and threats on its audience. The audience is hypnotized by the media and is transported into the trauma itself. The unresolved embedded anxieties are triggered and the post trauma stress evolves. And the people have become the pawns and passive armies of society’s ritual abusers.

The Way it All Works

How Global Societal Ceremonial Ritualistic and Systematic Abuse Dissociates the Masses—The Mechanism of Defense: Dissociation as Survival

When the basic safety of the individual (Maslow, 1954) is threatened and the notion and perception of the world as a safe place is shattered either by external events such as natural disasters, wars or other uncontrollable events that boggle and co-opt the “mind,” the threat of annihilation is then activated in the system. When this happens, the freedom of choice, of thinking, and of being is threatened or destroyed. The threat of loss of physical and essential life initiates the process of dissociation when the flooded being becomes overwhelmed and verges on its own death.

Dissociation is a primary coping mechanism designed to reduce the level of fear and anxiety. Dissociation runs on a continuum from healthy dissociation all the way to PTSD and pathology. The type of dissociation is associated with the magnitude, duration and location of the individual at the time of the impact of events and past history. Up to 40% of THE PEOPLE will “discover” the defense mechanism of dissociation.

The Process: Reactions to and Coping with Traumatic Events

From the moment of our birth we learn to tolerate stress and discomfort. This ability to adapt and accommodate and assimilate to new life experiences has a threshold (Flavel, 1977; Piaget, 1974). In the aftermath of a traumatic event of mega proportion when assimilation of external data fails and adaptation fails, the brain's capacity to adapt through the functions of accommodation and assimilation breaks down. The perceived threat of potential death triggers the most brilliant of created living mechanisms, the human brain, into a protective mode. To protect the core self the dissociative process takes over when the individual peaks at his stress threshold and is without the means to relieve the stress, assimilate, and process the events. Anxiety-based behavior patterns are born and become the accommodation of the brain and the safety mask of the core self.

The media exposure seem to be able to trigger anxiety-based reactions such as dissociation and denial. When the anxiety is triggered it is superimposed on any embedded anxiety triggered by the most recent traumatic event such as 9/11. A new repertoire of anxiety-based behavior patterns then appear and affect interpersonal and familial relationships and puts this population at greater risk for complex post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

A traumatic event is perceived differently by each individual in terms of their own traumatic past, their physical, psychological, and emotional distance from the event. No two people, experiencing the same event, will perceive or react in the same way. Whether a traumatic event is physically or vicariously experienced from any distance (from being in the event or media exposure) the felt stress can develop into post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

The following eight circles clearly depict how even at a distance traumatic events can lead to PTSD. Distance from the trauma is visualized in terms of concentric circles where the event is in the center of the primary circle. The trauma experience is measured in terms of distance on a straight line from the core event. The role of prior history of trauma is significant in terms of triggered PTS as the distance from the event increases. Multiple traumatic experiences must be taken into consideration and are relevant in terms of the impact no matter which circle or how far distant one is.

The Eight Circles

1st circle: those hurt physically

2nd circle: those physically present but unhurt, shock

3rd circle: those who were not present at the time but arrived on the scene to assist

4th circle: passers-by who happen to be on the scene

5th circle: those who by chance were not there

6th circle: family members of casualties and wounded

7th circle: casual acquaintances

8th circle: general population

The Defense of Dissociation Sets In

But the reality is—it is morning and time to go to work—'put on the mask.' And many individuals in homes around the world sit in states of introspection—reviewing buried memories of physical, emotional, monetary and psychological abuse perpetrated on them and never spoken of. And the fear and the panic expand. And we see how people suddenly lose their sense of safety, their sense of freedom, and their rights to live their lives, their rights to think and to choose for themselves. The comfort zone, the sense of peace is gone. But the reality is—it is morning and time to go to work. And the feeling is, that is impossible—'put on the mask.' The heart explodes with the panic and the only way to deal with it is to 'put on the mask' and just do it. And that frozen soul is bubbled into silence. And the world for each individual was changed in little ways every time, all 'in the name of.' For the individual much was changed. The level of anxiety went up, comfort zones became less comforting and pleasure seeking became the goal at whatever cost. And this too is all 'in the name of.'

Society had to find ways and means to lessen the tension and the fears and discovered new ways of living and loving and playing. Different coping attitudes and more hedonistic behaviors; drug abuse increased, sexual frivolity increased, recklessness in all areas increased particularly on the roads, patience lost its virtuousness and a 'devil may care' attitude sprung up. New bullies are born. The news loses its interests. Politics becomes a playground. And running through it all is deep embedded anxiety. Society dissociates from the horrific realities and reflects the dissociative states of the individual. The macrocosm and the microcosm have blended, all 'in the name of.'

It doesn't matter ''in the name of' whom. Fear of annihilation is globally and individually shared. A masked dissociated society is the result. Intense anxiety may be triggering dissociation that is the result of the fear of annihilation. And the society and the individual under the systematic ceremonious ritualistic abuse are touched and changed, and the individual and the society become one and the same. And all are wearing masks. It is a costume ball filled with masked guests.

The Role of the Media in Mind Control

Because mind control is the cornerstone of ritual abuse, the key element in the subjugation and silencing of its victims—the effects of media's messages subtle or clear—are particularly salient. This wavelength mind control is no less systematic, ritualistic, ceremonious or abusive to the observer than that of the lone ritual abuser to the person of his choice.

Mind control via the media wavelengths effects the global population. The more global war becomes, the more widespread and destructive its long term effects. As the media play and replay the horrific events of every day, this external source can control the thinking of its audience.

Techniques and methodologies for subtly controlling the thinking of audiences are well known not only to psychologists, commercialists, and sales persons but also to many others who have learned techniques and methods of 'controlling,' manipulating and subtly indoctrinating and programming the other. Bandler and Grinder (1975) developed the neurolinguistic programming (NLP) on the basis of Erickson's hypnotic techniques.

Wier (2002), reminds us that with NLP it is relatively easy to hypnotize a person and to keep that person in a trance state without their being aware that they are in fact in a trance. The magnitude of influence, mind control or thought control via the media is boggling. The media have become a pawn of the abusers, political activists, terrorists and others. The effects are clearly visible even today on the population at large.

The Impact

The threat of annihilation is activated in the system and the mind is controlled. Mind control happens under deliberately created stress and threat. It is designed to produce a state of social trance. It borders on a state of hypnosis. It is designed to gain control of the mind of the individual creating a totally dependent existence on the mind controller. In this dissociative trance state the individual forfeits his freedoms of thought, choice, emotions and sense of being.

Osama bin Laden took control of the mind of the world by striking at the heart of the United States. His plan literally boggled the minds. The greater part of the world became his subjects, slaves and hostages. The enormous shock electrified the system of the individual, the group, society and the world: Osama took control of the mind by destroying the feelings by striking at the heart; he deliberately created a dissociative populous that is the true element of ritual abuse.

Constant systematic terrorist bombardment of any kind terrorizes individuals, families, communities, and nations. Every hit threatens the next blow. No place is safe. It is a ritual, it is a ceremony, and it includes a prayer done ‘in the name of’ a greater God. It is a matter of submit and comply. And the abuser is promised his just rewards in his heavenly state. The Hi-tech world of the 21st century submitted to Bin Laden and through the television wavelengths entered the mind of the world. Mankind went into a hypnotic state, a social trance state, a state of disbelief, fear and anxiety. “Now we have seen it all” mankind said. The world had become goggle-eyed and apoplectic. Today we know we still haven’t seen it all (Macow, 2003). And we sit and stare from our trance states watching and waiting for the next act to follow.

Acts of terrorism, war and natural disasters, provide an opportunity to study the development of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), and the effects of patterns of behavior under ongoing stress, anxiety, and future threats.

For Israelis, living under constant stress, the threat of the impending Gulf War triggers anxieties embedded and buried in the body and memory system of the individual. Some of these memories are specifically related to the Gulf War experiences of 1991, while others are memories of terrorist actions, other past wars and personal traumatic incidents. To survive, under such circumstances, the stress, anxiety and fear are repressed, suppressed and sublimated into the background where they are constrained and subsequently affect the behavior patterns and physical well being of people.

The threat to use weapons of mass destruction (WMD) in this war is particularly triggering. There are three generations of holocaust survivors living in Israel who react intensely at the mere mention of poison gas, and who still bear symptoms of post-traumatic stress (PTS). This population in and of itself is at even greater risk for full blown PTSD under the threat of gas as one of the types of Weapons of Mass Destruction. The idea of a sealed room and a gas mask is associated in most minds with the holocaust and is a resource of anxiety.

Even though Israel was not actively involved in the first Gulf War, the scud missiles from Iraq created an ‘as if Israel were at war’ situation. Many people in this ‘as if’ situation reacted with symptoms of acute ongoing traumatic stress. This stress became embedded as anxiety with each act of terrorism over the past 12 years.

Other Effects: Personal Experiences

For months prior to the March attack by the United States on Iraq in 2003, the media around the world portended disaster and even predicted a possible third World War. The world news focused on the implications of losing the war with Iraq. All the news around the world was anxiety provoking. That was a form of mass mind control in operation. The country was mobilized into a defined activity and there was a sense of being one robot among the millions.

As an American living in Israel, my American national identity was confused. The sense of betrayal from the First Gulf War was a threat as the son of the first president Bush set forth to play out the second Gulf War. Till today there is anger and disappointment with the first president Bush. These are residual feelings from listening to his instructions for surviving the First Gulf War. While we were sitting in sealed rooms in 1991 waiting for scuds to fall (39 scud missiles DID fall in Israel)—this man was playing golf on television at his Maine compound and telling the world to just relax and enjoy the war!

In Israel scuds are flying. Bush has set the stage for the sealed room to become a family play room. A year old child is placed in an incubator type gas mask. She is screaming—it is 1991 and the scud is flying. The parents put sweets and special treats in the incubator for her to help keep her quiet. Everyone else plays games in their gas masks—aliens in a foreign environment. And then we ask ourselves why 12 years later—as the second Gulf War approaches she has become obese and comes into my office in a panic state and claustrophobic. Is it really so simple to make a sealed room a play room and expect everyone to come out happy? This was/is her form of dissociation. This is an example of how the first Gulf War ‘in the name of’ abused an entire country not directly involved in that war. By threatening to send scuds to Israel if the USA started a war, a fear of annihilation was instilled into the total population.

Israel, under direct threat of annihilation by dirty scuds, in the name of protection, forced the use of gas masks on the populace, in the name of ‘safety.’ This is a population born into the primary circle of the holocaust gassings. The threat of Iraq to use WMD or gas on this population is as abusive as sexual abuse. It is the rape of the soul of a nation.

The second and third generations were already scarred by the holocaust’s dissociative parenting figures and this new threat of annihilation directly affected the life of this third generation holocaust child. A dissociative state emerged in the form of a bulimic phobic. The triggering event was the media exposure to the potential Iraq war which struck her subconscious memory bank where the embedded anxiety was stored and brought forth dissociative states for protection and in the name of ‘safety’ from further abuse.

As mental health professionals, recognizing that the stress of world events is a major element in the formation of PTS/D and is a precursor of dissociative behavior and Acute Stress Disorder (ASD) is of utmost importance. Below is the continuum chart we suggest which defines the different anxiety based trauma patterns on a continuum depicting the drama of the individual in terms of previous untended embedded traumatic history.

TIME LINE OF TRAUMA TYPES © Yoeli, Prattos 2002

A. Primary Trauma

1. Single Incident Trauma
2. Acute Trauma

B. Secondary Trauma

1. Shock of the Event with Immediate Involvement—Acute Trauma
2. Past Unresolved Trauma + Observation-Acute Trauma

C. Tertiary Trauma

1. Vicarious Trauma
2. Re-Traumatizing With or Without Past

Unresolved Primary Trauma

D. Complex Trauma

1. Shock of the Event + Immediate Involvement + Past Unresolved Trauma

E. Ongoing Trauma

1. Repetitive Events Perceived/Experienced as Traumatic
2. Any or All of the Above in Any Combination

The media bombardment of the potential dangers of the U.S. vs. Iraq war produced significantly high levels of stress among Israelis. This added stress, in an already over stressed and traumatized nation and was prognostic of the development of PTSD in higher percentages of the population.

It massively triggered the unrecognized, unprocessed embedded anxiety from the previous Gulf War and past war experiences, resulting presently in the emotional flooding of the individual, familial and societal systems to such a degree that acting out and dissociation became the only outlet for the release and management of anxiety, panic, helplessness, pain, despair, horror, etc.

Just pause for a second to think of the effect on the future emotional and cognitive development of children as adults (not to mention the current and future functioning abilities of these children). The newly acquired PTSD and the dissociation involved, along with all the embedded anxieties set in motion, solidifies into the vicious circle of trauma, dissociation, and PTSD.

The Greek Story and Israeli Stories

The Greek population is representative of all the world's populations who have experienced the traumata of war and its effect on their lives. War experiences are not discussed openly in the way we are about to do here and now. Some, might want to forget their war experiences and move forward; others, might feel it is weakness, on their part, to admit they have been and still are affected; others are numb, in denial, or still in a state of PTSD. Not enough attention has been given to the direct and/or subtle ways those past unprocessed war experiences leave their scars, become embedded, affect our personalities, our beliefs and life choices and resurface in the next round of disasters. As therapists we need to be aware of these undercurrent effects.

The more global war becomes, the more widespread and destructive its long term effects. Oppression for the Greek population is a highly emotional issue. 400 years of Turkish occupation, being evacuated from Asia Minor and Izmir in 1922; saying No to Mussolini's ultimatum and being at war with Italy; suffering through executions and starvation under the German occupation in WW II; civil strife—a 4 year civil war—and the recent 7 year military junta; all these have left deep traumatic scars in the hearts of most Greeks.

From Greece

Even today, when I am asked where my family comes from, I reply "we are refugees." My father was 4 years old during the evacuation of Izmir, in 1922, and I can see the images, sounds and horror he lived through as if I were there. During his 80 years of life those experiences never lost their vividness and his never ending stories were about their survival, fear, panic, horror and the way these experiences changed his and his family's life. At 4 years old he already had PTSD. He was a son to a PTSD mother of 5 children; he lived in a society suffering a mix of PTS and PTSD. All these traumata went unprocessed, became embedded and transmitted through oral tradition to my generation.

I recently asked my mother's undertaker, a man in his mid 50's, how he chose his profession. He told me that he's a third generation refugee and the third in his family's profession, started by his grandfather in 1923 when he came from Izmir as a refugee in 1922. His primary identity is that of a refugee. If you are both a Greek and a refugee that automatically means Asia Minor, 1922. No words are needed; just a nod and we all know what this means. Greeks know only too well what war means. My generation is the first one not to have experienced war first hand. We felt the threat of war in 1974, during the Turkish invasion of northern Cyprus, when general mobilization was ordered in Greece.

My generation was not raised on Grimm fairy tales but on war and survival stories. Stories about physical and emotional pain, stories about starvation, stories about the experiences our parents and grandparents had during WWI, WWII, the civil war; stories about the pains and adjustments to losing their freedom and having to rebuild their shattered lives; stories about the pains of loosing loved ones during war, and detailed accounts about life in the midst of occupation. No Greek is untouched by war. The anxieties embedded in our bed time stories by our dissociated parents' and grandparents' narrations have remained in our lives unprocessed to date. This anxiety is triggered whenever disaster strikes.

From Israel

The Israeli media focused on the possible dangers this second gulf war might have for Israel. Many people in Israel found themselves in states of what they considered acute stress. What appeared to be happening was that unrecognized and untended anxiety remaining from their first Gulf War (GW1) experiences began to upsurge, oscillate, and resurfaced.

It would seem that the shock of the sudden fear of annihilation such as that experienced during the trauma of the first Gulf War became locked in their nervous system. It has been suggested that the term embedded trauma describes the shock of an overwhelming event that has become fixed in one or more parts of the body, often resulting in disrupted energy flows (Burns, 2003; Levine, 1997). The effect is played out on the masses. The lone victim of ritual abuse has the same reaction.

Because our daily lives in this 21st century meet traumatic events via media exposure and life experiences, this daily ingestion of threats to our being becomes tiered over previous anxieties stored in the system and which have now become embedded. They include anniversary events, repetitive abuse triggers, releases and upsurges that embedded anxiety. What happens to people on an individual basis ripples through the world.

A doomsday fear threatens global sanity, stability and security. The worlds' macrocosm of suicide bombers, terrorists and malevolent religious seekers of converts creating chaos on mankind sets the world in motion in search of safety, an escape from the horror.

Traumatic events that threaten life create intense anxiety. Often vast numbers of people are involved and there is a high percent of PTS/D and dissociative behavior. Abuse in massive form is soul murder of a society just as it is soul murder of the one victim—adult or child. Ritual abuse is a microcosmic format of mass terrorism, the venom of violent abuse spreads through society and the world. Weather and acts of God are uncontrollable, they too devastate massively.

It seems that the overwhelming sense and fear of annihilation, which appears as a common denominator in traumatic events, may be one of the key elements in the onset of dissociation. Every traumatic reaction is experienced firstly by the individual and ripples through to others in an enormous variety of ways. By examining the tragic drama of the individual's trauma we can understand the global impact of world and societal abuse on each and every one of us.

The Trance State

This sense of fear of annihilation evoked in the audience as the media report events becomes overwhelming. Habituation and accommodation take over and enable the individuals under duress to block out the pain of the fear. A trance state happens as a result of the repetitions played out like a tune that endlessly loops in the brain.

Attention becomes limited. That conscious observer part is in the state of trance though the feeling is as if in full function. However, the conscious mind has been disabled. The observing part may actually not function at full capacity. Like being able to give birth painlessly, the trance can divert the attention of the mind away from the pain and still function on another level.

Memory might not work well. The attention is so fixed that judgments may be faulty, the body may not be sensed and surroundings may seem to disappear (Wier, 2002). The trance effect result of media reported terrorism observed by audiences around the world may vicariously lead to states of PTS/D. Having a mass population entranced by the import of horrific events enables the callous continuance of heinous violent acts. Societal ritual abuse in the form of terrorism can continue unabated at the whim of the terrorist organizations because the masses are overwhelmed and stuck in their own fear codes unable to functionally react. These are the passive armies of terrorism. This process is the evolution into the dissociative states of PTS/D. Relaxation of these anxiety-provoking actions delimits the leaders' (abusers') power and control.

Towards a Positive Future

McFarland (1997) firmly believes that to stop social violence that stems from child abuse, emphasis must be placed on teaching and learning good parenting skills. It is cost efficient to set up parenting centers and long term effective parental training; in comparison to the cost to prepare the military system in a country and the costs of jailing and tending to criminals.

Psychohistorians hold indeed a systemic and holistic view of the problem. DeMause (2002) concludes that: “Only by starting now on a vast worldwide program to end child neglect and abuse and raise all of our precious children with respect can we avoid the likely coming of a global holocaust. Only by reducing dissociation to a minimum through empathic parenting can we avoid inflicting the self destructive power we now have available to us. This is the single most important finding of the new science of psychohistory. Free universal training centers for parents may be a radical new notion, but so once was the idea of free universal schools for children. Our task is clear and our resources sufficient to make our world safe for the first time in our long, violent history. All it takes is the will to begin” (p. 432).

Conclusions

The optimistic conceptualization of both McFarland (1997) and de-Mause (2002) provides a sense of “it is easy” to do, easy to stop violence and find a more peaceful way to live within the world. All that is needed, say McFarland and deMause, it seems is to teach new parents how to raise their children and the next generation is going to save the world from at the very least the apocalypse and at the very best Armageddon. This is the way and means to stop violence and abuse in the world, they believe.

Based on these simplistic and optimistic concepts many movements toward a more peace-filled planet have come and gone. The idea was to make peace not war. Coffin, was an American protestant social activist leader in the 1960’s and 1970’s and pursued civil rights and the peace movement. Then, he promoted the idea of finding a resolution to international concerns such as nuclear disarmament, and international peace (Goldstein, 2004). The Peace Corps movement started by the [Peace Corps] agency of the U.S. Government, in 1961, by executive order of President Kennedy was another move towards spreading goodness and sharing technology around the world. The congress approved it as a permanent agency within the department in the late 1960’s and said its purpose is to assist underdeveloped countries in meeting their needs for trained manpower (The Columbia Encyclopedia, 2004).

Other types of movements have been devised to demonstrate that peace is possible between nations and different religious groups. Some have come together in small settlements not as utopia, but as communes such as the kibbutzim in Israel, the international Christian Bruderhof communities in Germany, England, the United States and Australia, and the 19th-century Brook farm transcendentalist collective in West Roxbury, Massachusetts. One other form of communal living is designed not as a statement of peace but as a statement against alienation of peoples. This is the co-housing of the cornerstoners who do not isolate and are active within city life. “Co-housing creates an environment that encourages community,” this is not a strongly ideological group (McCarroll, 2002). None of these ideas seems to have managed to achieve the ultimate goal of a non-violent and peace-filled world.

It is not clear what programs or means are needed to move towards a violent free society. It is clear that a beginning is necessary and generating families without violent and abusive patterns is a blessed start for sure. The ripple effect of a violence free family and community will ultimately impact societies and eventually globalize. However, it is not enough to focus only on the individual and the family. Communities and societies and countries must be involved in stopping the violence and abuse and terrorism now punctuating our everyday lives.

According to the literature (Becker, 1992, 1993; Charles, Reynolds & Gatz, 2001), in order for an effective familial pattern change to take place, 4–5 generations of consistent behavior are needed for this change, to become embedded and solidified as a desired and beneficial pattern. That clitoredectomy still survives in 35 or so countries and reflect the difficulties of making the change (Azim, 2004; Kobrin as cited in Chesler, 2004). Within some violent and abusive families and cultures, where honor is more important than life sometimes the legal systems close their eyes to the violence of the actions and actually condone the revenge (Ruggi, 1998). To reach that goal not only must the family behavior patterns and beliefs be changed but the environment must be supportive of a change from violent to non-violent.

Worldwide health concerns such as the polio vaccination provide another and poignant example demonstrating the need for 4-5 generations to effect change. Since the start of vaccinations against polio, our planet as we knew it with polio became almost totally free of the disease. A few small countries stopped the vaccinations. This year, two generations down the line of no polio, the world suddenly found itself under the threat of the re-emergence of polio in potentially epidemic proportions. Massive efforts were put forth to stop the emergence of this disease in the next generation. This took cooperation, willingness, conscious investment, conceptualization and the belief that the world is better without polio.

Most importantly, to make a polio free world every country must agree to vaccinate. After 5 generations of vaccinations the original chain of polio will have been eradicated.

The same formula is needed to bring a halt to the violence as we know it and to the ritual abuse of terrorism in the 21st century. At the start of this chapter it was mentioned that the terrorism may be seen by some as legitimate and applauded,—and be abhorred by others. Whether terrorism is seen as legitimate or abhorred, it remains an act of violence and abusive of and to societies.

The exodus by the subjugated Jewish people from Egypt to the desert and to Canaan, 'the promised land', is said to have taken so long because their god wanted only those not born into slavery, 'the pure of heart' to enter the new land, the land of their freedom. The stories from the bible which describe the history of these Jews in the Promised Land is not one of freedom. The story of this nation is fraught with the wars over power and control, over freedom and choices and hatred, terrorism and pain, struggle and hardship.

What is clear is that the struggle was violent. And the violence begot more and more violence. And still there is violence 'in the name of' and terrorism's ritual abuse 'in the name of.'

On the other hand, while world powers rise and fall, and it is clear that change requires hard work, there are people who care, who raise their voices, who are willing to work towards the safety and freedom of mankind. We also see that there are more and more of these people seeking the voices to combat the pain of the world. Today appears as the awakening of the first of the 5 generations in the chain of change. People supporting McFarland and deMause have already begun their preparation work and the 3rd and 4th generations are ready and willing to make sure that the 5th generation is prepared for the future of mankind. A future that is without violence, terrorism and ritual abuse.

CHAPTER 10

The RAINS Network in the UK (Ritual Abuse Information Network and Support)

Sandra Buck

RAINS is a loose network of people who mostly live in the UK and work with survivors of ritual abuse, both children and adults. In this chapter I describe how it was set up and the kind of support the network offers. I offer a flavor of what I have observed in the UK over the last fifteen years.

A committee of volunteers manages the network. Support is provided through the Helpline and coordinated by Dr. Joan Coleman, a retired psychiatrist. Not all callers who are working with survivors join RAINS (Coleman, 1994). For those who do, there are regular meetings, and informal contacts between members. Information is exchanged at meetings and circulated to members. This can be about publications, news articles, TV programs, courses or conferences. Meetings are in different parts of the country, but probably reflect where most members are, in the South of England. Confidentiality is essential. Whilst we share some information about clients, we do not identify them. Members also link in with other organizations, such as UKSSD[1] (United Kingdom Society for the Study of Dissociation), TAG[2] (Trauma and Abuse Group), SAFE[3] (a helpline supporting survivors of ritual abuse) and LASA[4] (League Against Sadistic Abuse).

We continue to use the term ‘ritual abuse,’ whilst recognizing that sadistic torture and mind control is the reality. In the UK, the majority group we have identified can be described as Satanists (Sinason, 1994).

How it Started

RAINS began in September 1989. Two social workers, a psychiatrist, a psychiatric nurse and a lecturer in social work met to discuss how to respond to the needs of people like themselves, who were coming across ‘ritual abuse’ for the first time. The social workers were Judith Dawson (Child Abuse Consultant for Nottingham Social Services) and Chris Johnston (Leader of Team 4, a specialist team set up in 1987 to work with the children and families in a complex multi-generational child abuse case in Broxtowe, Nottingham). Dr Joan Coleman was the psychiatrist and Eileen Reeves the psychiatric nurse. In 1989, Joan and Eileen worked in Surrey, and had supported two adult survivors since 1987. The lecturer, Jeff Hopkins, had a special interest in staff welfare. He has written about the strains on social workers who discover abuse on a scale that challenges people's assumptions (Hopkins, 1989). At the beginning, staff who needed the support of the RAINS network made contact through his department.

This visionary group of people recognized that their isolation had increased their personal distress, and decided to reach out to others. Apart from Nottingham, there were workers in Congleton, Rochdale and Essex, all dealing with children who were trying to communicate terrifying experiences. They did this as children do, through their behaviors, drawings and play. Eventually some of the children talked about what had happened to them. Staff and foster parents wanted to talk to others who knew about the subject, but they were afraid that any outside contact would discredit their evidence. So many remained isolated until after court cases. This need for contact always came after they concluded that the nature of the children's experiences was ritual abuse. Social workers in other areas were instructed not to make contact with the Nottingham team. There were fears in reaching out; fears about 'contamination,' or rather fears of being accused of having been contaminated by information.

Sinason (1994, p. 7) tries hard to make sense of this hypothesis of contamination. Scott (2001, chap. 2) extends this further by discussing the "… discourse of disbelief which developed in response to allegations of ritual abuse in Britain, the Netherlands, North America and Australia in the mid–1980s." (p. 34). I struggle with it too. As a medical student I was taught symptoms and signs of common and less-common illnesses and how to investigate them to make a diagnosis. If the last illness I learnt about was meningitis, I might fear that someone with a fever had meningitis, but in the absence of a rash and neck stiffness, and with a painful ear and an inflamed eardrum, I would diagnose otitis media. Being intellectually fascinated or anxious not to miss a more rare condition would not cause an epidemic of meningitis. When HIV infection was first identified as a new illness, doctors shared information with one another through journals and conferences. That is the scientific method and how knowledge develops, using established problem-solving techniques.

The Nottingham social workers talked to other professionals about the signs and symptoms these children presented, to understand what the children were communicating. They were accused of contaminating the children's accounts and influencing the Broxtowe children to disclose certain events after the social workers had learnt about them. This was not true. Judith Dawson is very clear when she states, “It is being said that we were influenced by our consultations with occult groups, but the children’s disclosures came first. We felt we had to take on this research to make sense of what they told us” (Campbell, 1990, p.13). It is said that children disclosed certain details to foster parents after social workers read a list of ‘satanic indicators.’ Again, Judith Dawson states, “…we were not given the ‘indicators’ until we’d already heard the children’s stories.” (Campbell, 1990, p. 13).

Some Historical Detail

This is needed to explain more clearly how the RAINS network began. Dr Joan Coleman and Eileen Reeves came across ritual abuse in1987, when a long-standing psychiatric patient who repeatedly self-harmed began describing ritual crimes which were based in a Satanist cult. She was dying of leukemia, and wanted to tell them as much as she could (Coleman, 1994). In 1989, a young teenage girl who was a survivor of a ritual abuse was also referred to Dr Coleman. That was when she and Eileen Reeves began making contact with other professionals, driven by their own isolation. “We have since heard similar accounts many times and as a friend once warned me, ‘You can get used to anything.’ But we shall never forget the horror, fear and isolation of that winter” (Coleman, 1994, p. 242).

Broxtowe, Nottingham

Joan and Eileen met Judith and Chris at a conference in April 1989 (Coleman, 1994) and later in the year at what is now known as ‘The 1989 Reading Conference.’[5] Judith and Chris presented a workshop describing the accounts of the Nottingham children, and how these had evolved. It began in 1986 when siblings were removed from their parents because of neglect. Very soon, children who had been removed for neglect disclosed sexual abuse. In one family, the elder child began to describe repeated sexual assaults, and the youngest exhibited obsessive sexualized play. Later the eldest said that other adults as well as his parents had physically hurt him and done sexual things to him. Later in the year, he described being witness to his cousins being hurt and sexually abused at what he called ‘witch parties.’ Each group of siblings was placed with different foster parents, and the children had almost no contact with one another. Gradually these children independently began to describe similar scenes, such as drinking blood, and drawing upside-down crosses (Tate, 1994).

In July 1988, Wardship[6] proceedings were taken to protect the children. In the Nottingham Crown Court, Mrs. Justice Booth (the judge) stated, after hearing the evidence presented to her, that the children had been the victims of ritual abuse in satanic ceremonies (Tate, 1994). She directed that the children should not be formally interviewed, but the foster parents should continue to record the accounts the children gave. All these ‘disclosures’ were recorded in diaries by the foster parents and all significant drawings were kept. Mrs. Justice Booth also directed that her judgment and the documents concerned in the case would be made available to the Chief Constable of Nottinghamshire and the Crown Prosecution Service. The defendants appealed against this decision, but this failed in the Court of Appeal (Tan, 1988).

In February 1988, eight adult family members and one family friend were arrested. All defendants pleaded guilty in the Nottingham Crown Court in February 1989, except the grandfather. The Police presented evidence of physical and sexual assaults. Several children gave evidence by video link, the first time this had been used in a Nottingham court. Out of respect for the children’s terror regarding people dressed in robes, the judge and barristers removed their wigs and robes. Eight family members and one family friend were found guilty. They were sentenced to a total of 43 years, sentences ranging from 2 to 10 years. Mrs Thatcher, Prime Minister at the time, spoke from dispatch box in the House of Commons and praised the Nottingham team and Nottinghamshire Social ServicesDepartment (Campbell, 1990). The Nottingham team was soon to fall from grace.

There was conflict between the Police and the special Social Work team around reference to posh houses and ritualistic activities. The Police did not find evidence of children being taken to large houses credible, despite children’s evidence being corroborated by information from three adults in the extended family. (These adults helped secure the conviction against the adult members of the family, as they testified in court about being witnesses to the children being sexually abused.) The Police investigated these leads 9 months later after pressure from social services management. The investigation was not conducted jointly with social services and social services were not informed on what basis it had occurred. Social services were informed that the Police found no evidence of ritual or satanic abuse.

Relationships deteriorated and in the summer of 1989 the recently appointed Director of Social Services banned Team 4 from talking publicly about the case, and set up a joint ‘enquiry’ team (JET). This team (with joint representation from social services and the police) was to investigate the circumstances of the Broxtowe case, look at evidence of whether satanism had been involved, and settle the row between the agencies.

The Joint Enquiry Team

Many authors have criticized the choice of the people who were appointed to the Joint Enquiry Team and the experts they used (Scott & Snelling, 1994; Tate, 1991, chap. 7). The main criticism was a distinct lack of experience in working with severely abused children. One professor of child development used as an expert had no professional experience of work with abused children, apart from his research exploring how often parents in Nottingham smacked their children (Newson, 1970). The JET report was never published but was leaked to Central Television. The press release, "A top level independent inquiry into Britain's biggest child sex abuse case has labeled the methods used to question children as tantamount to brainwashing and worse than Cleveland" [7] (Central Television Press Release, 1990, March 27).

Mary Midgely, formerly senior philosophy lecturer at Newcastle University, was asked by the Joint Enquiry Team to look at their methods. Her conclusions were more thoughtful.

> I found that all the people who believed were closest to the facts. All the people who did not believe did not seem interested in the facts. If they wanted to believe the whole thing was invented then they needed to talk to the people closest to it. But the inquiry team did not talk to the children, the foster parents or the social workers. I find this behavior most eccentric. Everyone who disbelieved the children seems to have assumed that what they were saying could not possibly be true and devoted their attention to proving how people could have made it up. They missed a stage. (O'Sullivan, 1990) The JET Report stated that the social workers and foster parents had contaminated the children's evidence and caused the allegations of satanic rituals. They came to this conclusion by examining key words that the children had been recorded as saying, and key events in the development of the case. It is an attractive hypothesis. Evidence for and against it is not explored in the revised version of the report written in 1990 which appeared online in 1997 (Anning, Hebditch & Jervis). The case is not proven, but most journalists prefer to blindly accept the JET report, which is public. The Nottingham case is dismissed in the majority of references to ritual abuse in our media.

Judith Dawson and Chris Johnston were eventually allowed to read this report, but only after it had been leaked, and when Team 4 took out a formal grievance against Nottinghamshire Director of Social Services, David White. They produced their own report and replied in detail to the criticisms of their team. This has not been published.

The Director eventually made the following statement, modifying his previous stance that ritual abuse was not a feature in the Broxtowe case, to a Nottinghamshire County Council meeting in 1990:

> Although I originally accepted the Joint Enquiry Team's view that ritual abuse was not a feature of the Broxtowe case or its aftermath—and indeed this is the view of the Chief Constable and others given the lack of substantiated corroborated evidence—I do feel that on the basis of the strength of the children's testimony it would be unwise not to accept the possibility that there were ritualistic elements to this case.
> …My opinion, given all the written material I have reviewed and the comments of the judiciary, is that the disclosures made by the children are unlikely to have been created in their minds by the social workers or foster parents. (Tate, 1991, p. 317)

Nick Anning, David Hebditch and Margaret Jervis[8] published the revised edition of the JET report online in 1997. There is no comparison of this online version and the original full report. The authors of the original report revealed that they were not nearly as open minded as suggested in the revised version (Tate, 1991, chap. 7). Nottingham County Council went to court several times in an attempt to force the removal of the report from web sites. They were successful, but more sites appeared. In 1997 there were allegedly 35 mirror sites of the summarized report.

Houses

The Joint Enquiry Team was very dismissive of the evidence of the houses that the Broxtowe children had independently identified as places where 'witch parties' were held. One house was not mentioned in the JET report or on any of the TV documentaries. Two adult survivors independently visited Nottingham sites where they had been abused. They both live away from Nottingham and do not know each other. They visited with different therapists, in different years. The therapists eventually discovered it was the same house, and the same one that the children had pointed out. This discovery was made after the house was identified (personal communication from RAINS members).

Tunnels

The Joint Enquiry Team was equally dismissive of accounts given by the children of being taken from one place to another by tunnels. One tunnel was reported to end in St Mary's church in Nottingham. In 2002, a tunnel was found under a modern museum in Nottingham, The Galleries of Justice.

> (It) came to light when archaeologists were excavating 14th century man-made caves under a museum and accidentally broke through a rotten wooden floor into an even older excavation beneath. …Experts from the University of Nottingham are about to start clearing the rubble and will also try to find the entrance at St. Mary's. ("Robin Hood," 2002)

Part of the mythology about Robin Hood refers to him being trapped in St. Mary's church and using the cave system to escape. At the time the JET report was written, much was made of the fact that tunnels had not been found under the McMartin Daycare Center in California. When an independent archaeologist excavated the Daycare Center in 1990, tunnels were found and details corroborated the children's descriptions (Summit, 1994). The accounts of the Broxtowe children may also be corroborated further.

My Link into RAINS

This happened from my links through child protection work with Judith Dawson. As social work investigations unfolded, Team 4 had to try and make sense of children telling their foster parents what seemed to be unbelievable events. After 12 months or so, they came to understand they were dealing with children who had been tortured and abused in a most frightening way (Campbell, 1990; Dawson & Johnston, 1989).

I worked as a psychosexual counselor in the 1980s. From my work with adult survivors of sexual abuse, I formed links with several probation officers and social workers in the area. We shared our learning as we came to terms with the sexual abuse of children. I was asked to do some short-term work supporting the team of probation officers who had been assigned to the adults charged with 150 offences against the Broxtowe children. The probation officers were traumatized from reading the affidavits regarding the children. They were unsure if they should work with these adults in the same way that they did with other sex offenders.

Chris Johnston met with the probation team and myself to describe how Team 4 came to understand that the children had been sexually abused in their families, but also tortured and sexually abused in an organized way in ritualistic activities.

The probation team had many questions and Chris and Judith felt it important that the probation team understood how their perception of what the children's accounts meant had developed. They had methodically sifted through all possible explanations, and consulted with several leading professionals in the child abuse field, including two Child Psychiatrists and a Forensic Psychologist.

I respected the thoughtful way these two women and their team had approached such a difficult task. I first met Chris Johnston in a multidisciplinary training event in the early eighties, and recall her honesty in demonstrating a situation where a child needed protection from sexual abuse and all the agencies made mistakes. This was before professionals were issued with guidelines and procedures regarding sexual abuse of children.

I needed to explore things further for myself and gain a deeper understanding of what had been described to us. Instead of sifting through the affidavits that the probation officers had read, I spent an afternoon reading through the diaries and looking at drawings relating to two of the children. As I reflect on it now, I can feel the chill that went through me. What I read felt absolutely authentic. I comment only on one of the diary pages that made such an impact on me. The foster mother had recorded an interaction when she didn't want to listen to the child, for whatever reason. The child said something; she told him not to be ridiculous; he said it again; she ignored him. This seemed to go on and on, until he insisted it happened, eventually shouting at her something like, "He did do it. He did do it." This does not fit in with the views presented by the Joint Enquiry Team (Anning et al, 1997) or Jean La Fontaine (1994, 1996). This child had to persist to be heard.

This is not a criticism of the foster mother. At the end of that day, I fully appreciated the context and was moved to tears by how she responded to the two children and documented the day-by-day fears these children struggled with. It was an account communicated with love and compassion. Most of the probation team considered the accounts given by the children were true at the core, albeit with some distortion because of pain, fear and/or the use of drugs. Some continued long-term work with those offenders serving longer prison sentences.

I was warned I might not feel very well after reading the diaries. I did not want to go back and read more. I could think of no other explanation; these children's experiences were beyond what I knew about. I had heard some horrific accounts unfold from adults in my counseling room over the previous nine years, so I was no stranger to what adults can do to children. I had also worked with adults with multiple personality states, now called Dissociative Identity Disorder. As time went on, I was to hear further accounts from adults who had survived similar tortures to what the children described.

I have no attachment to any religion, and would probably be most comfortable being described as a humanist. I fully respect others whose beliefs and experiences are different to mine. Within the RAINS network there are many like myself, and many who do have a religious faith. Some of these do not believe in satan as an entity, and some do. Most do not believe in demonic possession, but some do. Survivors will find counselors with whom they feel most comfortable. Those who feel terrified of any organized religion will find counselors who have no significant attachment to a religion, or who keep it entirely separate from their counseling out of respect for the other individuals needing to find their own path.

The RAINS Network

By word of mouth, the RAINS network reached 150 members in its first two years and as of 2003 has supported more than 500 professionals and carers. These include clinical psychologists, counselors, psychotherapists, psychiatric nurses, social workers, rape crisis and other helpline counselors, doctors (including GPs), police, probation and prison officers, clerics, psychiatrists, nurses, foster parents, carers and staff from the NSPCC (National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children). Members come from all over the UK, as well as Eire, Belgium, Sweden and Germany. Individual members link up with professionals around the world. In 2003 we still had nearly 200 active members.

From 1989 to 1995 there were similar numbers of members working with or caring for children as working with adult survivors. These were mainly social workers, clinical psychologists and foster parents. Since 1995, the number of social workers and clinical psychologists has decreased dramatically, and now most members are therapists or counselors working with adults. Church ministers and psychiatrists[9] are small groups, each making up only 3% of the total membership RAINS began with bi-monthly meetings. By 1991 we reduced it to three meetings a year, and we planned for members to meet in local groups for support. This has happened in some areas, but is not widespread. Dissociation is a key therapeutic issue for therapists and carers. Several clinical psychologists are members and have supported us with their considerable experience in working with dissociation and survivors of sexual abuse. Sara Scott writes of her reactions to learning about dissociation as she contemplated the significance of this for her foster daughter.

> A fortnight before this journey, I had been to my first RAINS (Ritual Abuse Information Network and Support) meeting, and I heard a psychologist talk about a client with MPD… What I found was a framework for making sense of Sinead's practice of going in and out of trance (frequently facilitated by staring at light-bulbs) and the extremely contradictory impulse and emotions she > displayed. (Scott, 2001, p. 170) We have been fortunate to engage some overseas visitors to share their experiences with us. In the summer of 1992, fifty-six of us packed into a hot schoolroom near Euston Station in London to hear Pamela Hudson. Pamela is a licensed Clinical Social Worker and Therapist who worked with 24 children subjected to ritual torture at a Day Care Center in Mendicino, California (Hudson, 1994). It was in the earlier part of this meeting that Valerie Sinason introduced Anders Svensson. He is a clinical psychologist from Sweden who works with the learning disabled. He told us how he facilitated a severely learning disabled woman to describe how she had been raped. When she went on to describe marks on her wrists and ankles from being tied up, he sought consultation with Valerie as he had read about her work with learning disabled patients who had been sexually abused. They communicated by Anders translating his recordings of his patient, and faxing them to Valerie at the Tavistock Clinic. His patient lived in a community home. She was taken out of the home at night to a strange house, and tied to a chair. She described being naked in the moonlight, but also talked about different colored cloaks and robes.

Eventually she described a group of people she had witnessed who showed disgusting films and made her eat dog shit. She witnessed children being sexually abused and talked about the devil. It dawned on Valerie and Anders at the same time that this was ritual abuse. Many people experience a disabling terror hearing accounts like this for the first time. Valerie and Anders vividly describe this in their chapter in Treating Survivors of Satanist Abuse (Sinason & Svensson, 1994). This was the first case to be written about in Sweden, but not the last. When Anders presented this chapter at a conference in Sweden, it was clear from the people who approached him that there were others. When Valerie spoke out in her workplace, she was put in touch with other professionals who were also working with survivors. She met even more when she came to her first RAINS meeting.

Professor Karel Pyck, a Child Psychiatrist from Belgium, visited us in 1994. He began studying the backlash (against those working to support children and adults who have experienced serious child abuse) after being stopped from professional work as a Child Psychiatrist following his stand in court about a child (Pyck, 1994).

Forty-three RAINS members will never forget our meeting with Jean La Fontaine in February 1992. The Department of Health announced it had engaged someone to investigate whether ritual abuse existed or not. We were not very enthusiastic about it being an objective investigation. Joan Coleman met with Jean La Fontaine in September 1991 and felt positive about her. After consultation with members, she was invited to attend one of our regular meetings. Members were told in advance so that they could decline to attend if they wished. Joan was right; Jean was most charming. She announced she would make no notes at the meeting, out of respect for confidentiality. Members were reminded by Joan, who chaired the meeting, not to give names or identify features about any of their clients, as is the usual policy. After the experiences of disbelief in response to what happened to children in Nottingham, Essex, Congleton, Rochdale, Manchester, Ayreshire and the Orkneys, we wanted to listen to someone who said she was prepared to take our second-hand accounts of survivors' experiences seriously. Some of us were trying to be open-minded about her whilst retaining some cynicism. Some felt positive about her whereas others retained their cynical stance.

There were foster parents and some new members at the meeting. The new members described feeling very traumatized by the accounts they had recently heard. It was a profound experience to witness all these people sharing their frightening discoveries. Joan has written in her brief minutes of the meeting that Jean La Fontaine had indicated it had been valuable to her, and the description of the cases had shown her the core of the subject.

Before publication of La Fontaine's report, there was an all-party press conference on May 25, 1994, at the House of Commons. (The findings of the report had already been leaked to the press.) This press conference was called to challenge La Fontaine's findings and was attended and supported by Llin Golding (Labour Member of Parliament), David Alton (Liberal Member of Parliament) and Geoffrey Dickens (Conservative Member of Parliament). Presentations were given by Joan Coleman (RAINS), Valerie Sinason (then at The Tavistock and Portman Clinic), Hereward Harrison (ChildLine),[10] Sue Hutchinson (SAFE) and others. There was very little publicity after this press conference. Jean La Fontaine's summarized report was published a week later. This received the full attention of the press. The press conference challenging its finding was sidelined.

In her report, Jean La Fontaine stated that there was evidence of ritual in only 3 out of the 84 cases she looked at. In those 3, she claimed the purpose of the ritual was to frighten the children in order to abuse them and keep them silent. She maintained that no belief system was involved.

Several authors (Kelly, 1994; Scott, 2001;Tranter, 1994) have criticized the report. In fact, assessing the evidence of the 17 cases in Nottingham, she did not speak to the children's foster parents; she did not examine any of the children's drawings or foster parents' diaries; she concluded that the 'stories' evolved from contamination from the social workers and religious extremism. I know most of the social workers, and they cannot be described as religious zealots. They are professional, intelligent and thoughtful women. I have the utmost respect for them.

Information from one of our meetings was leaked to the press. An article appeared in The Oldie by Rosie Waterhouse (1992) two weeks after our meeting with Jean La Fontaine. Rosie Waterhouse had included accurate information, some of which was mentioned only at the end of the meeting and some mentioned to Jean La Fontaine during the coffee break. Some information was incorrect. We are still puzzled about the journalist's source for this information, and why there was no reference to Jean La Fontaine being at the meeting.

Our first conference was in 1996, Better The Devil You Know. We invited speakers from the US and Netherlands. Main presentations were from Joan Coleman, Hereward Harrison (ChildLine), Joan Golston (US), Catherine Gould (US), Norma Howes, Marjorie Orr (Accuracy About Abuse), Sara Scott, Valerie Sinason, Caryn Stardancer (US), Tim Tate and Sheila Youngson. Members of RAINS presented Netherlands described his experience as a GP in a small town called Oude Pekela, and the backlash following the case. Main presenters also ran workshops, and Caryn Stardancer[11] was greatly appreciated for her thoughtful presentation and practical workshops for survivors.

For the conference in 2001, The Dark Side of the Rainbow, we collaborated with The Clinic for Dissociative Studies. We appointed two conference organizers who worked as an excellent team, and were familiar with ritual abuse from their other work. Main presentations were by Jean Goodwin (US), Chris Healey (Police Aspects in UK), Norma Howes, Kobus Jonker (South Africa), Sarah Nelson, Jean Rafferty, Sue Richardson, Sara Scott, Valerie Sinason and Howard Steele. Workshop presenters included Thorsten Becker from Germany. Fifteen additional workshops were available over the two days.

Both conferences were well received by those who attended, judging from the evaluations. We did not get it altogether right for survivors, but have learnt from our mistakes. Feedback from all who attended was helpful, with many appreciative comments.

The membership has changed over the years and probably reflects organizational responses to what happened in Nottingham, Rochdale, the Orkneys and The Department of Health report by Jean La Fontaine. Social workers were the largest group to be represented in the early years, but only four have joined in the last four years. Judith Dawson left RAINS in 1993. The largest groups of people joining now are counselors, psychotherapists and Helpline counselors. Individual members write letters to TV producers and newspapers, etc. Joan Coleman has been very active in this regard. As co-coordinator, most contacts come through her now, and she has taken most of the workload for the network to continue.

Religious faith does not feature in our meetings. We are united in our experience of the accounts we have heard, our horror at what human beings can do to each other and our children. We read in our newspapers that boy soldiers are trained to kill in other countries. We acknowledge that children in the Western world are also being trained to kill, but in a secret underworld, where the victims will not be missed.

The Media

For the main part, the media still do not believe ritual abuse exists. Successful prosecutions involving Satanism or ritualized abuse are seldom reported (Tate, 1994). News articles written closer to a case becoming public seem to be more balanced than those that appear later. Individual workers have been trashed in the tabloids and some have lost their jobs.

Some journalists are concerned about ritual abuse and have written intelligent and sensitive articles. They include Andrew Boyd, Beatrix Campbell, Nick Davies, Sarah Nelson, Jean Rafferty and Tim Tate. Some have struggled publishing their written work. Stolen Voices, written by Judith Jones and Beatrix Campbell, was published by The Women's Press in 1999 and withdrawn immediately for legal reasons. It was about the backlash in the UK. Tim Tate's book was withdrawn after he was successfully sued over alleged libel implication. He and his publishers apologized and paid damages. "We made it clear we had never intended the detrimental implications found in the text and my book" (Tate, 1994, p. 190).

The British False Memory Society,[12] founded in 1993 by Roger Scotford, attacks the concept of recovered memory and promotes the concept of 'false memory syndrome.' This is still very popular in the media, notwithstanding the report on Recovered Memories by the British Psychological Society working group, chaired by Professor John Morton and published in 1995.

> The working party was charged with reporting on the scientific evidence relevant to the current debate concerning recovered memories of trauma and with commenting on the issues surrounding this topic. We have reviewed the scientific literature, carried out a survey of relevant members of The British Psychological Society, and scrutinized the records of the British False Memory Society. On this basis we came to the following conclusions: Complete or partial memory loss is a frequently reported consequence of experiencing certain kinds of psychological traumas including childhood sexual abuse. These memories are sometimes fully or partially recovered after a gap of many years.

The Royal College of Psychiatry also responded to the debate about 'recovered memory,' but the outcome of their investigations was very different. The College set up a small working group in 1994. The working group reviewed "…their own experience, visited meetings and centres with expertise in this field, interviewed 'retractors' and accused parents, and then began a comprehensive review of the literature." (Brandon, Boakes, Glaser & Green, 1998, abstract). The paper caused conflict within the College. One member of the group, Dr Peter Whewell, dissented and wrote an independent report. Four members of the group eventually published their work (Brandon, Boakes, Glaser & Green, 1998).

> RESULTS: There is a vast literature but little acceptable research. Opinions are expressed with great conviction but often unsupported by evidence. No evidence exists for the repression and recovery of verified severely traumatic events, and their role in symptom formation has yet to be proved…
> CONCLUSIONS: The issue of false or recovered memories should not be allowed to confuse the recognition and treatment of sexually abused children. We concluded that when memories are 'recovered' after long periods of amnesia, particularly when extraordinary means were used to secure the recovery of memory, there is a high probability that the memories are false, i.e., of incidents that had not occurred. (Brandon et al, 1998, abstract) The paper is negative about the existence of ritual abuse and dissociative identity disorder. When the Royal College failed to agree on the full report, it was agreed that guidelines taken from it would be published instead. The guidelines have become College policy and were published in Psychiatric Bulletin in 1997. (It is also available on the British False Memory Syndrome web site, http://www.bfms.org.uk).

Other backlash groups include AAFAA (Action Against False Allegations of Abuse and Justice in Psychotherapy (BFMS, 2000), both formed in 1999. AAFAA is a campaigning organization. As part of this brief, it has mailed individuals who associate themselves publicly with child protection issues, for instance by speaking at conferences. One tactic of the campaign was to send letters to such people threatening; "YOU COULD BE NEXT to be falsely accused of sexual abuse." (AAFAA, 2003) British links with the American False Memory Society were evident at a scientific meeting held at The Royal Society of Medicine on 8/12/1998 and titled, False Memories of Childhood Sexual Abuse. Is Hypnotherapy Unsafe? The meeting was hosted by Professor Sydney Brandon[13] (now deceased) of The Royal College of Psychiatry. Professor Brandon stated that it is the middle aged and middle classes who are presenting with recovered memories. He presented no scientific evidence in support of any of his hypotheses. He showed slides of book covers. He stated that watching MPD (Multiple Personality Disorder) therapists was watching a coaching session. “These fads and fashions have come from United States.” I was dismayed that The Royal Society had been used for such an unscientific debate.

Professor Paul McHugh[14] was the guest speaker from the United States. He underlined what Professor Brandon had said, and said he viewed Multiple Personality Disorder in the same light as alien abduction. He stated that Multiple Personality Disorder is always artificial, and the product of medical attention.

Closing Thoughts

Confronting the atrocities that are reported by children, adolescents and adults changes your life. People find that colleagues at work do not want to know (Hopkins, 1989). They become secondarily traumatized from the accounts they hear, and then by the reactions of colleagues and ‘superiors’ (Dawson & Johnston, 1989). Personal relationships are strained (Youngson, 1994). We obviously need to find more creative ways for the intellectual considerations to be presented in a way people can understand. Putting your head on the block is not attractive when you already feel severely traumatized from the work. Support systems to help workers were in place in Nottingham, but the management silenced the staff. The full story about what happened in Nottingham has still not been heard.

[1] UKSSD, the United Kingdom Society for the Study of Dissociation is a component study group of the International Society for the Study of Dissociation. Their web site is http://www.ukssd.co.uk.

[2] TAG is a study and support group for those working in the areas of trauma, abuse and dissociative disorders. It provides information, support, training, encouragement and networking for professionals, carers, pastoral workers and any who may have an interest in working with individuals who have suffered severe traumatic experiences and abuse in childhood. Their web site is http://www.tag-uk.net.

[3] SAFE is a helpline formed in 1989 by a ritual abuse survivor, Sue Hutchinson. A team of volunteers now organizes it and answers the phone.

[4] LASA, League Against Sadistic Abuse, was formed in 1994 by the mother of a young woman ritually abused by her father (Wheaton, 2003). The group supports non-abusing parents who are often in conflict with the courts and social services about what happened to their children.

[5] This was ‘Not One More Child,’ a conference organized by Norma Howes, an independent social worker. Its reputation is based on the hypothesis that those attending it became contaminated by knowledge of ritual abuse, which had been transported from the United States.

[6] Wardship: The High Court has powers to make certain orders regarding children who have been removed from their homes, are in serious danger or are at risk. The High Court can make the child a Ward of Court. This means that the High Court has responsibility for that child and no orders can be made or action taken which affects the child, unless permission is obtained from the High Court first. The Children’s Act (1989) now allows courts, including the High Court, to make orders relating to children, so Wardship proceedings are now infrequently used. (Modified from http://www.compactlaw.co.uk)

[7] Cleveland is a county in the North East of England. In 1987 conflict between agencies in child protection reached a crisis. Increasing numbers of children were removed from their parents after two pediatricians made medical diagnoses of sexual abuse. On July 9, 1987, the Secretary of State for Social Services set up a Statutory Inquiry to investigate how the agencies had dealt with suspected cases of child sexual abuse (Butler-Sloss, 1988). The remit of the Inquiry was not to establish whether the children had been sexually abused (p. 183). The historical background and the context in which the crisis arose are explored by five of the people involved in these events in Child Sexual Abuse: Whose Problem? Reflections from Cleveland (Richardson & Bacon, 1991).

[8] Nick Anning (now deceased) and David Hebditch are investigative journalists. Margaret Jervis is also a journalist and legal adviser to the British False Memory Foundation. Orr (1996) has criticized Jervis’s support of a pro-pedophile book (Li, West & Woodhouse, 1993).

[9] Not many adult psychiatrists in the UK train in psychotherapy, and Dr Coleman (1994) describes her surprise in the 1980s upon discovering that the effect of sexual abuse as children was the core of many of her patients' psychiatric problems.

[10] ChildLine is the UK's free, 24-hour helpline for children in distress or danger. Trained volunteer counselors comfort, advise and protect children and young people who may feel they have nowhere else to turn. ChildLine operates out of ten counselling centres around the UK: Belfast, Glasgow, Leeds, London, Nottingham, Manchester, Swansea, Rhyl, Birmingham and Newton Abbot.

[11] Caryn Stardancer is the survivor who launched Survivorship, a journal and web site for survivors of ritualistic abuse, mind control and torture, and their allies. (http://www.survivorship.org).

[12] The British False Memory Society has a Scientific Board and is similar to the False Memory Society in the United States. The report of their 1998 AGM mentioned they were seeking new funds because a grant from the Department of Health had ended.

[13] Professor Brandon blamed the 'survivor group' movement for the development of recovered memories, and cited Judith Herman and Bass & Davis. He linked recovered memories in the same bracket as alien abduction and multiple personality disorder. He stated that the Royal College report into recovered memory decided there was not massive repression, techniques used by therapists were questionable and patients were asked to search for memories. He stated that abuse was suggested to them and they were encouraged to join survivor groups, even with no memory of abuse.

[14] Professor McHugh is a member of the Scientific Advisory Board of the American False Memory Society. He presented one of his own studies, that involved 24 patients who presented alter personalities. He stated there were strong reasons for doubting the reality of Multiple Personality Disorder. He found that it was not hard to persuade his patients to retract, and 75% did. He said they all had a significant psychiatric disorder in addition to presenting with alter personalities.

CHAPTER 11

Ritual Abuse: A Personal Account and the Unpublished Police Guidelines

Carole Mallard

In 1989 I was a uniform police sergeant in the Metropolitan Police working in a very cosmopolitan area of Northwest London, on a Child Protection Team covering the Borough of Brent. I had been 'head hunted' for the position due to my previous experience with child abuse issues during my then 20 years police service and because I was respected for my reliability and professionalism. It was probably the most rewarding yet most stressful time in my 30-year career. I retired in January 1999. I could have continued for probably a further 5 years, but I felt mentally and physically drained and decided to retrain in something completely different.

Our team was newly formed, working jointly with Social Services. This was a relatively new system brought about because of past mistakes made due to poor co-operation between the agencies. I had never heard of or encountered a case involving sadistic, ritual or satanic abuse, nor had my colleagues including my boss Rob Lawrence (not real name). He was a Detective Inspector with 20 years experience dealing with the most serious of crimes in the Criminal Investigation Department (C.I.D.). He had served a total of 24 years as a police officer.

An interesting thing happened in September 1989. Three colleagues were to attend a Child Protection Conference in Reading, Berkshire. A telephone call was received in our office from a police officer in Nottingham, in the form of a warning; not to take notice of a presentation about ritual abuse at that conference because it was just social workers getting carried away with their imaginations. We thought it rather odd for officers in another part of the country to go to the trouble of seeking out delegates who were attending and advise them in such a way. It later made some sense when I heard about the Broxtowe case (see Sandra Buck's contribution). My colleagues went to the conference open-minded and briefed us on their return about various presentations they attended, including the one on ritual abuse. There was some skepticism and astonishment by all of our team when they informed us of its content. Little did I know that a few months down the line; I would need to access this information.

About six months later I became involved in a case where a mother of 6 children reported that her eldest son had sexually abused a sister; this was relatively rare. A joint investigation commenced and I was the officer in charge of the case. The situation escalated, involving a younger son possibly sexually abusing another sister. This was a needy family requiring a lot of support. Unfortunately various social workers ended up being assigned to the case and I was the only constant worker with the family. Consequently the mother would frequently turn to me and Rob Lawrence rather than the social workers. This was to be pivotal to the case and would change my life forever! The mother Anita (not her real name) often rang me daily to share various things happening at home including several crises. Co-incidentally I happened to be in the right place at the right time to help them, so she then had complete trust in us.

Anita displayed some ‘odd’ behavior during this time that became clear to me later. She frequently went into a trance-like state and I thought she was ignoring something I was saying. I would give her a nudge and say, “Anita I’m talking to you!” She would then respond to me. A few years later I realized this was dissociation. When she sat opposite Rob, who had blue eyes, she would also go into a trance, so he would have to sit next to her to avoid eye contact. She kept having dreams involving blood and knives and said she feared she might harm her younger son. I kept removing sharp knives as a safety precaution and I ended up with about 6 in my office drawer. I took her out for lunch on a couple of occasions for a burger when things got too much for her. I noticed she would not actually eat the meat; she would eat the bun, pick around the burger eating the rest. I chastised her for not eating properly; she seemed to fill up on bread and biscuits. Anita seemed to be mesmerized by flies and would be completely distracted from the conversation. On one occasion I was trying to do a video interview with her youngest daughter and needed some help from Anita to settle the child in front of the camera. She wouldn’t even enter the room and said she hated cameras; she did not explain any further. Also when her eldest son got in trouble with the local police, Anita attended the station to collect her son. I got a call from the custody officer worried about her disturbed state when a uniformed officer got close to her. I explained to the officer that she had an abusive background and not to be too concerned. She subsequently explained that something happened to her involving a ‘policeman’ and she was frightened of uniforms and normally could not trust people wearing them.

After about 5 months of dealing with various incidents involving all the children, including the 2 boys going into care, Anita started doing some simple drawings because she said she could not read or write very well. They were extremely telling and they clearly showed something terrible had happened to her as a child. Gradually she started to talk about her past. At first she only implicated her uncle; then her maternal grandmother came into the picture, responsible for aborting two of Anita's pregnancies after being raped by the uncle. Subsequently Anita told me other men were also involved and her drawings clearly showed the circumstances; including being photographed. By this time the Social Services had become overwhelmed by her requests for support for the whole family. Anita felt the need to disclose the full truth of her background. Mr. Lawrence and I decided to carry out some taped interviews with her. We were concerned that serious crimes were involved. These crimes happened out of our jurisdiction.

We decided to start during a weekend when we were 'on call,' to avoid the interviews interfering with our heavy workload. Anita came to our office and we tried to make her feel comfortable because she was very nervous. We ensured she did not have eye contact with Rob to prevent her going into a trance on seeing his blue eyes. Rob wanted her to explain what her life was like from day-to-day, not just the abuse. He asked her to think back as far as possible and we were stunned when she said her earliest memories were of abuse from about three years of age, possibly before that. The fact was her life was so full of abuse, mental, physical and sexual; it was a very cruel environment and she knew nothing else.

An amazing thing happened for us; this mid thirties woman spoke in a childlike way. She even corrected us if a question was put that was too 'adult' because she would not have understood at that age. This was something we had no knowledge of and had never encountered before. Rob continued for about 45 minutes, the length of the tape. We had not progressed very far and it was a painstaking process. We thought we could get a full history of her life in probably 3 to 4 tapes, but we were very wrong; we got to 38 interview tapes! Anita's behavior started to make sense to us after hearing about her childhood. The trance-like state was either dissociation or a trigger into a memory. The fear of cameras was because she had been abused and tortured whilst being photographed. Her eating habits were affected because she had been made to eat human flesh, drink blood and ingest other unpleasant matter. The flies now showed importance because she was told as a small child, that flies could report back to her 'group' everything she did and said. So there was no escape from their power over her; she felt they watched her every move. The knives related to a vow that she had been forced to make, to kill her younger son when he reached the age of thirteen. A blue eye symbol was significant in her group, hence the dissociation when she had eye contact with Rob.

We did some interviews after normal working hours or again at weekends. Her disclosures were slow and very painful for her with lots of pauses; she needed a lot of reassurance to continue at times. Yet she always wanted to continue. She felt a weight lifted from her shoulders and found the process therapeutic. We were out of our depth on a number of occasions, not understanding the belief system and needed help. We referred to the papers brought back from the Reading Conference and found Maureen Davies (1991) listed. I made contact with her and she was of enormous help; we couldn't have managed without her. She has remained a friend ever since.

Anita's disclosures covered the most horrendous abuse we had ever heard, including torturous murders and sadistic sexual assaults on adults and children. Her mother, father, grandfather and uncle were involved too. She described travelling, probably whilst drugged, to various locations, including a boat journey across the sea where they met with other groups and similar ceremonies took place. Her group wore robes with hoods and the other groups wore different robes. Different ethnic groups were involved too and she described in detail a black boy being abused and killed. Anita never got above the age of 10 in her disclosures, which is significant because in the U.K. 10 is the age of criminal responsibility. She was very wary of incriminating herself, because we were the police and could arrest her. Anita did however describe killing animals and babies herself with a dagger, all whilst under the age of 10. These were committed due to her utter fear of what they would do to her if she didn't comply and through indoctrination during childhood. She went through genuine anguish and disgust when she spoke about the killings, but because we did not condemn her in any way, she found the interviews therapeutic and wanted to continue her life story. Unfortunately we were never to fully establish what she did beyond 10 because we were ordered to stop by senior officers.

Rob and I were suddenly under intense scrutiny for doing the interviews. We were also told that our colleagues had complained about us. The nature of the complaint was never properly identified to us. The subject matter of ritual abuse didn't help because some team members couldn't believe Anita's disclosures and thought our judgement was flawed. Our credibility was now in question. We were told that we had lost our objectivity, were too involved with the case, spending too much time on them. They said that her disclosures were not relevant to our responsibilities as Child Protection officers. By discontinuing the interviews Anita was left in the midst of disclosing, with no support, and we felt it would be wrong to stop at this point. Also we had feared that Anita may have been abusing her children or others in some way and there were issues of ensuring children were protected. Rob was asked to submit a report giving more detail of crimes involved and he also asked to be allowed to finish off the interviews and for senior officers to discuss the contents with us. He made some inquiries to see if any other cases of this type had been dealt with. To our surprise, he found information about several others including one that was still being investigated in East London. Rob identified the evidence obtained from Anita, but she was telling us things that happened over a 30-year period. The report was submitted, and after a month we heard nothing. So late one evening we went hunting for the report to see where it had gone, but we could find no trace of it whatsoever. It had not been registered in any logs and was not in any senior officers' trays. No further discussion ever took place over the report or the interviews; it was as if they had never existed! The senior officers were more interested in criticizing our management skills and we were both told we had to leave. It was done in such a way that you we could not accuse them of a 'cover up.' We did do one last interview with Anita, to explain that we had to stop and wanted to let her down gently. We desperately needed to establish whether she was a risk to children. She hinted that as an adult she had committed serious crimes but declared no current involvement. We doubted that after years of indoctrination she would no longer be involved. We could not pursue it any further because of our orders.

Rob was moved within weeks to an adjacent area and thankfully they gave me some time to find a position that I would like to do. I took some six months to find something. Rob suggested I find something that was less stressful with regular hours and to forget about the subject completely. I pointed out that it was too important a subject to ignore and was very worried about children being victims of such horrendous abuse. I felt strongly that I had to do something about it. We had previously approached the head of Obscene Publications at New Scotland Yard for some assistance and he had some knowledge of the subject. I made him aware of my interest and rang him from time to time to see if there might be an opening. Eventually by late 1991 some internal research covering Organized abuse and Ritualistic abuse was authorized by the Commissioner and I had a job!

I had to work from Scotland Yard with two other officers as part of the research project working within the department known as the Obscene Publications Unit. They were very experienced at dealing with child pornography and pedophiles amongst other things. Our main objective was to produce guidelines for officers who might deal with a Ritual case in the future. We also aimed to produce questionnaires so that information could be collated and entered on a database. We were supposed to comment as to whether Ritual or Satanic abuse was genuine, but because of a Department of Health report by Professor Jean La Fontaine (HMSO 1994) was being carried out at the same time, the Home Office requested that aspect must be for her to establish.

We supported Professor La Fontaine's research by ensuring her questionnaire packages went to all our Child Protection teams throughout the Metropolitan Police and ensured they were completed and passed on to her. We extracted information from them for our own research with the intention only to look at cases within our own area. I expected our team to speak to anyone who had direct knowledge of Ritual or Satanic abuse, especially those who might have been the first to hear disclosures from children. I had originally been promised the use of a computer to store our data and had hoped that after the research was completed that the database could be continued. When the other two colleagues joined me at Scotland Yard, they thought it was unnecessary to have a database and only wanted to interview police officers; excluding social workers, professionals and carers, all who could have important information. I asked Rob Lawrence to come and persuade my colleagues to support my arguments for keeping the computer and the need for interviewing everyone connected to a case. He did manage to convince them because fortunately he was still a respected detective.

We engaged a woman officer with computer skills because at that time we were novices with computers and it allowed us freedom to get on with meeting witnesses. The press heard about the research and were trying to find out my identity. The publicity also meant a number of people were ringing us with information. Some were survivors of ritual abuse; some were professionals, police officers and support groups. Once the research was under way, we found some cases had links elsewhere and occasionally a person interviewed would make us aware of another case in another part of the country. So we extended the research further afield. We looked at 17 cases in the Metropolitan area and 23 elsewhere making a total of 40.

I traveled virtually the length and breadth of England, Scotland and Wales. All the information from the questionnaires was put into the database. I made a point of meeting survivors when I could; I thought it was very important. Videotapes of the interviews were made with at least two survivors. I have to express my complete admiration and respect for all the survivors I have met; they have suffered so much in their lives. My colleagues did not feel it necessary and made it clear to me they thought I had been taken in by the subject and ostracized me most of the time. In the end I avoided getting into any discussions with them and just got on with my job. Once all the interviews were completed the material had to be collated and made into suitable guidelines. One of my colleagues was given that task; I was not included, I think because I was seen as being too biased in my views.

During the research the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC) consulted with our team and offered their assistance in any way, including help with compiling the report. In the early 1990’s there were a number of newspaper reports about the NSPCC expressing great concern over child abuse involving bizarre sex and satanic rituals (Jukes & Duce, 1990). They had publicly stated from their own research that they had encountered 6 cases of ritual abuse (Creighton, 1993). Yet interestingly, immediately following the publication of Professor La Fontaine's report, during a radio interview they took a less forthright stance. Christopher Brown, Director of the NSPCC, said on Radio 4, B.B.C.: "We have no evidence for so called Satanism. Whether it exists or not, I don't know. We have no evidence for it within the NSPCC, but we do have evidence of a small number of children who have been abused within a context of some kind of ritual" (1994, June 2).

What I did work on however following a passing remark by Professor La Fontaine, was a chart comparing elements of all the 40 cases. It took many hours of manual trawling of the information we had obtained. It was to be added to the end of the report and guidelines as an appendix. At the beginning of January 1993 I was told that due to various internal administrative changes my attachment to the Obscene Publications unit had ended and I would have to return to ordinary duty. By March I had a position as a uniform sergeant at Whetstone Northwest London, which had nothing to do with child protection at all. The day I left New Scotland Yard I was assured that I would be invited back to act as a 'consultant' on the report. I never heard another word from them. My two colleagues were left writing the report; I know it was completed because another trusted colleague saw it and was asked to assist in 'fine tuning' the content. Unfortunately due to work commitments he was unable to finish the task and I have no definitive conclusions or details from that document. The report there is under lock and key held somewhere by the Metropolitan Police and has never been published; why, you may well ask? I cannot answer that, I can only speculate. However Professor La Fontaine's report was published (1994) and she identified only 3 out of 84 cases she looked at as being ritual but not satanic; where self-proclaimed mystical/magical powers were used to entrap children for purposes of sexual abuse.

Although I had a copy of my chart when I left the research team, believing I would be consulted over the contents of the report and guidelines, I had to hand it back in 2001. A serving officer, who had started to take an interest in some more recent ritual abuse cases tried to obtain a copy of the research guidelines and inadvertently let slip he had seen a chart that I had. Senior officers felt it should not be in my possession. I am only therefore able to recall some facts from memory. I think the major statistic was 82% of the alleged perpetrators were women. In child protection terms, that is a phenomenal proportion and would make massive headlines if published. Cruelty and torture was involved in 70% of the cases; 70% involved substance abuse (drugs, alcohol, solvents); 60% involved the use of knives or daggers; 60% involved allegations of human sacrifice; just under 60% involved animal sacrifices and over 50% involved taking photographs or videos. As far as some medical or behavioral disorders were concerned there were very high percentages of sleeping problems, phobic anxiety and dissociation.

A number of people have asked about the report or to see it. Interestingly they have been given different explanations as to its location or whether it was ever completed. You might think that having spent so much of my time obtaining the data, I would have been shown the document if only out of courtesy. This research took up the time of 3 officers, a computer operator and a senior officer supervising the team. We had travel, overtime, expenses and other sundry costs for a period of about 18 months; it must have been a very expensive paper exercise.

I also met many dedicated professionals during my travels, some were members of Ritual Abuse Information Network and Support (RAINS) co-ordinated by Dr. Joan Coleman, now a retired psychiatrist, who asked me to join, which I later did. It would have been inappropriate to join before I had completed my research. During my last 6 years of police service I tried to network with other police colleagues who were dealing with current or past ritual cases. I also felt cautious with officers I spoke to, as I was aware of allegations of involvement in 'cults' by police officers, including cover-ups. I have been available to give advice from a police perspective to other professionals too.

Following the conclusion of the research, I truly believed that it would probably only take a couple of years for something to break and make the public and media believe ritual abuse. One big case with a conviction would do it! We have had a number of cases that have gone before a court, but some newspapers manage to discredit the subject whenever they can. They seem to have their own agenda and frequently repeat the same old platitudes. Where there has been a conviction involving detail of ritualistic activity, the case is described as a pedophile ring. If there is no conviction and there are clear descriptions of ritualistic activity, it gets discredited as 'yet another myth or fantasy believed by the gullible,' or it might be labeled as recovered memory where the psychiatrists/therapists get the blame for putting ideas into the victim's head. Also some professionals get very personal attacks in the press to detract from the subject matter; complete character assassinations.

So here we are 10 years down the line and no further forward, yet the media accept ritual abuse if it relates to another country or if the victim is black, like the 'Torso in the Thames case,' still being investigated by the Metropolitan Police. In August 2001, a black boy aged about 5 years was found floating in the River Thames; his headless torso has not been identified but genetic information has led Police to believe he came from West Africa. It has been described as a Voodoo sacrifice, a muti sacrifice, a witchcraft sacrifice, a sacrificial killing and ritual killing in the U.K. press. Police are still investigating suspects (Bowcott, 2003). This story has not been discredited because it is seen as a ‘foreign crime’ relating to West Africa.

I am still waiting for that major case to break.

CHAPTER 12

The Orkney “Satanic Abuse” Case: Who Cared About the Children?

Sarah Nelson

Introduction

Five years after the dramatic Orkney “dawn raids” of February l99l, when nine children from four families were removed into care by social workers and police, I telephoned one social worker to check a detail about this so-called satanic abuse case, which was publicized in many countries. She had briefly assisted in removing children from one of the families who lived on these remote islands, north of the Scottish mainland.

“I expect you’ve wanted to put Orkney out of your mind, instead of continually having people ask you about it,” I apologized. There was a startled silence. “Oh no no,” she replied with emotion. “There’s not been a single day since when I haven’t thought about those children.”

Earlier another child protection worker had described what was most distressing to her about the whole “Orkney affair.” It was neither the disturbing testimony of some children she interviewed, nor the heavily-publicized criticism of her own interviewing methods, nor the many difficult days she faced on the Orkney Inquiry’s witness stand. It was watching one small girl cross the tarmac from the plane to a huge cheering crowd, to her own parents and a host of TV cameras at Kirkwall airport, after a Scottish judge had dismissed the case in court and the children were all returned home. “It broke my heart absolutely,” she said. “We had failed her, and I will never be able to get that sight out of my mind.”

Buried in Lord Clyde’s Inquiry Report (Clyde, 1992) is an account of this little girl’s behavior at her foster parents’ house when she heard that she was being returned home.

> She had been given a parcel containing cards and articles from Orkney, but she flung them all on the floor as if in a fit of rage. She was extremely distressed. She cried and indulged in very aggressive behaviour which was quite unlike her, smashing a doll on the ground. She started sucking her thumb. She seemed shocked and bewildered.
> She said she did not want to go home and stood like a wooden doll refusing to get dressed. She left the foster carer’s house in tears. On the journey home she engaged in bizarre behavior unlike anything which she had shown before. (Clyde, 1992, p. 206)

An eight-year-old boy from another family, when told he was returning home, asked his foster mother if it meant all the bad things would not happen any more. He began telling her of things that had happened in a quarry, indicated he had been handled sexually, and said he was worried about games that were played at home. "…the foster mother found the occasion very upsetting."

Although these details about the children's words and behavior are published in the Inquiry Report, they are not in the recollection of the great majority of the British public and media. Their picture of what Orkney was "about" has been very different, and the images scorched on the minds of the two workers are not the same as theirs. Most media coverage and public perception was of ridiculous, unjustified action taken against innocent parents by over-zealous professionals. Nor does the public image of heartless or faceless staff fit with their commitment. Like staff involved in other highly publicized child abuse cases, their continuing preoccupation has been with the children at the heart of the affair. This makes them unusual, for the most striking feature of the whole Orkney saga was how marginal real children became, and how little they featured on most people's agenda—whether they were legal professionals, politicians, civil servants, journalists or members of the public.

This chapter first outlines a brief history of the dispute, before considering some features of media reporting of the case. It asks whether the judicial conclusions, which led to more cautious interpretations of children's reliability in Scotland, were fundamentally flawed. It examines the ways in which the interests of real children were marginalized, and asks what "child-centered" issues the Inquiry might instead have recommended to be pursued and properly funded.

History of the Dispute

Space only permits here a summary of the main features of the Orkney affair, which occupied many reams of newsprint and 350 pages of a judicial report. Names have been changed below: initials only of parents' and children's names were used in the published judicial report.

In November 1990 a teenage girl in the large, disadvantaged Webb family living in South Ronaldsay, Orkney, alleged sexual contact by older siblings and by a minister of the Presbyterian Church. Seven of her younger siblings were removed into care by social workers under Place of Safety Orders.

Between this time and February l991 a public campaign by some Orkney people against the children's continuation in care included the local Presbyterian clergyman Rev McKee and his wife, the local doctor, the Mills parents and Mrs. Trent. Social workers felt concerned by the huge volume of correspondence some of these people sent to the Webb children, and by many puzzling messages and symbols it contained.

In February l991, during interviews by RSSPCC (Royal Scottish Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children) interviewers and police officers, three young Webb children made separate allegations of organized sexual abuse and strange outdoor rituals on South Ronaldsay, Orkney. These were said to involve many adults and children, including the clergyman and the Mills, Trent, Biggs and Hall families. Costumes, musical equipment, trailers and a "hooker" (a type of shepherd's crook) were mentioned.

On February 27, 1991, at 7 am, Orkney social work department assisted by two mainland social work departments, along with police officers, removed nine children from the four families (Mills, Trent, Biggs and Hall) under Place of Safety Orders, and flew them to placements on the Scottish mainland. The grounds for referral of the children made reference to group sexual activities including "ritualistic music, dancing and dress." Parental access was refused along with most personal possessions. Parents and the minister were questioned by the police. All four families were English "incomers" to Orkney (as was the Webb family); three were of middle class background.

A major campaign by the parents and others, including the local doctor, was immediately launched against the children's removal, with high-profile Scottish and English media involvement, largely in support of the parents, who were very articulate in protesting their innocence. The media appeared to make the first use of the phrase "satanic abuse" and the police were said to have impounded objects such as a book with a goat's head on the cover, which invited ridicule.

During March and April l991 the nine children were interviewed repeatedly by RSSPCC staff and police. Information from interviews of five of the children confirmed some aspects of the Webb children's allegations. In April l991 the proof hearing was heard by Sheriff David Kelbie. (In Scotland, a sheriff is a type of judge who hears a range of cases, but not in the highest courts.) He held that the proceedings had been incompetent, calling the case "fatally flawed," and the evidence was never heard. Nor has it ever been heard subsequently in any civil or criminal court. On the same day the children were returned home to their parents amid huge publicity.

In June l991, after the Crown Office (prosecution service) announced that no criminal proceedings would be taken against the church minister or any parents, the government announced a public inquiry under Lord Clyde. Its remit was to inquire into the actions of the authorities relating to the decision to take Place of Safety Orders; the removal of children from home, and their detention in places of safety; and to make recommendations. It was not to inquire into the truth or falsehood of the sexual abuse allegations.

Between August l991 and March l992 the Inquiry sat in public in Kirkwall, heard evidence from 75 witnesses and took numerous oral and written submissions. In October l992 Lord Clyde's report was published. It emphasized that all officials acted in good faith and aimed to make constructive proposals for the future. However the report's 135 summary comments were overwhelmingly critical of the authorities' conduct of the case including their advance planning, coordination, their care planning and interview techniques. The report made more than 190 recommendations for future practice.

These ranged over investigation, removal of children, rights and standards when children are detained, treatment of foster carers, medical examinations, interviewing of children, the role of children's reporter and panels and the role of the social work profession. (In Scotland the reporter is a key child protection official for children; the children's panel is a type of welfare-oriented court, staffed by lay people). Many recommendations influenced the subsequent Children Act of l995 and hence they had long-term effects. The Act saw changes in child protection orders, a tightening of conditions surrounding such orders, more powers for sheriffs, and provision for removing suspected abusers from home.

The Role of the Media

The media's role in controversial sex abuse cases is important. In Britain, hostile publicity against social workers and other professionals in highly publicized child abuse cases like Orkney, Rochdale (another alleged satanic ritual abuse case) or Cleveland (where the abuse diagnoses of two pediatricians came under attack, 1987-88) have made a disproportionate impact on child protection practice. They affect legislation, guidelines and procedures. Equally important, they intimidate many professionals from taking action on behalf of children, or speaking what they believe is the truth. They heavily influence public opinion, often for many years, about truth and falsehood in sexual abuse (for instance, does ritual abuse exist or is it just the product of fevered social work imaginations?) No case in Scotland that I can recall since that time of 1991-92 has publicly invoked any mention of ritual or satanist abuse even if this has been believed by the authorities to be an element in the case.

In Orkney the agenda for public discourse and understanding was set soon after the dawn raids, and the media played a crucial role in determining it. Uncritical acceptance by many journalists of disinformation and apparently planted stories foreshadowed features of the "false memory syndrome" debate to come.

Journalists who tried to keep an open mind on the allegations of abuse were themselves an isolated minority.

However the media were not the only influences—they interacted with officials and the public to generate one version of reality and one set of memories of what the case was about. Biased reporting was much encouraged by Orkney social work department's refusal to engage with the media and to give the public any alternative information. Divisions between "natives" and "incomers" set up barriers to local knowledge, for many people came to settle in the Orkney Islands from other parts of the UK. People would say that everyone knew each other's business, but in fact the two communities often led separate lives.

Most media coverage (especially in the early weeks of the crisis) apart from the specialist social work press was very sympathetic to the suspected parents and minister, and heavily critical of the authorities. The ritual abuse allegations were widely seen as incredible and ridiculous, the dawn raids as particularly heartless. (Ironically the timing of the raid was one of the few things which Lord Clyde's inquiry did not criticize.)

Some media coverage reached fanciful proportions. The language in this extract may be more flowery than usual but the degree of sympathy displayed was widespread. Describing the Mills parents after their children were removed, a Scotland on Sunday journalist wrote:

> Jane is thoughtful, articulate and determined, and would best be played by a younger, more vibrant Anna Massey. John—enthusiastic, helpful, deeply troubled—would be William Hurt. …since she lost her children, Jane says, all her senses have been heightened. "I see every feather on a bird more clearly. I see every drop of rain showing on the trees." …Jane sums up their time together. "We fell in love, we got married and we lived happily ever after. Then they took our children away." (Ferguson, 1991)

Information relevant to the crisis, such as the history of child protection failures in Orkney in the years preceding the raids, and the suspension of Orkney children's panel reporter Katherine Kemp over perceived failure to protect the Webb children, fell off a media agenda which it did not fit. These issues were discussed in print by only a few isolated journalists.

Because most English and international media disappeared after the first few weeks, only reappearing at the end of the Inquiry, any challenging evidence which appeared had little coverage outside Scotland. Tabloids and broadsheet coverage did not differ widely, perhaps because most suspected adults were respectable, articulate middle class people, with whom "quality" press writers and senior staff closely identified. “People like us,” it appeared, were being accused of unspeakable things.

There was in addition a much more hostile strand of the media, personified by the Mail on Sunday newspaper, which had a right wing populist agenda and appeared to be conducting an ideological crusade against social workers in general. There was a striking contrast between its heavy criticisms of social workers and the easy passage given to the police who were part of the joint operation. Like the Independent on Sunday, where particular journalists such as Rosie Waterhouse repeatedly attempted to discredit ritual abuse (for instance Waterhouse, 1991). The Mail on Sunday was also particularly scathing about the existence of “satanic” ritual abuse.

The friendly and trusting links forged early on between the suspected parents —who made rapid and skillful use of media connections—and many journalists meant their claims were widely accepted as fact without checking. For instance most media took on trust that the quarry where abuse was alleged to have happened was where the parents indicated (behind one of their homes). Yet the police, social workers and RSSPCC always believed that outdoor sites for abuse were elsewhere on South Ronaldsay, which is characterized by flat farming land, beaches and shallow, water-filled old quarries.

As an experienced journalist, I also encountered a puzzling scent of organized media manipulation on Orkney, which I had not met before. The claims and stories which popped up appeared quite similar to those in other organized sex abuse cases. There were also “pat” accounts of the “satanic abuse scare” which had apparently swept across the Atlantic from the United States, and which had its supposed origins in an unholy coalition of feminists and religious fundamentalists, which became so familiar and uniform that I could have written them with my eyes shut and standing on my head. Even at the tenth anniversary of the Orkney case these tales kept reappearing. For instance they were repeated in the Sunday Herald on 25 February 2001:

> South Ronaldsay is where the ritual sexual abuse theory leapt from the pages of social work journals and entered the popular lexicon of the nation. …A psychiatrist Roland Summit’s controversial idea was that organized, ritualistic abuse of children was happening everywhere. …it was out there and all social workers had to do was go and find it. And they did so with a passion of a zealot rooting out evil. The idea crossed the Atlantic gaining professional credibility as it spread like wildfire. (Crichton, 2001) Flapping on demonic wings, presumably.

In reporting these stories many journalists seemed to lose their normal critical faculties. These are three examples:

1. A series of occult bookshop newsletters, apparently published in Leeds, often crudely photocopied and with varying titles including The Lamp of Thoth, circulated widely on the islands in 1991 and were sent anonymously to elected Orkney councilors. “At last the full truth about the satanic abuse allegations can be revealed!” they dramatically claimed. Whole sections of their propaganda and angry claims about worldwide conspiracies by social workers or evangelical Christians appeared to be repeated as fact in some media—despite coming from such a highly partial source. No one appeared to question the sudden appearance of these magazines on Orkney, nor the veracity of their allegations. The claim that professionals were out to make large sums of money and prestige careers from the satanic child abuse industry seemed contradicted by experience—professionals found that admitting to belief in satanic ritual abuse was anything but beneficial to their careers and in some cases spelled the end of those careers.
2. Claims or innuendo were also repeatedly stated that one born-again Christian basic grade social worker influenced Orkney social work department and the police into carrying out the dawn raids. This was implied too in the BBC Scotland TV docu-drama (or “faction” program) Flowers of the Forest broadcast on October 26,1996. The obvious fact was ignored that even had the social worker sought this far-reaching act, he lacked any professional power or status to succeed!
3. Untruths from unknown sources also appeared to be planted. On Orkney, journalists were told that the distinguished American child abuse expert Professor Roland Summit was to blame (along with Christian zealots) for inspiring witch-hunts by social workers in Orkney and internationally (see the Crichton quote above). This ad hominem attack appeared strikingly similar to the way that the feminist authors Bass and Davis were later singled out for attack by advocates of the false memory syndrome as being to blame for the wave of recovered memories by adult women (Bass & Davis, 1988). It was claimed that Summit had said that if children denied abuse, this meant it had probably happened. This is a distortion of his most famous paper, “The Child Sexual Abuse Accommodation Syndrome” (Summit, 1983).

Strangely, this exact claim surfaced on October 3, l994 in a New Yorker editorial: “A psychiatrist named Roland Summit explained to the jury in the Kelly Michaels case that when children deny sexual abuse happened, the denial can be evidence that the abuses actually did occur."

Summit replied to the newspaper that he had been wholly uninvolved in this American case and had said nothing to the jury. "It would be fatuous to argue that denial is really confirmation in disguise. I have never said such a thing anywhere." These events and the subsequent correspondence between Summit and the newspaper are chronicled in detail in Freyd (1996).

Disinformation relied on lazy journalism, media gullibility, and the "pack mentality" of journalists who flew in and out of Kirkwall airport. But it is too simplistic to hold the media entirely responsible. Journalists often simply reflected the greater public of which they were part. At that time the possibility that middle class parents and respectable clergy might also abuse children was rarely considered. Very few people then had heard anything about organized, let alone ritual, abuse.

Besides, not everyone was receiving only one side of the story. For Scots at least, evidence to the Inquiry was reported in detail every day in the broadsheet newspapers, and usually on radio and TV. To pick three examples, the public read that a remarkable volume of correspondence had been sent by several suspected adults to the children of the original family held in care, that these contained peculiar, inappropriate messages, that strange objects like hammers were also posted to these young children. Secondly, they read that when police conducted the dawn raid on the minister's house, they recovered from inside his bed a child's hot water bottle belonging to an 8-year-old abused boy from the Webb family. This had the boy's name on it along with a sexual reference. No explanation of this singular find was ever given.

Thirdly, when the foster parents took the Inquiry stand, they gave much detail about unusual, disturbing and bizarre words and behavior by several children from three of the four families. These included blasphemous chants, violent and frightening plays, an obsession with killing and death, and realistic enactment of childbirth.

For example, when there was a power failure in the home of the foster mother of one eight-year-old boy, on the day that he arrived, she lit candles. The boy passed his hand through the flame saying, "I like hurting myself. I like killing people." When light was restored the foster mother exclaimed, "Let there be light!" to which the boy replied: "May the light not be upon us and God not be with us." Full details of such incidents are given in Lord Clyde's report, along with all the original allegations from three Webb children.

Yet none of this information appeared to impact upon the public. A research study by Jenny Kitzinger found that most people they interviewed about the Orkney affair had little recollection or impression beyond the dawn raids and a bungled operation by social workers. They recalled almost nothing about the lengthy Inquiry or evidence given to it (Kitzinger, 2000). It thus seems that people are able to reject, ignore or fail to notice evidence which might challenge the judgments they have already made about cases involving child sexual abuse.

The third vital element in the Orkney affair was the attitude of the authorities to communicating with the public through the media. Orkney social work department took to extremes the usual official caution and reticence and formed part of an island council which was traditionally secretive and fearful, inexperienced and unprepared for an onslaught of media interest. The department failed to communicate for some time even with the sympathetic specialist social work press. (I was working for such a journal and at the height of the crisis I sat on the steps of the social work department and declined to budge until someone would speak to me.) Thus while accused adults used the media skillfully, journalists simply could not obtain “the other side of the story” even when they wished to do so.

While the children’s charity the RSSPCC was more forthcoming off the record and also voiced its belief in ritual abuse off the record, it quickly adopted a damage limitation strategy, rather than attempting to justify its role in Orkney. It dropped its investigative role in child sexual abuse (a role which is still maintained by the equivalent organization in England), it publicly played down its belief in the existence of ritual abuse, changed its name to Children 1st, and like Orkney and Strathclyde social work departments, has declined to comment publicly on the case since.

Such collective silences by agencies, in highly publicized cases, continue to make an impact, and to raise serious questions for child protection (Nelson, 1998). Most social workers, police, and major childcare charities still remain extremely cautious about media publicity more than a decade later, wounded and distrustful of journalists and public after savage media scapegoating in cases like Cleveland, Orkney and Rochdale. In contrast, accused adults continue to use the media to publicize their causes.

Agencies’ refusal to comment deprives the public of information which would help them reach their own judgments on the evidence. Statutory and voluntary childcare agencies are the public faces of child protection. They speak for many child and adult survivors who cannot do so. If they will not stand up to be counted and face the consequences, then, it might be asked, who else will?

Were Far-Reaching Verdicts Correct?

In Orkney the separate testimonies of three Webb children, which led directly to the dawn raids, formed the basis for one of the report's most far-reaching and most-quoted recommendations, that investigators "must not fall into the trap of confusing the taking of what a child says seriously with believing what the child has said."

This in effect gives comfort and succor to those who still believe children often fantasize or even lie about sexual abuse. It also makes investigating authorities more cautious. In my own academic research subsequently on various aspects of child sexual abuse, I have encountered, more than ten years after the Orkney case, in 2003, pediatricians who still speak nervously of Cleveland (1987-88) as a reason to be extremely cautious in inquiring about possible sexual abuse in an injured child; and schoolteachers who still quote Orkney (1991-92) as a reason not to inquire directly, of a child showing certain symptoms, if someone has sexually harmed them.

Given, then, the serious consequences of Lord Clyde's recommendation for future child protection, conclusions drawn about these Webb children's credibility would have had to be particularly sound and convincing. But were Lord Clyde's recommendations instead, to borrow a phrase from Sheriff Kelbie, "fatally flawed"?

The basis for this recommendation lay overwhelmingly in the Inquiry team's judgment of statements and drawings made by three Webb children, aged from six to eight, in February l991. The report details the verbal allegations in full, and describes the drawings.

Undoubtedly social workers and police should have undertaken more detailed investigation of the adults and children named by the Webbs before deciding what action, if any, to take. But this was not the basis for this recommendation. Instead this centered on the fact that the Webb children came from a family with a history of abuse, "which was likely to have affected their development."

Professional assessment of the children by a psychologist or psychiatrist would have been prudent, says the Inquiry report, to consider:

> Whether their perception of reality had been in any way coloured or affected by the (their) abusive experiences… what might have seemed real to them might well not accord with what was real to others. It was not impossible that innocent incidents could have taken on a sexual overtone in their imaginations… (Clyde, 1992, p. 223)

The message is familiar. Mixed-up children with histories of abuse need their minds tested before we take their matter-of-fact statements as matters of fact. But there are several problems about using such arguments in this case.

First, the Webb children had more of a history of reticence about sexual abuse in their family than of fabrication or fantasy. Some of their previous allegations about their own family were substantiated. One older boy took two years to admit to a residential school his history of sadistic physical and sexual abuse by his father.

Secondly, the report rightly criticized the fact that the nine children from the other families were not treated as individuals. But the report itself failed to consider the three Webb youngsters as individuals, treating them instead as a single entity.

There were remarkable similarities in the very detailed accounts of places, events, activities, trappings and names by three children who had been kept apart for several months (apart from one brief supervised meeting between two of them). The report's argument would mean that three separate children's life developments had been identical, that their distorted perceptions of reality had been identical. Innocent incidents would have had to take on exactly the same sexual overtones in their imaginations. Such overtones would not explain why all these children believed they had witnessed or experienced physical pain, distress and sadness. No alternative explanation is offered for what exactly the innocent incidents, which led to these reactions, might have been.

Thirdly it must be judged whether these children's accounts had more of a ring of imaginative storytelling or of concrete detail, for example in extracts such as:

> (MW) was asked where this had happened. She said in a quarry in a field. She drew a picture of a car and trailer travelling to the place from her home. In the trailer she drew the table and music centre. She drew car lights on and said it was dark. We asked her who would be there. She named… (etc). (Clyde, 1992, p. 31)

These children described in a matter-of-fact way a series of events, where they were taken from one place in certain cars and trailers by certain people in certain costumes, to another place, where they unloaded specific equipment and were joined by more named adults who, they claimed, sexually abused named children. These lists of people are very similar to each other. They all name equipment the interviewers do not understand, like the hooker, which appeared to be a kind of shepherd‘s crook. The children worry about accuracy. They grow annoyed when the hooker drawn is too small or when the car lights are not put in, and they make corrections. The only obvious examples of childish imaginative expression are about emotions, as when M. "drew the sun looking down with a sad face, and tears, and said that the sun was crying."

It is not clear why such accounts were considered to need examination by a psychologist or psychiatrist. Rather, they appear to call for a detailed investigation of the information they contained, to see if any corroboration could be found and to probe further on if and when these events happened, where the locations were, and whether children were given any drugged substances. These might indeed have affected their perceptions.

The evidence, given by foster parents, ordinary people with no axe to grind, and which made serious, detailed claims about children's bizarre words and behavior in their care, was not even assessed by the Inquiry, far less validated or discredited. It formed no part of the official interviewing techniques, which were so scrutinized and so criticized.

The Marginalization of Real Children

Perhaps the most striking feature of the whole Orkney case was how rarely children, and in particular nine actual children, became central to the concern of anyone—except the authorities who were heavily criticized.

The socially stigmatized, 15-strong Webb family, who made the first allegations about the other nine children and their parents, never appeared to raise much public interest within or beyond Orkney, although social workers continued to work closely and supportively with them, a number being placed in long-term foster care.

Again, the outrage in most press publicity after the dawn raids was about injustice done to adults—the children's parents, and the minister who also faced accusations of sexual abuse. This minister received many expressions of support from within the Church of Scotland. However, not one voice was raised publicly from this major Scottish institution that the Church should investigate the allegations in case any children should be at risk, or that the minister should be suspended on full pay until the matter was resolved. (Only in l997 did the Church ratify a child protection policy of its own at the General Assembly.) Thousands of Quakers across Britain also sent letters of support to one set of parents and children who were Quakers, but none seemed to consider that the allegations of abuse ought to be investigated.

The Orkney public avoided the Inquiry proceedings and very few local people showed the concern or the interest to turn up at these proceedings. Explaining this situation to me, one local councilor said he was ashamed to tell me that people did not want to go there in case they were somehow identified with the whole affair. Orkney's tourist chief deplored the damage done to Orkney's image and its visitor business. Orkney Islands Council paid compensation and fulsomely apologized to the families concerned, which effectively prevented their giving offence by monitoring any children about whom they had remaining concerns. It is not possible to base the protection of children on fear of offending adults.

The nine children were marginalized in other ways too. Evidence prepared by the social workers and police was rejected by Sheriff Kelbie before it could even be heard. Scotland's senior judge, Lord Hope, later condemned his precipitate act, saying the effect of what he did was "incalculable." Although the acting children's panel reporter Gordon Sloan won his appeal against Kelbie's decision, he still decided to abandon further proceedings. For that he was sharply criticized in the Clyde report. When the Secretary of State for Scotland then announced a public inquiry its remit, about the conduct of the authorities, excluded consideration of the truth or falsehood of the allegations. It could not discuss whether or not any children were in need of protection.

The Inquiry lasted eight months, cost £6 million, exhaustively criticized the child protection authorities, and made nearly 200 recommendations in 350 pages. Most were sensible and constructive: the Inquiry team members were caring and competent. Yet they had just one sentence of explicit comment to make about all the bizarre evidence from the children, which they had heard: "In the case of some of the children, it is not impossible that there could have been some matters, perhaps far removed from any incidents in Orkney, which could have been troubling them."

That seems a mild and cautious comment in response to one child enacting gruesome, violent and sexual plays, claiming his mother made gravy with blood, and saying he was put into coffins; to another claiming her father drank blood and kept it in the fridge; to another re-enacting graphic scenes of childbirth at the age of seven, and claiming that the baby would die; and to another reciting strange chants against God. These incidents are all mentioned in the Inquiry report. This last boy, according to evidence to the Inquiry on December 17, 1991, drew men with huge breasts with snakes coming out of them, kept talking about germs and washed himself continually, swore in words which made no sense, talked constantly about killing people, and was convinced that his mother could hear him through the radio.

This was the boy who may have had some matters far removed from Orkney troubling him: the same boy who, on hearing he was to be sent home to Orkney, had asked his foster mother, "Does this mean that the bad things are not going to happen any more?"

After the report was published, the public discourse was about apologies to adults, vindication of adults, resignations by adults, the need for community reconciliation among adults, and the need for Orkney social work department to establish its good faith among the adults of South Ronaldsay. Nothing could have been more revealing about the respective priorities our society gives to adults and to children. Nor is it possible to imagine a fraction of that £6 million of public money being spent with one quarter of the speed on for example, techniques of criminal investigation, on strengthening child protection services in remote areas, or on research into organized sexual abuse in Scotland. Just as it was impossible to visualize a fraction of the cost of the l987 Cleveland Inquiry being spent on research or investigation into the anal abuse of children.

Although this eminent, caring Inquiry team was often prepared to exceed its strict remit (for instance by including in the report the detail of children's testimony) it was not prepared to do so by inserting a single sentence at the end. One sentence could have kept open the door to future monitoring of the children's safety, which would not have reduced their valid criticisms of the authorities. "We remain very concerned," they could have written, "about some of the evidence from certain children we have heard presented to us, and believe that further monitoring of possible risks to these children is necessary."

It does not make sense to argue, as in the Cleveland report, that "the child is a person, not an object of concern;" (Butler-Sloss, 1989), or as in the Orkney report, that the nine children "were not treated as individuals," if the actual named children involved in a case fall through a gaping hole in those Inquiries. For if the entire panoply of a country's child protection system cannot protect actual known children in a single case, then whatever else it achieves, however many guidelines, procedures or sound practices it spawns, there is a failure at its heart.

And if we as a society—politicians, judges, public, media—are happy to sanction £6 million on a public inquiry into the behavior of officials who sought however ineptly to protect real young people, yet can neither fund any means of establishing whether or not a handful of children were horrifyingly abused, nor make a priority of seeking better ways to protect children from abusers in future, there is something profoundly skewed about our values.

How did real children disappear from a case which for so long absorbed professionals, media and public? That is an important question, with wider parallels. Likewise, Beatrix Campbell made the point that 10 years after the Cleveland Inquiry we still did not know whether the children (more than 120 of them in this case) were in need of protection (Campbell, 1997).

First of all, the Inquiry's remit meant that examples of poor practice towards the children set the parameters for what child-centered practice was about (e.g., appropriate foster placements, contact with siblings and parents, keeping their own possessions.) Thus difficult questions about child centered practice in protection were submerged.

Secondly the Inquiry had to relegate other important considerations. “The problem” was not about how sadistic organized sexual abuse could effectively be investigated, nor about how rural child protection could be improved, nor about how communities could work with professionals in protecting children from abuse. Though all these three things were touched upon in the report, they occupied a small fraction of the space given to analyzing at length each week of detailed preparation for the dawn raids, including serious conflicts between Orkney managers and Strathclyde social workers.

Years later, many people still urgently need guidance on ritual and organized sexual abuse, on rural child protection, or on community contributions to child protection. In contrast, few if any now wish or need to examine the tortuous daily detail of preparations for the dawn raids, which were infused by poor investigatory planning and blinkered managerial arrogance.

The Inquiry report did call for some measures against suspected adults—like provision to remove alleged abusers, rather than children, from the home. But most of its other recommendations were in effect about how professional procedures could be improved to minimize the risk of unfounded action. Thus there were numerous, specific recommendations about the interviewing of children.

A different response could have been made to a highly-publicized case like the Orkney affair. For instance there could have been a less expensive, limited-term inquisitorial judicial Inquiry into official conduct; an exploration of existing best practice from elsewhere; a well-funded and focused research program; and establishment of protective measures like children’s rights officers, children’s resource centers or helplines in the Scottish Highlands and other remote areas.

Alternative strategies, however, demand a willingness to pause and reflect before responding to public scandal. They also call for political courage, and a determination to place the needs of children above the demands and sensibilities of adults.

Imagine if police forces had instead been resourced to do priority work on future ways of prosecuting organized abuse, if research had been commissioned into techniques of surveillance and evidence gathering in remote communities, or if one pilot project in Britain had been funded to create an informed, aware, protective local community. It is only through realizing how hard these things are to imagine that we appreciate how skewed our child protection system actually is. The public and the child protection agencies need to demand a change of priorities.

It is even more important to ensure that if limited numbers of actual young people needed protection in places like Cleveland, Rochdale or Orkney, where there were allegations of sexual abuse on a major scale, that they retain the hope of protection and justice and restitution. It does not absolve unfinished responsibilities to real children and young people to apologize that social workers bungled things, that a sheriff behaved improperly, that the acting children's reporter should not have abandoned his appeal. There was surely a responsibility to maintain a continuing vigilance, so that new evidence could be collected if it was there to be collected. If any of those children on Orkney did need protection, justice or restitution, then they are still waiting for it as adults today.

CHAPTER 13

Our Father Who Art in Hell: A Factual Account

Ulla Fröhling

All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing.
–Edmund Burke, 1790

"The first in-depth German study of a DID patient with a background of severe home abuse, child prostitution, and SRA has been published."[1] These words were written by Onno van der Hart in 1997 in an essay on ritual abuse in Europe in reference to my book Vater unser in der Hölle [Our Father Who Art in Hell], which I had spent four years researching. The book had an impact: victims found a corroboration of their experiences in it, and doctors and trauma therapists who work with dissociative patients use it for workshops and training courses. A parliamentary inquiry examined the topic of ritual abuse, as did the Parliamentary select committee "Sects and Psycho-Groups," which mentions the book several times in its concluding report. A foundation for victims of ritual abuse was set up. Three surveys on ritual abuse were carried out. Together with Michaela Huber's textbook Multiple Persönlichkeiten [Multiple Personalities], it changed the German public's perception of one of the darkest areas of organized violence.

For eight years; then the book went out of print. Remaining copies that had cost 20 euros on the market were now being auctioned at eBay for up to 200 euros each. Several publishers realized that this subject was important and sought to acquire reprint rights. Subsequently I revised and updated the book, adding a further ten years of the protagonist "Angela Lenz's" life to the account. Handwriting samples from a number of her personalities were added, as well as letters with thoughts and memories of her therapist. The book also contains an afterword by Professor Onno van der Hart, prefaces by the trauma therapists Professor Luise Reddemann and Michaela Huber, the former member of parliament Renate Rennebach, who had been part of the Parliamentary committee "Sects and Psycho-Groups." An updated text by the social pedagogue Thorsten Becker on ritual abuse in Germany was also added. An accompanying website (www.ourfatherinhell.com) offers additional resources in English and German on the subjects of trauma, sects, cults and ritual abuse.

I have now been dealing with the subject of ritual abuse for over fifteen years, have made the acquaintance of many survivors, and have observed—and perhaps influenced—the public's attitude to it as a journalist, yet without losing sight of Angela Lenz's life. In the course of time, this journalistic coverage has become a long-term study. The following excerpts from the new edition of Vater unser in der Hölle offer insights into the state of knowledge and changes concerning ritual abuse in Germany.

This is one woman's story: the story of Angela Lenz.

Angela Lenz has multiple personalities. Multiple Personality Disorder[2] can be understood as a survival system for the soul. In scientific terms: a reaction to traumatic stress caused by extreme abuse in the early childhood years, abuse that takes place over a long period of time and which the child cannot escape. Hers is a story shared by many people. Angela Lenz is not the only person in Germany to survive incest, forced prostitution and rituals carried out by a satanic group. Everything that Angela reports is confirmed by the testimony of other victims. The victims' reports seem incredible, and one would rather not believe them.

What made me think I could trust her accounts?

Angela does not appear to be mixed up or confused. Rather, she is calm, controlled, and clear. If she cannot remember something, she admits it, corrects her mistake and admits that there are holes in her story that she cannot fill. She did not try to hide the contradictory nature of her personalities from me, but instead revealed their diverse feelings and opinions.

Professionals who study cults, representatives of the police and doctors, confirm these descriptions. Therapists from Germany, Holland, Belgium, America, Canada, England, France, Spain, Denmark, Norway, Turkey, Australia and Israel with whom I spoke or corresponded described similar incidents and phenomena. Many of them have more than twenty-five years of therapeutic experience working with torture victims like Angela Lenz.

Based on school reports, correspondence, photo albums, official documents, medical reports, x-rays and newspaper clippings, I have tried to create a picture that comes as close as possible to the true events. Parts of Angela's family history can no longer be reconstructed. Her father is dead. The causes of his pedophilia can only be speculated about today. Family history reveals the abusive and promiscuous nature of the grandfather as well as the strict pietistic climate his family has lived in for generations. Angela's father also grew up in a family where public and private life were clearly dissociated from one another. Quite early in the family's history there was a diagnosis of something that was described at the time as schizophrenia.

The family is granted special protection by the state. But who protects the children in families that neglect or abuse them physically, emotionally or sexually? Most violence takes place at home, behind closed doors. All over the world.

Incest is a profound emotional injury and an early development factor that prevents many children from reaching autonomy and a feeling of clear personal limits. The constant stress undergone by small children in a state of fear affects nerve connections in the brain and the biochemistry of the body: when in danger, each of us automatically produces large amounts of a "hormone cocktail" intended to help us fight or escape, then calm down again. If danger keeps returning unpredictably and inescapably, the body creates its own form of drug addiction. If the perpetrator is also the protector, i.e., the father or the mother, the child undergoes severe conditioning. It becomes a different child to the one it could have become.

What a bitter way to start one's life.

According to Francisco Orengo, incest is the apprenticeship for prostitution. Pimps know this, the Spanish psychiatrist emphasizes; in his clinic, he has helped many women to escape from prostitution. Pimps, he states, recognize the women who have been hurt early in life.[3] He describes it as a form of knowledge passed on from father to son. And a trap from which few escape.

How did Angela Lenz manage to do it?

To find out, I visited the sites of Angela Lenz's memories. I visited the quiet, exclusive neighborhood of her childhood, I followed the path behind the houses and went into the forest where Angela was tortured. I went to church and listened to a sermon held by a man Angela identifies as a pedophile criminal. At the start of my research, he was still in office. Why had he not been removed? Angela did not press charges against him. She did not press charges against anyone.

That was the "deal" with the perpetrators.

We know their names and know where they live. Whenever "Uncle Paul" moves to a new federal state I can keep track of him, as he always registers his name with the telephone company like a law-abiding citizen. From his last house he had a good view of a former concentration camp.

Angela wrote down the names of the perpetrators, the scenes of the crimes, and all the circumstances surrounding what was done. These records have been preserved in various places. In some cases, the original records have been left with people instructed not to hand them out to anyone, not even to Angela herself. But who will pass them on to the public prosecutor's office in case she dies? Or in case anything suspicious happens to a member of her family, her therapist, the author or others connected with this book. Even if they fall victim to what looks like a normal traffic accident, these records will be distributed accordingly.

That was the deal with the perpetrators. A deal that even the police accept. For a long time, abusers were far ahead of the investigators in their technical methods. Photos of sadistic sex scenes with children aged 5, 3 or 1, even with babies, are sent all over the world via high speed lines on the information highways, but it took more than a decade for special police units to be equipped with the necessary hard and software to intercept them. In the last ten years, such criminals have progressed even more rapidly. When I began my research for this book, few people suspected what police have meanwhile determined to be the case: child abuse in the "second life" of a virtual world in the Internet,[4] torture of babies and infants online in front of webcams,[5] murders with clear Satanic indications in several European countries,[6] attempted cover-ups in the cracking of Mafia-like networks involving figures from politics, business and organized crime, with mentions—as in Saxony in 2007—of child abuse and child brothels.[7] An explosive mixture. When Angela became acquainted with this dark world decades ago, nobody believed her accounts. The taboo was intact and the perpetrators were safe.

Now the taboo is beginning to break down. Some journalists will not be fooled; nor will some doctors. "At the time, people thought we were insane for believing our patients," reports Prof. Dr. Luise Reddemann. "Now all the terrible things you described in your book have sadly turned out to be true."[8] Medical and therapeutic knowledge is increasing.[9] Brain researchers can now identify the switch from one personality to another through magnetic resonance imaging. And there are now three studies dealing with ritual abuse in Germany, as well as an Internet survey with results from all continents. It is conceivable that some fragments of Angela Lenz's memories may be attributable to suggestions by the perpetrators. Others could be images representing ordeals experienced, or memories used to mask others, for example to protect herself from knowing the full extent of her father's actions. Nonetheless, after 15 years, I am still convinced that Angela Lenz was subjected to extreme violence, sadistic torture and ritual abuse.

Names, dates, places, professions of the perpetrators and victims have been changed in order to prevent identification of Angela, her current family or her family of origin. The same applies to any other potentially revealing information such as hobbies and athletic events. The therapists' names, "Nina Temberg" and "Elisabeth Gebhard," are also pseudonyms.

The names and quotations from the scholars, psychiatrists, therapists (Thorsten Becker, Dr. Catherine Fine, Prof. Onno van der Hart, Dr. Arne Hofmann, Michaela Huber, Anne Jürgens, Dr. Richard Kluft, Prof. Francesco Orengo, Monika Veith and others) are authentic. Interviews with them took place as reported.

When the altered mental states of victims recall the traumas they endured, these memories often have a timeless quality: a feeling of being outside of time and space. Dissociated identities that feel caught up in the middle of a traumatic memory often cannot tell that the experience is over, and first have to work out the person, place and time. Their reality has to be reinforced literally: “Look, here is the floor, you are standing on it, you are safe, it is over.” But this is also true in another sense: because these victims often suffer from a loss of temporal orientation, the perpetrators are further protected if neither the place nor the time can be named.

For this reason, each chapter that tells of a remembered trauma opens with a short list of historic events, in order to place the trauma in the context of its place and time. For example, such-and-such an event can be connected to the time that Sugar Baby Love was heard regularly on the radio, when Helmut Kohl was chancellor of Germany, and Charles Manson went to jail on charges of ritual murder.

Some episodes are derived from the reports of other survivors. The lives of people who grow up in destructive cults—neo-Nazi or occult—possess a fixed structure which may include the birth and sacrifice of one’s own child. Angela was spared this—at least as far as we know today. And although she was not the one who personally endured such an experience, she was traumatized by having to share the event.

Writing this book meant approaching the unbearable: coming so close to evil that it could be felt. The unbearable things that happened to Angela made her a victim; that was bad enough. But even worse: a perpetrator. Because Angela was both.

Violence is a spiral that keeps on turning. I have tried to find a way of speaking about these things that avoids passing on that violence, yet still expresses what happened because it did really happen and continues to happen.

Many of the strategies used by child pornography rings and destructive cults to infiltrate the therapies of victims who have broken away are so monstrous that I did not initially want to accept that they really happened. For this reason, the psychological tricks I have documented in this book are only ones that have been confirmed by at least three therapists independently of one another. This applies, for example, to the disgusting use of photographs and recordings of the therapist during torture in order to create an aversion or fear towards her.

Angela Lenz describes two worlds: a bright, cheery, colorful one and a dark, brown-black, threatening one full of horror and violence. Full of violence she experienced. Some of Angela's personalities want revenge. Most of them, however, simply hope that "the bright world will finally realize that there really is another, darker world."

It really exists, here among us, very close to us. Not only in the Belgian town of Sars-la-Buissière, where Marc Dutroux tortured and killed children. Or in the forests around Milan, where the heavy metal band Beasts of Satan carried out murders in Satanic rituals. Or in the French town of Angier, where 45 children between six months and twelve years of age were raped and sold into prostitution by 65 adults, including their own parents. Or in London, where, according to police reports, 300 colored boys between four and seven years of age disappeared in 2001, and a boy's torso found in the river Thames forced Scotland Yard to start investigating ritual abuse and archaic ceremonies. Or in Portugal, where over 600 cases of sexual violence against children were uncovered in Casa Pia, a chain of children's homes. Or in Spain, where police arrested 66 in July 2007 in "Operation Punishment" and confiscated 50 million (!) images of children being tortured. No: here too, in our own country.

Violence creates divisions; sometimes even among the helpers. It took a long time before the different areas in this great field of human misfortune gathered their knowledge together and joined forces. It was only at the end of the 1990s that trauma research and therapy in Germany began to take off. This had several causes.

One of these—as terrible as it may sound—was the worst rail accident in German history: the Inter City Express crash in Eschede in 1998. The media reported at length on the horrific disaster, in which 101 people died and 88 were severely injured. For the first time, an ombudsman was appointed to determine the claims and needs of survivors and represent them against the rail service. The former vice president of the Federal Social Security Court, Professor Otto E. Krasney, accomplished this task so effectively that the significance and consequences of traumatic experiences filtered through the press and reached the public awareness. The German rail service paid for the counseling of survivors and relatives of "Eschede."

Then public perception was changed again by terrorist attacks and major natural disasters: New York (2001), Madrid (2004) and London (2005); the Tsunami in the Indian Ocean (2004) and Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans (2005). Now the media began to focus on the possible long-term consequences for survivors.

In parallel, the extremely dynamic development of the Internet assisted the explosive dissemination of child pornography around the world. Step by step, national and international teams of investigators were able to uncover criminal networks of producers, distributors and consumers of these torture films. The number of arrests increased. Now, finally, the media began to examine the consequences of such abuse for the little victims of this million-dollar business.

But there are differences: some may still remember the Dutch “child porn scandal” of 1998.[10] The discovery of 9000 photos and CD-ROMs with images of extreme sexual violence against children and babies in the seaside resort of Zandvoort was described as a “bombshell” and stayed in the headlines for weeks. “Zandvoort” did not, however, remain in the collective memory as long as “Eschede.” The tragedy for these victims is that this violence takes place in secret; it is “dirty” and taboo. Accordingly it is soon forgotten again.

There is no compensation, either for the victims of natural disasters or for children who have been tortured. But there can be acknowledgement. Some victims of torture and sexual or ritual abuse have fought to be acknowledged—and succeeded. By raising their voices, they have broken free from their tormentors, for “the mightiest weapon in the hand of the oppressor,” according to the South African politician Stephen Biko,[11] “is the spirit of the oppressed.” I had already learned twenty years ago from Wolfgang Kneese, an escapee from Colonia Dignidad, a German sect in Chile that practiced ritual violence and served as a torture camp for the Pinochet regime, what this lack of freedom feels like: “With every little decision I make in life, I’m not the one deciding—in my head, it’s Paul Schäfer standing up and deciding. And I can’t get him out of there.”

Wolfgang Kneese is a fighter. He made the fight against his tormentor Paul Schäfer, the founder and leader of the Colonia Dignidad sect, his life’s mission. “I want to see him in court,” he said. In 2006 he succeeded.

Anna Burger also succeeded.[12] She was granted political asylum in Australia in 1998 after fleeing from a destructive cult in Germany at the start of the 1980s. She came from a family that seems to have been working for the child pornography mafia and dressing up these activities in Old Germanic ideology. Anna Burger fled to the other side of the globe to escape. The Australian government acknowledged that Germany has a problem with ritual abuse carried out by occult groups, and that the German government is either unable or unwilling to protect the victims. This marked the first time ever that a survivor of ritual abuse had been granted asylum.

(translated from German by Wieland Hoban)

Angela Lenz describes two worlds: a bright, cheery, colorful one and a dark, brown-black, threatening one, full of horror and violence. Abusive violence fully experienced. Some of Angela’s personalities seek revenge. Most, however, want only that “the bright world finally recognizes that there is really another, darker world.” There really is such a dark world here at home right in our own neighborhoods, not only in Belgium’s Sars-la-Buissière, where Marc Dutroux tortured and killed.

Can this dark, secret world be brought to light?

CHAPTER 14

Where are We Now? Ritual Abuse, Dissociation, Police and the Media

Valerie Sinason, Graeme Galton, and David Leevers

"I find it depressing that with all the evidence of evil and unspeakable acts perpetrated against victims in Bosnia and Kosovo, we are so reluctant, even hostile, to listen to the victims of ritual and sexual abuse. Why is serious crime, especially serious financial crime, accorded sophisticated investigative resources whilst allegations of sexual and physical abuse for ritual purposes for the most part are treated as fantastic and not even sufficiently tested? Before police forces set up paedophile squads and domestic violence units, there was very little child abuse. Now nobody doubts the phenomenon or its extent."[1]

"Now that my work has been successful over this period, they (detectives) are learning that you cannot find evidence for what you don't think exists. Untrained or sceptical police look past the evidence if it is about the occult. They want to prove the case but don't look deeper."[2]

Introduction

In the period after the Second World War in the UK, there was a desperate yearning for children to have a proper safe childhood and be brought up in peace. Colour picture books, like the “Janet and John” school reading books, proliferated. These focussed on loved middle-class children with two parents, a mother and a father. They lived in comfortable homes, had gender-specific toys, went out to tea with friends and had parties in their large gardens. Despite the levels of poverty, unemployment and abuse there was a parallel printed universe of utopian childhood. In this world, true for only a small minority, there were no emotional, physical, sexual or spiritual violations, rapes or assaults. All badness could be projected onto Hitler and Nazism and be buried with peace.

Toxic containers cannot hold the waste of families forever, however, and the leakage then begins to spread.

With awareness of physical abuse not being acknowledged on a conscious political level until the 1980’s, how could there be even a glimmer of acceptance for the concept of ritual abuse? This was the period in the UK when ritual abuse in the form of school beatings could take place with impunity, where religious leaders could emotionally abuse their congregations through internalising and projecting a God of hatred rather than love, and where a general understanding of authoritarianism, domestic abuse and bullying was only in its infancy.

Those of us who began working with abuse victims in the late 1970’s or early 1980’s look back with pain and humility at the way our individual journeys of understanding abuse issues matched the social development of such understanding. Although we might like to feel we are above our culture, the timing of our awareness of levels of abuse tells a different story. For example, many of us were first able to see abuse by a step-father, then by a father, then by a mother, then by siblings, then with multi-perpetrator groups involving use of animals, the creation of DID, then mind control. There were often years between each of those stages.

What are we missing now? The client is not usually safe enough to tell us what we cannot bear to know (Bowlby, 1979). It seems that each time we attempt to acknowledge or redress a social ill, we are already missing the next one.

So here we are in the 21st century. Where are we in the UK and Europe on the subject of ritual abuse?

1. UK Definitions of Ritual Abuse

Within the UK, McFadyen, Hanks and James (1993) have provided the most thorough definition: “Ritual abuse is the involvement of children in physical, psychological or sexual abuse associated with repeated activities (‘ritual’) which purport to relate the abuse to contexts of a religious, magical or supernatural kind” (p.37). They have refrained from making any assumptions about perpetrators’ motivations in using rituals since that is irrelevant to the victims. Regardless of whether the rituals and regalia used in abusive situations have come from a true belief system or from paedophiles making use of such items, the situation is that children have been more frightened and believe what their abusers have told them.

La Fontaine (1994), an anthropologist, gives a basic definition in her report funded by the Department of Health: “Ritual abuse is sexual abuse where there have been allegations of rituals associated with the abuse whether or not these allegations have been taken further or tested in the courts.” It is not generally realised that her book on the subject also defines satanic abuse to be unsubstantiated abuse. Thus, by this definition, the only proven abuse is ritual but not ritual Satanic. Her study was confined to the very small number of cases, largely from the lower social classes that resulted in convictions where the ritual element was named. The British Government’s reading of her report was that satanic abuse did not exist. This had a damaging effect nationally.

The major British Department of Health (1999) document, “Working Together to Safeguard and Promote the Welfare of Children,” does not even mention ritual abuse per se, but states that, “A number of features of sexual abuse have also been linked with severity of impact including the extent of premeditation, the degree of threat and coercion, sadism, and bizarre or unusual elements.” It is of concern that since 2000, the term “bizarre or unusual elements” has been removed. From a political point of view, as evidenced by government-approved documents, the situation remains poor.

For the purpose of our work, we adopt the McFadyen definition when it comes to alleged ritual abuse of children. Furthermore, regardless of religious implications, we are particularly concerned by those allegations that include these practices:

rape

necrophilia abortion

bestiality

non-consenting impregnation

cannibalism

consumption of body fluids non-consenting sado-masochistic acts consumption of animal fluids despoiling of churches and cemeteries killing and/or torture of animals

The following practices are not offences in themselves, but have been mentioned so frequently in allegations that they are seen as contextually relevant to the establishment of a definition of ritual abuse:

induction of trance states

wearing of ritual apparel use of chanting

use of ritual instruments

Whilst court cases have found it easier to focus on single perpetrators, the majority of the allegations we hear involve organised groups of perpetrators. This leads to the importance of defining organised abuse. La Fontaine (1993) pointed to the varieties of meanings that this term has had and the consequent misunderstandings where there was more than a single abuser and where the adults "appear to have acted in concert to abuse the children" (La Fontaine, 1994). Although there can be dangers in labelling a case "organised abuse" too early (Clyde, 1992), there are also dangers in accepting a case as "only" intrafamilial. Regarding "the existence of more than one perpetrator or the production of pornographic material going unrecognized," Lynch and Browne (1993) write:

> Most practitioners will have worked with children where such details have emerged weeks into the investigation or months into therapy, by which time evidence of perpetrators may have disappeared… If the existence of such evidence is not sought it is not likely to be found. (p. 219)

It is important to note that where agencies such as the NSPCC (National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children) first have suspicions of organised ritual abuse, the average number of children is 13 and the average number of alleged perpetrators is 7. However, when it comes to convictions, there may only be one or two (Creighton, 1993).

We have been held back by the historical process in which awareness of incest moved into awareness of paedophilia outside of the family. The idea that there could be multi-perpetrators including family members has been much more painful for society to accept.

2. The Extent of Ritual Abuse

Several surveys have been conducted and articles have been written addressing the extent of organised ritualistic child sexual abuse in different countries: in the US, (Bottoms, Shaver & Goodman, 1996; Finkelhor, Williams, & Burns, 1888; Kelley, 1993); in the Netherlands, (Jonker & Jonker-Bakker, 1997); in Canada and Australia, (Johnson, 1992); and in the UK (Creighton, 1993).

Bottoms et al. report that within the US, the figures of alleged ritual abuse are smaller than for other kinds of abuse. Also, with both children and adults in the UK, the figures are smaller than for other kinds of abuse (Jones, 1991) and a lack of forensic evidence is commonplace (Weir & Wheatcroft, 1995). Gallagher, Hughes and Parker (1994) found that the estimated national incidence for organised abuse in England and Wales was an average of 242 cases in four years and that allegations of ritual abuse involved 21 cases a year.

After a BBC TV Channel 4 Dispatches documentary (Satanic Ritual Abuse, February 19, 1992) was broadcast, 191 calls were dealt with on the helpline set up by the Broadcasting Support Services. However, the 15 lines set up were inadequate to the task as BT recorded 4,500 attempted calls during the first hour (Snelling & Scott, 1992).

RAINS (Ritual Abuse Information and Network Support) has offered advice to over 400 professionals in the NHS (National Health Service) who have worked with these clients (200 with current cases).

In 2007, more than 2,000 persons representing at least 40 countries and 31 primary languages participated in three online surveys offered in both English and German. The first survey was for adult survivors of extreme abuse including, but not limited to, ritual abuse and mind control; the second, for professionals who work with adult survivors; and the third, for caregivers of child survivors of ritual abuse and mind control.[3][4][5]

Where the research is not clinically-based but epidemiological, the problems remain similar. In their significant research report on Organised and Ritual Child Sexual Abuse, Gallagher et al. (1994) comment that almost one half of all social service departments made no reply whatsoever to the national survey. The finding that there was a 16-fold difference between the national survey and the record search figures, which “provided impressive evidence that the national survey had underestimated the extent of organised and ritual abuse," is not surprising in these circumstances.

3. Current UK Police Support

In the UK, the Scotland Yard Research Unit on ritual abuse was disbanded in 1994 and its report on allegations of ritual abuse has not been published. However, police awareness of this subject has moved Dramatically in the last six years. Scotland Yard and the Metropolitan Police, in particular, are more experienced and aware of the problems than most mental health professionals. In the wake of the Adam case, "The Working Party on Ritual Homicide" was established in Scotland Yard in 2001. In that case, the dismembered body of a little black boy named Adam had been found in The River Thames in October 2001. He had not been sexually abused. A painstaking international piece of detective work was able to establish that the child was a victim of a muti murder from Nigeria. The specialist police team involved has proved to be a source of inspiration to survivors within the UK.

Since 2000, the Clinic for Dissociative Studies has had a named Detective Inspector to call on. This has been largely due to the thorough work of Chief Detective Inspector Clive Driscoll who is renowned for having solved a 2007 honour killing case.

In October 2004, lawyer and ritual abuse survivor Lee Moore, founder of Association of Child Abuse Lawyers (ACAL), provided a training day on ritual abuse to the Metropolitan Police. However, the police are not aided by current attitudes from some sections of the media, Members of Parliament, and mental health professionals. These negative attitudes reflect the wider difficulty of some segments of the British public to take on this subject.

4. General Child and Adult Legal Problems Concerning Abuse

"Lost in Care," the report by Waterhouse (2000), has shown that there remains a significant discrepancy between the amount of abuse alleged by children and adults in the safety of an anonymous survey and the amount formally disclosed to police. There is also a discrepancy between the amount disclosed and the amount that can be investigated further, especially when events have happened a long time in the past. Regarding abuse in general, the report states:

> One obvious difficulty is that most of the witnesses have given evidence to us about events that occurred many years ago. Thus the majority of the complainants of abuse are now in the age range of 25 to 35 years and gave evidence about events that occurred in the first half of their teens or earlier. Moreover, all but a few of them had not made any complaint of abuse before the major police investigation began in 1991. (55, 6.01) It is not widely known > that sexual abuse is one of the few crimes where the disclosure rate increases as the victim gets older (Sinason, 1994). There are many psychodynamic explanations for this, particularly the child's feeling that this has happened because they are bad, something they have been told by abusers too. Sometimes it is not possible to report such a shameful as well as painful experience until the victim is more independent and family members do not have to be involved in hearing details. Where the perpetrators or alleged perpetrators are family members, it is sometimes not safe to report until the victim has an independent home. Even then, it can evoke strong feelings of disloyalty to accuse a loved family member.

Whilst it is hard for an adult to report a crime that involves personal shame, it is even harder for vulnerable adults. The various authorities rarely provide adults with learning disabilities, mental health problems or untreated traumatic symptoms with the same protective strategies provided for children. The strict chronological move from legal childhood to adulthood cannot, of course, always take into account those who are not able to function independently. Additionally, the expectation is of a higher level of proof in adult cases as there is no equivalent of the separate court system provided for children. Unlike civil proceedings where balance of probability means that a court is considering whether the occurrence of an event was more likely than not, criminal proceedings require a higher level of proof, i. e., beyond reasonable doubt.

There are cases involving learning disabled adults with signs of abuse which have convinced medical witnesses that have reached the High Court but have not been proven. Where barristers, solicitors or judges have explained that this does not mean that the alleged victim was not telling the truth—only that there is insufficient proof of who was the perpetrator—this has been to the psychological benefit of the victim.

4a. The Role of the Child's Evidence in General UK Child Protection Procedures

La Fontaine (1994) points out that, "It is well-known that substantiating a claim of sexual abuse of a child may not be easy" (p. 21). The evidence required for a family court to initiate removal of a child in the UK is at a lower level than that required for a prosecution in a criminal court. This means that the starting point for triggering any action is frequently the child's own account and observed behaviour. Child protection procedures can be activated when the multi-disciplinary team considers there is a risk of serious immediate harm to a child. It is quite common for a family court to impose a restriction on a parent on the grounds of sexual abuse without that parent or case reaching the criminal court (British Department of Health, 1999, 5.25 p 45). In this study, considerable credence is given to the child's account and behaviour:

> Disturbed behaviour including self-harm, inappropriate sexualised behaviour, sadness, depression and a loss of self-esteem have all been linked to sexual abuse. Its adverse effects may endure into adulthood. The severity of impact on a child is believed to increase the longer the abuse continues, the more extensive the abuse, and the younger the child." (2.13, p. 7)

However, as has been stated, where the child provides a "bizarre" narrative, ordinary procedures are often dropped. The terror of the child is enacted by the network who fails to see the "ordinary" signs of trauma because of the profound impact of the "extraordinary" elements.

4b. Legal Problems Regarding Ritual Abuse and Children

The relatively new-found (since 1980) acknowledgement of the difficulty in bringing sexual offences to court often disappears when the accounts of children or adults move from alleging abuse to alleging abuse that includes a ritual context, particularly when they include organised Satanist elements. There is far less willingness here to adopt a stance that gives reasonable credence to the account of the child or adult. Perhaps this is not surprising given that, as stated above, the more bizarre or horrific the details, the harder it becomes to combine normal healthy doubt with the ability to perceive what may be a true story.

In line with many other child and adult mental health practitioners, we have experienced a social climate in which children and vulnerable adults often stop being listened to once ritual elements come into their narratives. This non-listening can also extend to the professionals who work with such patients or provide research.

Within the field of child abuse in general it is well established that only a disproportionately small number of abuse cases get to court in the first place (Bentovim & Tranter, 1994). Lee Moore found that where cases involving an alleged ritual element do succeed in court, the ritual element is often removed. Sometimes this is done at the suggestion of barristers (personal communication, 1999).

Evidence from experienced health service clinicians who have encountered cases of alleged ritual or organised abuse suggests that this kind of abuse is rarer than other kinds and that an even smaller number of cases of this kind of abuse have entered the legal process (Creighton, 1993).

Unlike the situation in Illinois (1992) where a law is on the statue books making such acts crimes, ritual abuse per se is not an offence in the UK. Having dressing-up clothes for the purpose of frightening children, giving children non-food substances to eat, putting a child in a coffin, holding a mock wedding ceremony, etc. are not in themselves crimes.

In one case that got to the British criminal court, a child was deeply distressed at the focus on his anal rape. For him, the anal rape was not the issue. He knew other children in his class who had been raped like that. What made him feel awful were the spiders he had been made to eat. But no one questioned him on that. The rape was the offence.

4c. Legal Proof of Ritual Abuse in the UK

Whilst the most serious allegation of murder during a ritual has been alleged but not proven in court in the UK, as it has in other countries, within the UK there has been proof of other offences. Murder in other contexts, of course, is reported with ease as indeed all the offences that are alleged within cult activity have—including cannibalism. We are adding this pointer because the societal response to the list of allegations is often an assumption that no such offences exist singly. Between 1982 and 1998, seven proven cases of abuse within a ritual context in the UK led to five people receiving prison sentences of 10 to 15 years and three people receiving sentences of 2.6 to 5 years (Tate, 1994). The serious offences proven were rape, buggery, wounding, false imprisonment, grievous bodily harm, aiding and abetting rape, indecent assault, and unlawful intercourse. In examining 82 child cases reported between 1987 and 1992, La Fontaine (1994) found three proven cases of abuse involving rituals.

When Satanist David Harker strangled a young woman, dismembered and ate her in 1999, the media referred to him as a "cannibal beast." When Edward Crowley (who named himself after Alistair Crowley) was jailed for killing a boy in a sacrifice, the media were keen to minimise his act by speaking of psychosis. There is a way that such acts are ironically diminished by either using madness or monsterhood as a distancing mechanism.

4d. The Legal Position of Vulnerable Adult Victims in Ritual Abuse

Whilst most definitions address the position of child victims there is little provision for adult victims, especially where the adult victim has also been made to be a perpetrator. Over the age of 16, the age of consent, an adult is assumed to have ability to consent unless they have a severe learning disability. An abused child who has had abusive relationships all their life is suddenly, in the eyes of the law, a consenting adult unless they are willing to go through the terrifying process of signing a statement.

Whilst there have been moves in the police to create Vulnerable Victim Co-ordinators to deal with witnesses or victims with mental health or learning disability problems, there is still very little proactive policing. For example, every victim with or without Dissociative Identity Disorder who has asked police officers to follow them on Halloween or other such nights have had their requests refused —even when they expressed the fear that a murder might be committed.

4e. Legal Issues for Victim-Perpetrators in Ritual Abuse

Adults who have been forced to perpetrate face the legal problem that in the UK there is no plea-bargaining. Additionally, there is no law on duress. Whilst it could be assumed that a judge would reduce a sentence in view of years of victimhood and enforced perpetration, there is no certainty. How many ritual abuse survivors, after a lifetime of despair, would be able to then face a term in prison with their name and picture all over the tabloid newspapers? This appears to be the Western equivalent of the Saudi Arabian punishment of flogging a woman who is gang-raped.

Lobbying in parliament for amnesty or plea-bargaining for victim-perpetrators is still in its infancy.

5. Satanism, Luciferianism, Paganism, Wicca, New Age, etc.

Satanism and other minority beliefs (Sinason, 1994) are not illegal or necessarily any more harmful than any other belief. Indeed on October 24th 2004, a naval officer was granted formal permission to practice as a Satanist in the British Navy.

We do not imply that practitioners of any one religion in general are committing criminal offences any more than any other group. Witchcraft, both of a healing kind and otherwise, has a long history and many branches, and we also do not imply that these activities constitute criminal offences. As with any population, only a small percentage is likely to be involved in criminal offences. We are aware that some children may be tricked by paedophiles using ritual material. However, as has been stated, where the children believe the offences were committed within a religious belief system and then become believers themselves, it is irrelevant how that belief system was originally inculcated. The crucial element, therefore, in these cases is what the child believes. In our work with children and adults we have been able to see the way the child takes in these enforced belief systems and then becomes identified with the belief as an adult.

6. The Swedish Case

In 1991 a Swedish psychologist, Anders Svensson, wrote to Valerie Sinason who was then a Consultant Psychotherapist at the Tavistock Clinic, a leading National Health Service psychotherapy training and treatment centre in London. He was concerned with the disclosures of a woman with a severe learning disability that were of a kind he had never heard before. Through the supervision, Svensson and Sinason learned more about ritual abuse, something new to both of them. When Sinason discussed the topic in the UK as an addendum to a talk on sexual abuse, she received two referrals at the Tavistock. On going to meet the first woman, a health service professional, it emerged that the woman herself was the victim. Dr. Robert Hale, a forensic psychoanalyst and psychiatrist, worked on this and on further referrals with Valerie Sinason.

7. The Tavistock and Portman Clinics Project on Ritual Abuse

As a result of the increasing number of tertiary referrals asking for consultation, assessment and treatment for children and adults alleging involvement with ritual abuse, particularly abuse within a Satanist or Luciferian context, in 1992 Dr. Valerie Sinason and Dr. Robert Hale, Director of the Portman Clinic, set up a clinical research project funded by the Department of Health. Experienced practitioners in the field of forensic work and abuse made the referrals.

Typically, both children and adults presented affective states of extreme terror, and post-traumatic problems linked with allegations of ritual abuse, largely of a Satanist kind. Following the publication of an edited book on ritual abuse (Sinason, 1994) that included chapters by significant UK clinicians including Professor Joan Bicknell, Dr. Nigel Beaill, Dr. Kingsley Norton, and Dr. Arnon Bentovim, Drs. Sinason and Hale set out to conduct a more systematic survey of referrals concerning alleged organised ritual abuse. Their initial concerns were that due to the fear engendered by the topic, National Health Service patients and their families were not receiving an adequate service (Weir & Wheatcroft, 1995). Health service professionals and the media (Scott, 1992) were embroiled in religious discussions of belief and disbelief in which the patients were left without adequate treatment. They also found it significant that despite international and national proof of some of the allegations, there was such consistent disavowal.

With the complex legal and financial issues of secondary traumatisation of inadequately trained professionals in the press, there were also local authority concerns that workers in these cases who do not receive support might seek financial redress.

8. Clinical Conclusions from the Department of Health-funded Pilot Study Patients alleging this abuse formed a significant and discreet clinical group. There was no mental illness established that could account for their narratives of abuse. Fundamentalist religious belief was not a significant issue in our sample. In three of the total sample, there was involvement in fundamentalist religion. In two of these cases this was in seeking help after previously alleged Satanist abuse. Both patients were ambivalent about their involvement but stated that these religious organisations had been the only ones to believe their testimony and offer them support. In the third case the organised abuse took place in the context of the religious organisation.

Recovered memory was also not a significant issue in the project. In every case the original allegation of ritual abuse had already been established before the patient was involved in the project. We do not currently have permission to give further information than these bullet-points.

9. Founding of the Clinic 1998

Once the project was completed, the Tavistock and Portman Clinics did not choose to continue the work. Work with victim-perpetrators evokes many complex issues. However, Dr. Robert Hale gained the support of the Trust to refer the remaining patients to Valerie Sinason, who set up an Independent National Health Service Provider Clinic to specialise in these subjects.

On referral, multidisciplinary assessments are provided by a consultant psychologist/psychoanalyst Dr. Phil Mollon and a consultant psychiatrist/psychoanalyst, Dr. Arnon Bentovim. Professor Howard Steele provides attachment interviews, Professor John Morton conducts memory research and Brett Kahr, Chair of the Society for Couples' Relationships, advises on work with partners. With Nancy Dunlop as Clinic Manager, Consultant Psychotherapists include Adah Sachs and Graeme Galton. David Leevers is the Social Systems Consultant who liaises with Police. A range of other specialist therapists work with the Clinic including Rachel Wingfield, Chair of the Centre for Attachment-Based Psychoanalytic Psychotherapy, and Elizabeth Lloyd who also works for the leading charity RESPOND, for clients with a learning disability.

Many of the ritual abuse victims we meet have developed Dissociative Identity Disorder. As there could be an iatrogenic exacerbation of dissociative identity disorder, we take as much care as possible with the interviews.

We convene a monthly Continuing Professional Development Study Group on psychoanalytic thinking, ritual abuse and dissociation and a fortnightly supervision group.

The Clinic has links with RAINS (Ritual Abuse Information and Network Support), LASAR (League against Sadistic Abuse), RESPOND, the pioneering charity working with learning disability and abuse, ESTD, the European Society for Scientific Study of Dissociation, TAG (Trauma and Abuse Group) and the key survivors' organisations.

We are involved in parliamentary lobbying, teaching and training, and provide individual, couples and family psychotherapy. Although we work basically from a psychodynamic point of view, we bring in a range of complementary treatments according to clients' needs. We have involved art and music therapists, body therapists, cranial osteopathy, reflexology, and bibliotherapy according to the wishes and needs of different clients.

10. Current Impact of This Work Professionally

The initial impact of this work on professionals can be severe and even experienced forensic health service psychotherapists are more powerfully affected by the narratives and emotional interactions of these patients as compared with other vulnerable groups (Hale & Sinason, 1994). Obviously, working with any severe physical or psychological trauma has a profound impact on the professional (Hale, 1997).

However, the nature of ritual abuse is different as Youngson (1994) and the NSPCC (Creighton, 1993) have pointed out. As Kelley comments, "Professionals also need to monitor carefully their own stress reactions to dealing with such horrific allegations of abuse. Even when not directly threatened, professionals involved in cases of ritualistic abuse tend to become fearful for their own safety" (1993, p. 45).

Mike Hames (2000), former head of the Obscene Publications squad, says that "the tensions of the 'belief, non-belief' issue, combined with the strains of interviewing the victims and listening to their stories, often led to sickness and severely low morale" (p. 174). As well as the affecting power of the abuse narratives, which have more in common with concentration camp scenarios than other forms of abuse, the extra attacks by some elements of the media involved in taking on such cases is notable. For example, it has been argued that clinicians are influenced by their primary responsibility to help patients and thus are over-credulous, over-zealous and irresponsible and plant memories (Victor 1993). Ofshe (1993) contends that the actions of a clinician in simply dealing with several cases of ritualistic or satanic abuse is "prima facie evidence of malpractice."

Whereas most professionals concur that expertise is built up by seeing several cases of a similar kind and being able to draw conclusions from that, we enter a very different attitude with this work. Even though a hospital or individual clinician with a body of other similar cases is seen as a specialist, there is a dynamic process whereby those who treat ritually abused patients are seen by researchers such as

Ofshe as “guilty.” This same condemnation is not applied to those who have specialised in demonstrating the non-existence of ritual abuse. Critics do not appear to see a reciprocal problem in their own build-up of experience. However, such a tacitly allowed denigration of professional clinical experience inhibits disclosures even more.

Clinicians with psychoanalytically informed understanding perceive such polarisation as part of the familiar dynamic processes of professional scapegoating, abuse by proxy of the child, reversal or the urge to shoot the messenger.

This process extends to solicitors and barristers who remove ritual abuse allegations from disclosures of abuse to make them less disturbing and therefore more acceptable to a jury (personal communication, Lee Moore, 2000). It also applies to well-meaning psychotherapists, social workers and psychiatrists removing such mention from files in case they cause confusion. In 1991, Social Work Today reported that some ritual elements had been alleged in 34 cases in which the Official Solicitor was then involved (p. 888).

11. Media Responses

Working with trauma is difficult. Working with trauma in an environment or society that is unwilling to recognise it proves more difficult. The relatively small numbers of members in the British False Memory Society have been given disproportionate media space for their views (Sinason, 1998). Practitioners in this field can also expect negative coverage in the False Memory Society Newsletter and at related websites. Psychotherapists who are used to the privacy of the consulting room find this particularly hard.

Not surprisingly, there is a split attitude in the media over the reality of ritual abuse with both a sensational approach to the narratives and a discrediting process to both the victim and professional involved. Quality newspapers can hold both positive and negative news items, often in the same edition. Sometimes a tabloid newspaper provides a detailed expose that is absolutely correct but is not believed in wider society because it is reported within a tabloid. The usually libertarian satirical newspaper “Private Eye” needs to be mentioned here for running anonymous attacks on this reality of this subject in 2008.

11a. May 33rd: A First British Play on DID by Guy Hibbert

A unique event in the media was the BBC TV showing of Guy Hibbert’s play *May 33*rd. Hibbert followed the painful journey of a young woman with DID. He interviewed clients from the Clinic for Dissociative Studies as well as other survivors and professionals. His play was non-exploitative, profoundly moving and won a media Mental Health award. Newspaper coverage was unanimously positive. Here the benefits of liaising with those who can bring an unbearable subject into full media attention were profound. Similarly, books by the American teacher/novelist Torrey Haydon, which include narratives about ritual abuse, have been best-sellers.

Conclusion

At the beginning of the 21st century, ritual abuse remains largely hidden in the UK with moments of breakthrough following successful police prosecutions or political lobbying. Mind control and military-inspired mind control are even further from public and professional consciousness. However, the disturbance caused by CIA's admission of water-boarding and the events of Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib have allowed further thinking regarding these issues (Sinason, in press).

Ritual abuse as a whole remains seen as a strange import and there is great resistance to seeing it also as white, middle-class and home-grown. The positive sides of internet-international co-operation, such as occurred with the publication of this book, can help to reduce resistance and increase professional co-operation. However, it looks like a long hard road.

CHAPTER 15

A Therapeutic Relationship: Shifting Boundaries in the Service of Healing

Lorna Joan Brown

Introduction

I was so moved by the story that enfolded as Dibs and I worked together that I wanted to pay tribute to her for surviving and for persevering in therapy over eight years. I also knew that shifting of certain therapeutic boundaries is frowned upon and yet in this instance the client seemed to be helped as a result. I then thought that this knowledge might be useful to other therapists and clients and so decided to write up our experience in a PhD dissertation.

The Research Design

A qualitative research approach was adopted to conduct the research because the main goal of the study was to explore the therapeutic relationship with one client with specific reference to shifting boundaries within and around this relationship. This included looking for changes that occurred in the perceptions, beliefs, behaviour and understanding in the bio-psycho-social-spiritual contexts of our therapy and research relationships of the client and myself.

The increased validity given to qualitative research made it possible to conduct the research in a meaningful way. The post modern research paradigm that rejects the search for ultimate truth and favours instead the co-existence of a multiplicity and variety of situation dependent ways of viewing phenomena sometimes called pluralism informed this study. It was then fitting that certain concepts from systems, constructivism and constructionist theories were included.

Different methods of constructing the research were used. Although elements of narrative enquiry and grounded theory were used to construct this naturalistic study, grounded theory was the dominant methodological approach that informed the gathering and the processing of data within this case study.

Certain themes emerged over time and these were present in and reflected in all the systems researched in this study. The various systems included Dibs family of origin, the therapeutic system, The System, the supervisory system and the academic system as well other systems in which I was involved such as the Systems group with colleagues. The themes were; control, strong negative feelings, abuse, shifting boundaries, time—past, present and future—and multiple voices.

The Story

The fifteenth of August 1994 dawned much like any other day. Later on that day Dibs and I met for our first appointment. The name Dibs was chosen when I began to write about the story of our work because it was important to her that her identity be protected. I chose the name because our work reminded me of Dibs in Virginia Axline's book "In Search of Self." Our work also seemed to be about a search for "self."

Had either of us thought about it on that first day, we would probably have considered that we would meet for a few times, deal with the issues and then part. Neither of us could possibly have had an inkling of the horrors that were to emerge or the experiences of terror and at times joy that we would share over the next eight years.

As mentioned previously I was filled with admiration that Dibs had survived the torture and very severe abuse in the first ten years of her life; that she did eventually ask for help; managed to work really hard in between sessions; remain in the relationship and continue working despite the pain. She agreed to the recording of the research but at times this became a source of enormous conflict and remains an issue for her. I had said that I would give all material to her before I submitted it but when this became very time consuming and emotionally draining I handed work in before she saw it. I regretted this afterwards and when we did manage to struggle through what information was included and in what words, the encounters were very meaningful. I had really wanted her to be happy about the thesis but we eventually agreed reluctantly that she would remain unhappy about some of what was included and I would remain unhappy that she was not happy. She feels that what has been written contravenes our original agreement and she remains unhappy and concedes that her agreement remains reluctant.

In the early years when bizarre occurrences became the order of the day and I shifted some previously firmly held therapeutic boundaries, my colleagues and family members were disbelieving, disapproving and afraid for me and themselves. The boundary shift in the beginning stage was about my availability to receive telephone calls. This proved an irritation to colleagues and family:

> In therapy, with a therapist who is prepared to accept that there could be truth in what is being told, a 'satanically' abused patient can gradually recover from the nightmare of those memories from which there had seemed to be no escape except perhaps into insanity. But to enable this kind of patient to recover, the therapist has to take risks with his or her own more usual sense of sanity—and often without the security of having colleagues prepared to understand the nature of this work or prepared to support it. (Sinason, 1994, p. 25)

Over time I realized that intimidation and terror tactics are used by abusive systems to control and that I was not in danger. I thought that it might then be useful to share my experiences which might be of benefit to others who encounter satanic or other cult-like systems in their work.

At the very first session issues around control emerged and Dibs was startled by my question about when in her past she had felt out of control. She spoke about having been severely controlled by others physically, emotionally and spiritually. My memory is that I then asked her whether she had been abused as a child but she recalls that I made a statement. She often referred to having had her boundaries crashed in those early years.

The conversations in the first year were largely about sexual abuse. She had remembered some incidents but as we talked she remembered many more. It was only in the third year that satanic and cult connections began to be made. This was just prior to her 42nd birthday (6X6+6) and her biological father's 66th birthday which was on the 6th of a particular month (6+6+6). The family had held very high hopes for Dibs. At an early age it became clear that she had psychic abilities and this is prized in cult circles. She was also the first born of her father who headed a cult system and she was earmarked to take over as High Priestess from him. Much of the early torture and abuse was to prepare her for this position.

The focus of therapy at this stage was on listening and supporting Dibs as new and ugly memories emerged. It also included facilitating shifts in her thinking from, "I am dirty" to "Dirty things were done to me." Of immense help to her was also the realization that the emerging memories, although filled with horror, were in fact memories of events she had survived and not current happenings.

When her father made attempts to get her to return to the cult, he sent her gifts and suggested that she travel to the city where he lived so that she could listen to what he had to say and if she wanted to, she would be free to leave. At first she was tempted to go but decided against it. This then led to more menacing approaches, harassment and threats. Eventually on the advice of an adoptive family member she approached an individual in his private capacity to protect her against the people who were intimidating her. What was not known at that stage was that the man hired to protect her did some freelance work, but he also worked for a much larger and very powerful system. In this way Dibs unknowingly became a client of this system (The System).

The System was very good at protecting her physically and on several occasions foiled attempts to abduct or kidnap her. However, what emerged over time was that this system had been involved with at least one other client who had fallen under the influence of the same cult or family. At that stage The System had in their possession half a formula from this client. In their investigations about Dibs, they discovered that she had the other half of the formula deeply buried in her unconscious.

The System put pressure on her to reveal the formula. The members protecting her became more and more intrusive and she was watched 24 hours a day. She became increasingly isolated as visits to or from friends or colleagues were discouraged and at times forbidden and she was often taken to various places of safety. Attempts to separate her from me were also made. Fortunately a senior psychologist in The System insisted that she remain with me.

On the third anniversary of our first meeting I shifted a previously firmly held therapeutic boundary and agreed to go out with her for a meal. By that time she was facing up to horrific emerging memories and having to search deeply within herself which was very exposing. It gradually felt more and more unequal for me to maintain the boundaries around self disclosure and having some social contact.

It came as a surprise to me that she was not really interested in personal details. What she needed to know was more about my belief system and resources and perhaps unconsciously she needed to know that I could survive both the horrors of her past as well as what was happening in the present.

The pressure from The System was relentless and they were impatient to get the formula to serve their own ends. Dibs and I worked together using dreams that she was having at the time and the bits and pieces of information that we had and some progress was slowly being made.

Under the guise of needing additional protection she was taken out of town where she was put under enormous pressure by being allowed only very restricted access to me and being pressurized to submit to other professionals to be hypnotized. When she refused, her medication was tampered with and she became more and more disorientated. Later when a tampered capsule was analyzed, it was discovered that a banned substance had been inserted. This causes compliance and takes a long time to work its way out of the system. Eventually the same psychologist mentioned previously became very distressed when he found her in the disorientated state and insisted that she be taken home immediately. I took her to a hypno-therapist on her return, and we managed to recover the formula which was then given to The System.

The formula led directly to other information about international criminal activities and exposed some of those involved. It is known that various court cases followed and some of the perpetrators served terms in prison. After each of these intrusive incidents by The System, it understandably took many sessions to enable her to recover and before we could again do any internal work.

Another boundary shift began to occur in the latter half of the third year. We discovered that when we were together The System was less intrusive and demanding. Our work for different organizations took us out of town and at first we coincidentally ended up in the same town at the same time. Later we organized this deliberately and then stayed in the same hotel or bed and breakfast. I then also experienced first hand the intrusiveness and harsh treatment especially by some of the helping professionals in The System.

As we spent more time together in situations other than therapeutic, I was able to observe and experience her very differently from the usual limitations in therapy. At one time whenever we watched a TV programme “Days of Our Lives” she would fall asleep within seconds, make distressing whimpering sounds and then talk in her sleep. Much later we discovered that the hourglass used in the beginning of the programme was a trigger for her to sleep. What she said in her sleep often became an aid to remember certain incidents from the past. When she had disturbing dreams in the months that followed, we also used a tape recorder to record what she said in her sleep. Again these recordings proved invaluable in the therapeutic work that followed. Listening to what she said, or to the tapes, was extremely difficult and painful for me because the dialogue was usually between her and her mother and often in the plaintive and pleading voice of a small child begging that something not happen. Sinason (1994) confirms that, “most of the procedure regarding indoctrination of children is carried out at home, much of it by their mothers” (p. 243).

Dibs was subjected to many known methods of torture and abuse. To mention only a few—she was sexually, physically, emotionally and spiritually abused in various violent ways. She was locked in cupboards, cages and small dark places. She was deprived of food and at other times, force-fed. She was given drugs, tortured with electrical devices, given gas and hypnotized to make her compliant. Various forms of brainwashing and mind control were applied in order to control her and programme her to carry out instructions at some future date. Some had to do with getting her to talk to “the invisible people” and bring back messages for the group. These often had to do with businesses and making money. Her perpetrators believed they owned her and told her repeatedly that they did and that she was being prepared for some high office in the group at a future date. Coleman (1994) in a chapter titled “Satanic Cult Practices” describes in detail what happens to children born into these circles. This confirms what has been written above.

Dibs was desperate for love and to be held by her mother which was denied her. In later years she could not understand this need that persisted despite the continual abuse. This process is aptly described by Herman (1997):

> Even more than adults, children who develop in this climate of domination develop pathological attachments to those who abuse and neglect them, > attachments that they will strive to maintain even at the sacrifice of their own welfare, their own reality, or their lives. (p. 98)

The training for Dibs to take up office in satanic circles at a later stage intensified particularly during a period of about five months stretching over Christmas, the New Year, her birthday and various satanic celebratory dates up to and including Easter. She remembers feeling confused when others seemed to expect her to know things that she in fact did not know. It is not clear if there was an expectation that she should know because she was psychic or for some other reason but she often pretended that she knew to avoid punishment and further abuse.

There was a culmination of horrific events involving Dibs, both in terms of what cult members did to her and what was required of her to do for them when she was ten. It is likely that she was reaching some kind of limit or ultimate boundary in terms of her level of tolerance. She became withdrawn at first and then became violent, destroying the contents of a room. This infuriated the man whom she only later came to know as her father, who no doubt felt helpless. He became so violent with her that he injured her very severely and she had to be hospitalized.

Dibs sustained severe head injuries that required surgery. The surgery was delayed so that her condition could be stabilised. Her jaw was also broken. Later plastic surgery was done to lift the skin on her forehead so that the scar is now just above her hairline.

Dibs was warned not to tell what had happened but to say that she had fallen. Children who were abused by the cult members were told that the perpetrators would know if they broke the silence. Coleman (1994) writes about the experience of survivors in this context:

> Survivors tell how as children, they were taught that spiders and insects were Satan’s agents, who were watching them and reporting back to him. Some say they were forced to swallow eyeballs ‘so they could be watched from inside.’ (p. 249)

The hospital personnel could see the signs of the abuse that had been particularly intense for the five months preceding the assault. While Dibs was in the hospital recovering from the operation on her damaged skull, her mother threatened her. A nurse witnessed this episode and this led to further access in the hospital being denied the mother. She was later permanently removed from her biological parents and adopted. All access to her biological parents was denied. Her worst fear of losing her mother was thus realized. Her mother had always threatened that she would go away and now Dibs was faced with this reality. As is common in these situations she blamed herself. She had been told often enough that things happened to her because of what she had done or not done. She had been threatened frequently that her mother would leave her for the same reasons.

When Dibs was being taken to the hospital after her injury she had been told to say that she had fallen. Although she had not divulged any facts about what had happened her mother accused her of doing so. The inner conflict, self-blame and loss was too great for her and she found it easier to disappear into a world of her own where she remained for a year in another hospital.

Eventually Dibs re-emerged into consciousness and was returned to her adoptive family who never spoke about the past and all evidence of her mother was removed. There is little doubt that the adoptive family did the very best that they knew how at the time and believed that to be the best for the child. She returned to school and was admitted into the same standard she would have been in, had she not missed a year of schooling. It is not surprising that she felt then that she was stupid and slow and always behind her peers in her school work.

At the age of fifteen, an older man courted Dibs. Both at this stage used various mood enhancing drugs. She fell pregnant and they married when she was sixteen and a few months later she became a mother. Much later it was realized that this man had been sent by her biological family to woo and marry her as a way of getting her back into the cult. The marriage was conflictual from the beginning and ended in divorce. After we had been working together for some time, it was also discovered that during the early marriage when she experienced severe abdominal pains and was admitted for a medical procedure, a device was inserted into her uterus that was both a sender and a receiver. It would seem that it was used both to track her whereabouts and to send various signals that affected her behaviour. On one occasion the sounds emitted from this device were clearly audible to me. It made a bleeping noise similar to that made by a cell phone when a message has been recorded or the sound made by a bleeper. She was so disconcerted by this that she had herself X-rayed. The device was clearly visible in her uterus and was then removed under anesthetic by a gynecologist.

The birth of her child had a profound effect on Dibs. She realized almost immediately that this little being was dependent on her. She had been able to withstand taking drugs while pregnant and did return to that lifestyle after the birth. She was soon aware though, that she was subjecting the young baby to some of what she had experienced in terms of her mother not being there for her. She decided to make some changes and give her child a different experience.

Very, very slowly she picked herself up from the world of drugs, improved her education, obtained qualifications and found a good job. She has remained clear of drugs for many years now, holds a position of authority and leadership at work and has been a good parent. Her child is now a successful, highly qualified young person in stable employment.

During the years when we were constantly terrorized by The System the therapy focused mainly on managing the day to day harassment but the internal work continued simultaneously. Dibs struggled during this time with the issue of who she is. Eventually she wrote a moving poem about her conclusions.

You came into being—a small insignificant egg.
At first you were not noticed…
When they tried to do away with you,
You clung to your leaf—not to be denied your life.

You emerged a tiny squirming worm.
Wriggling and vulnerable.
You should have been cared for—loved.
They never saw your worth…
You were abandoned.

Then came the black creatures…
They tried to feed on you—take your life.
You crawled under the leaves.
So hard to grow there,
But at least you were alive,
Even there, the creatures sometimes saw you—
Tried to feed on you…
They made you bleed.
But you were alive—
Scarred and scared…
Barely alive.
Because of the blood,
You were shunned by the others.
Being afraid, feeling pain,
Fighting to survive–became too much.

You gathered the last of your strength—
Found deep inside.
You spun the cocoon around yourself.
You were protected—
You could no longer be preyed upon—
You could no longer feel the pain.
You were alone.
It was dark and you were alone.
And quietly in the darkness…
You forgot feelings,
You learnt to deny your being,
It was the only way for you to live—
The only way to survive.
Alone.

It was dark and you were alone,
For an unmeasureable time.
Then suddenly—you FELT something…
What was it?
At first the feeling upset and confused you…
It was the warmth of the little ray of sunshine.
You didn't know what to do with the feeling.
But the little ray of sunshine—
Just continued to shine.

You began to understand,
It was time…
Time to leave your cocoon.
Very slowly you crawled out,
You were bewildered.
So much had changed…
Within you.
It all felt so different—yet the same being.
You discovered more to yourself,
Parts of you—
Yet foreign to you.
Like two great sections
Growing out of your back,
Weighing you down—
Needing to learn how to work.
But they were crinkled up and wet.
They were not able to work.

You knew what to do…
Hang upside down from your leaf—
So very, very frightening
And uncomfortable. But necessary—
So that the 'new' parts could unfold.
To warm and dry these parts,
You needed the little ray of sunshine…
And it was there.

You began to wonder
If this was the only way through?
Was it really necessary
To endure this process?
Would these parts ever dry—
Or unfold and actually work?
After all, you'd never believed
You would ever emerge from your cocoon,
Why then would you need any new parts?
You didn't deserve to have any.
You should just be grateful to be alive—
More was never for you,
Or was it?

The dreadful little ray of sunshine
Seemed so convinced
You were doing just the right thing,
It just continued to shine…
And shine and shine!!!!

And so you hung in there
With all you had—
You let each crinkle
Begin to painfully unfold.
Sometimes the discomfort of Hanging upside down disoriented—
Confused you.
At times the pain of unfolding—
Seemed unbearable.
Sometimes you'd even
Try to crawl back,
Back into your cocoon—
Only to find
This had now become impossible.
You had fitted in there
So snugly before—
But now
Your growth
Had made it impossible
To go back.
There was nothing else to do
But to continue
To hang upside down—
And let yourself unfold.

You opened your eyes.
What was all that colour?
Splashes and streaks
Of blue, violet,
Pink, yellow and red.
Your wings!!
Your wings!!

You stared at yourself

In disbelief.
You are no longer a worm—
But a beautiful butterfly—
Still discovering the colours of your wings.
But nevertheless
A unique butterfly
With wings to fly…
High, high
Into the sky—
Alongside my precious
Little ray of sunshine.

And just who do you think you are?
The sound of the black creatures
Echoed through your being
From way back under the leaves
Under the leaves
Where you once were
Now you are out
Above the leaves
And they
They are back there
Trapped under the leaves
And I'm glad
So glad
I wonder if it's wrong
To be so glad
That they are trapped
Trapped under the leaves
I hope it's dark there
So dark
Who do you think you are?
The voices echo again…
I'm tired
So tired
And the ray of sunshine
Shines
And in that light
Again I see the colours

What is it?
My wings! My wings!
They are the parts that once
Grew so painfully
From out of me
Parts I didn't know I had
And with these wings
I want to fly
High into the sky
I tried
The wings would do nothing
Two parts of me
Side by side
Full of colours
Yes—beautiful
Yet they would do nothing
I looked at one part
So colourful
And perfectly formed
I looked at the other
It too—colourful and perfectly formed
Two parts
Of me
Separate
One from the other
And somehow
With me
In the middle
I could not fly
Why?
What was the secret?
Bring the two parts together
Whispered the little ray of sunshine
But it is so painful
It all feels so stiff
So unknown
Try…
She whispered
Bringing the two together…

It was the hardest thing I'd ever done
Harder than
Bleeding under the leaves
Harder than
Being in the cocoon
Harder than squeezing out of the cocoon
Harder than
Hanging upside down
Harder than letting my wings unfold
Bringing the two together was the hardest thing I'd done
Holding them together was worse
But as I continued
To work at it…
Bringing them together
Holding them together
Letting the effort go
Bringing them together
Letting it all go
Bringing the parts together
Holding them together
Letting the past go
I'm flying…
Sometimes there's wind
And rain
And it's hard to fly
But I know I can
And sometimes
The ray of sunshine
Goes away a while
But she always comes back
Even when gone
I know she's around
Not far away
And I can fly
I don't have to try
So hard anymore
The parts come together
More naturally now
I never knew about those parts

So colourful
I kept them
Tucked away—hidden
And all the time
They were my wings.
Sometimes
Shadows fall
And the ray of sunshine
Shines
Shadows fall
And the ray of sunshine
Shines
So I don't forget my colours
The parts I've found,
The parts that grew
No more can I deny
There's so much more to me
It's true
I have to say I grew
And grew
And now I fly
I fly, I fly.

This is Dangerous Work

The fifth year of therapy was characterised by further attempts by The System to intrude into Dibs' life and a gradual increase in her confidence to resist such intrusions.

In the early months of the year several new "protectors" came into Dibs' life and various devious methods were used to try and win her over. One man tried to engage her into co-operating with them by dressing as a clown and appealing to the part of her that enjoyed having fun. He was working with another man and a female social worker and they said that a study was being done about people who had been in protective custody. Their interest in Dibs was to get material for this study. Persons from The System also approached her about her psychic abilities and made her an offer of employment in The System. At first this intimidated her but later she learned to say no directly and also wrote numerous letters to them to this effect but they were ignored.

When Dibs' psychic ability was first mentioned by The System she denied vehemently to them that she had any such abilities. On one occasion we went to a local bookshop to read up on this phenomenon and were told later by a man from The System that we had been followed and observed as we consulted various books. Our conversation had also been listened to. At that time our telephones were monitored more or less permanently and at times it was very difficult to talk because of the persistent echoes and clicks on the telephone line. These unwanted intrusions across our personal, social and work boundaries were an invasion of our privacy and our right to move about without being observed. The right to human dignity, freedom, security of person and privacy, as laid down in the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa (1996) may be challenged in a court of law when violated. Knowing this also increased Dibs' confidence to say no.

What also became evident during this period was that there were two divisions in The System and that people from the section who were harassing Dibs were in disagreement with the other division. There were ambivalence and tension within The System itself. A bizarre situation arose where employees from one division protected her from their colleagues in another division. However, the harassment was persistent, cruel and invasive and no matter what she did to protest, it seemed to make no difference.

The work has required immense courage on behalf of Dibs, my promoter and myself, as attested to by at least one other therapist who chose to remain anonymous for safety reasons (Ryder, 1996). The context in which we found ourselves was and probably continues to be potentially dangerous but I have also learned through personal experience that a small group of committed people can make a difference when they are not intimidated by the danger. The lack of safety relates to cult-like and other abusive systems often being involved in local and in certain instances international criminal activities involving the use of violence. When there is danger that these activities, individuals or systems will be exposed, the survivor and the therapist are potentially in danger of being harmed. There is also reluctance by perpetrators in these systems to let go of victims who have been programmed to act as puppets that jump at the pull of a string.

Abusers often harass survivors for years after they begin to break free from the fetters that bound them. Rutz (2001) writes that she wished that she could say that she had been free from all contact with her former programmers and handlers since she began to heal but she cannot. She was 16 when she managed to break free from the abuse but twenty-six years later there was still contact from the abusers. By 2001 she was able to state that she was no longer being contacted. Dibs was removed from her abusers at age ten and 32 years later attempts were still being made to get her to return to the cult-like system. She even had to endure an attempted kidnap that was foiled by The System.

The System however, was also a danger to Dibs. They used the same underhand and at times violent methods to protect Dibs as the abusive system had used to abuse her. Later it emerged that they had been involved in some way with the abusers in the past and there was obviously a great need to protect this information. It was only when Dibs managed to feel confident enough to look outside the abusive systems and turn to The Commission that the abuse and harassment from The System subsided.

In times of danger, shifting therapeutic boundaries seemed to help. For example, in contrast to the allegation that telephonic contact between sessions may promote dependence, the experience of calls in this therapeutic context seemed to have had the opposite effect. Often when Dibs called she was feeling overwhelmed and panicky. After a brief conversation she felt sufficiently strengthened and empowered to continue on her own. Over time this led her to feeling more confident about herself and she learnt techniques, such as self-talk, that enabled her to resolve certain crises herself, with the result that the calls became less frequent.

Body Memories

At the time that we were working on retrieving the information so sought after by her family-of-origin and The System, body memories began to appear. At times these emerged prior to a visual memory and at other times afterwards. They were worrying and not easily understood by Dibs, her medical doctor, or me.

At one time her iron levels dropped dangerously low and she developed infections for which no reasonable medical explanation could be found. The infections were common in children who played in close proximity to the ground and are not usually found in adults. At another time Dibs had a sore throat that developed into a chest infection. What baffled her doctor was that her throat revealed signs of having been burnt by gas or some chemical substance. The memory associated with this, which emerged later, was of a substance, possibly sulphuric acid used as an aid to induce a trance-like state in her during a ritual in which she had been forced to participate. She also suffered persistently from anemia at times although there was no obvious cause. Once the memory surfaced the body symptoms usually abated.

Memories of this nature are often questioned with regard to their accuracy. Fonagay and Target (1997) cite several researchers regarding the controversy around the accuracy of traumatic memories. Some researchers maintain that there is much evidence to suggest that details of autobiographical memory are distorted.

However, others state that early memories of traumatic events are likely to be broadly accurate, even with regard to the third, fourth, and fifth year of life.

The phenomenon of body memories is well documented by Van der Kolk, McFarlane and Weisaeth (1996). They also mention that trauma effects development and the ability to learn.

Dibs struggled with learning to read as a child and even today she reads slowly. She has also spoken about feeling limited in terms of language, having a limited vocabulary and often feeling that she did not know what she was supposed to or expected to know. Often this resulted in severe punishment by the perpetrators. As a result she pretended to know.

In the telling and re-telling of her story, Dibs no longer attributes her language difficulties to being stupid. She recognises that she is an intelligent and creative person and that a more likely explanation for this specific early learning problem could be her sporadic school attendance and extreme emotional stress brought about by prolonged subjection to intense and severe abuse by her family-of-origin and other perpetrators. She has gradually become more confident about herself and has learnt to ask or look up the meanings of words and so increase her vocabulary and other language skills.

Two very frightening body memories almost resulted in surgery. The one was a growth in Dibs' throat and the other a shadow on her brain, both diagnosed by medical specialists. The growth disappeared after we had worked with various metaphors about "the lump in the throat" such as what she needed to cry about, or what the lump was making difficult to talk about. It is my belief that physical symptoms are often metaphorical reflections of suppressed emotions or memories that are, as yet, too painful to know about.

The shadow on Dibs' brain was accompanied by a symptom of falling. It was as if from time to time her knees would just collapse and she would fall over. The "key" to this symptom was that she had been told to say that she had "fallen" when she was admitted to hospital after the incident described previously when she had been severely injured by her biological father. Once this surfaced the shadow disappeared, as did the falling.

The way we worked together on finding the "key" was to talk over and over again about what the symptoms might mean in relation to past experiences. Attempts were made to make connections between the present symptoms and the past. Dibs increasingly used the safety of the therapeutic relationship where she had the freedom and control to explore at her own pace, and permit previously suppressed memories to emerge and be expressed consciously. This was in stark contrast to the past when she was controlled by force and fear and was unable to express her own experiences or feelings openly.

Mind Control

Very shortly after feeling stable for the first time in her life some new and disturbing symptoms emerged. Dibs described them as flashbacks and yet said they were different from past experiences. Flashing lights as in changing traffic lights or various colours flashing on a computer screen would trigger the flashbacks.

This led to new and terrifying discoveries. As time went by Dibs was assaulted with new discoveries about her past and what was done to her. In sessions we spent time talking about the flashbacks and recurrent dreams that she was having at that time. The dreams usually included her mother in a smallish room. As she talked in the session she would become aware of vague images at times and at other times a memory of a man or several people being in the room. Then she started remembering their names. These names were at that stage not known to either of us. The first name that came to her was “Cameron.” Later we established that a man called Ewen Cameron was one of the men used in North America to perform Mind Control experiments on children in the 1950s and early 1960s.

According to Rutz (2001), Mind Control experimentation was done in America from 1953. Much has since been written about what was done to victims under the CIA controlled MKULTRA, Bluebird and Artichoke programmes (Rutz, 2001; Ryder, 1996; Taylor, 1999). “‘Mind Control’ is a rather vague and nebulous term to label methods of extreme coercion that result in an individual’s involuntary, robotic compliance” (Taylor, 1999, p. vi). Dibs’ biological parents and more recently a sub system of The System, we suspect were both involved in the perpetration of this form of abuse.

Mind Control experimentation included the use of sensory deprivation and the use of electrical shock techniques. “Other methods used to alter brainwave states include, but are not limited to, rapidly flashing lights, drugs, phased sound waves, negative ions (electromagnetic energy fields), electroshock, alterations in gravity in the cerebellum (spinning), microwave emitters, and lasers” (Taylor, 1999, p. xxi). Mind Control is a shattering experience for the victim who frequently feels fragmented and confused by such external manipulation and control. Perpetrators of Mind Control use the natural and healthy ability of all individuals to dissociate or split mental functions under certain conditions, to serve their own diabolical purposes. This is a gross violation on multiple levels and spheres of one’s bio-psycho-social-spiritual make-up.

Mind Control is the ultimate form of control and intrusion. The methods of torture and abuse that are used as well as the introduction of cue words serve the purpose of later exercising almost complete control over the victims who then act as robots in the service of their perpetrators.

As our work continued strange words would come into Dibs' mind. They seemed to have no meaning or link in her memory. When I put the words into the computer the search engines shot across the screen as they found the links. Some of these were Aegis Psi War, M.J.12, Milkweed and Annunaki. A memory also surfaced in which the dates 21–23 March 1965 emerged. She knew that it had to do with a conference about Apartheid that took place in America. It took some time to find a reference that matched this but I did find a record of a "National Conference on the South African Crisis and American Action, Washington DC 21–23 March 1965 organised by the American Commission on Africa. Resolutions A/AC 115/l.122." It may be significant that Sharpeville Day is 21st March. Most of the above was linked in one way or another to MKULTRA or similar Mind Control programmes.

Apart from recalling the name Cameron as stated above, other names recalled were Gruenbaum, Gottlieb, JJ, Drs Black, Green and White and Estabrooks. Later Joseph Mengele also surfaced. These are all well-known perpetrators of Mind Control (Rutz, 2001; Ryder, 1996; Taylor, 1999). When I was reading to Dibs from a relevant book and read the name Orne, she immediately said Martin, which is his first name.

When Dibs first spoke about JJ, I e-mailed a contact in America who replied immediately that this man's name was James Jesus Angleton who was Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and White House connected and known in connection with Wizard of Oz programming (Schnellar, personal communication, June 7, 2001). Rutz (2001) said of JJ Angleton that he worked for the Document Disposal Unit that laundered CIA money to use for their projects. Reference is also made that Angleton and others sabotaged the CIA filing system to protect State Department Nazis.

This is Difficult Work

Therapists working with people who were subjected to Mind Control experimentation should bear in mind the torture and extreme trauma these people have experienced:

> Working with people who have been traumatised confronts therapists as well as patients with intense emotional experiences it forces then to explore the darkest corners of the mind, and to face the entire spectrum of human glory and degradation. Sooner or later, those experiences have the potential to overwhelm therapists. The repeated exposure to their own vulnerability becomes too intense, the display of the infinite human capacity for cruelty too unbearable, > the enactment of the trauma within the therapeutic relationship too terrifying. (Turner, McFarlane & Van der Kolk, 1996, p. 552) Within the therapeutic relationship the therapist needs to become a symbol of predictability and safety, as well as a person in whose presence ambivalence and control can be worked through. Idealisation is a necessary component as well as a space and place to explore disappointment, autonomy, and disagreement.

The ability of both therapists and patients to endure ambivalence is also important. When this becomes possible, patients are enabled to become more autonomous, less clinging and to experience greater self esteem which equips them for more effective action in their life situations. Therapists are also required to exercise extreme patience.

Turner et al. (1996) postulate further that it is also important to leave as much control as possible with the patient and not accept the helplessness, which is often so prevalent in this work. Because the therapy involves all the affects and effects of the original trauma it may become unbearable for both patients and therapists at times.

Some Concluding Comments and Conclusions

As mentioned earlier, the increased validity given to qualitative research made it possible to conduct this research in a meaningful way. The focus has been on the shifting of personal, therapeutic, knowledge and other systemic boundaries in order to increase the flow of the water of life, constrained by conditions of multiple abuses in the past.

This therapeutic relationship was Dibs' first experience of a relationship in which she was able to trust enough to be open. In the early years she could not trust her abusers and in later years, while she could trust her caregivers, she could not open up to them because of the prohibition on talking about her past.

It can thus be postulated that this therapeutic relationship as it developed and deepened provided a safe environment in which to do the therapeutic work that has taken place over eight years. The therapeutic relationship also provided a safe enough climate for Dibs and me to risk shifting some traditionally held therapeutic and research boundaries as we struggled together to find ways to manage our emotions, external and internal turmoil, and challenges.

During the first session Dibs spoke about many strong negative feelings she was experiencing at that time. These were mainly feelings of fear and distress and she did not understand why. She also felt less able to control these feelings, hence her temptation to bash her head against a wall, which served to increase her tension and fear of becoming overwhelmed by the feelings and then not being able to cope with daily life.

It was also very clear from the outset that although Dibs felt out of control of her escalating feelings at times, she also felt it was important for her to maintain as much control of the expression of these feelings as possible. Her need for control also extended to attempting to control information as it emerged in therapy and we discussed confidentiality in that session and in many subsequent sessions. She was reluctant that any records be kept of our sessions and at that stage did not want anyone to know that she was talking to me.

Keeping firm traditional therapeutic boundaries regarding fixed times and one place for regular sessions without self-disclosure on my part seemed called for at that stage. The only concession from the outset was allowing Dibs to contact me by telephone between sessions.

Although we dealt with the feelings Dibs was experiencing at that time, it was clear that many of these feelings had their origins in her early childhood experience of cult-like abuse. As our relationship developed I came to know that Dibs' early caretakers had also been the perpetrators of the abuse and so it became imperative that she experience a close relationship that was not abusive. The firm therapeutic boundaries mentioned previously that were appropriate in the early stages of therapy Dibs later experienced as controlling and unequal.

Shifting boundaries emerged as a dominant theme when Dibs began to experience our relationship as increasingly unequal and controlling. This coincided with my withholding of self-disclosure or declining to make certain concessions in the traditional psychoanalytic frame, such as refusing to meet for a meal or at a venue other than in my office. Over time it seemed important to be able to shift boundaries without this being experienced by Dibs as controlling.

When we eventually met outside the therapy room and went for a meal and to chat about everyday matters, Dibs experienced it as nurturing and being treated and regarded as a person and not only as a client or a passive victim. Our therapeutic relationship was characterised by closeness rather than the distance that is recommended by many psychoanalysts. I was actively involved in the conversations that took place and did not take up the role of a listener and interpreter only. I also became involved in protecting Dibs from The System and in communicating directly to The System about how Dibs experienced their methods of protection as abusive.

Other boundary shifts involved extending both the length and frequency of sessions from the traditional hour a week to at least two hours twice a week for a period of time, as well as meeting at venues outside the therapy room. At one time I increased my availability to 24 hours a day as far as telephone calls were concerned. Dibs always handled the latter with consideration and did not call late or at night or at times I had not agreed to previously.

Some therapists for example Herman (1997), Lynn (1993) and Turner et al. (1996) who work in the area of cult abuse, loss and trauma, have experienced similar needs to shift certain therapeutic boundaries. Etchegoyen (1991) supports the use of flexible rather than rigid therapeutic boundaries, while Little (1993) holds that Winnicott's flexibility, for example visiting her in her own home when she was ill, contributed to her healing after having suffered abuse herself.

The cost to the therapist of shifting boundaries in order to facilitate healing in victims of prolonged, severe and multiple abuses is high and the personal investment, particularly in terms of energy, time and emotional resources, is huge. For therapists with busy practices or in certain life situations involving decreased personal control, this approach might not be possible or advisable.

The friendship that developed over time helped Dibs to feel that she had value as a person and not only as a client. It was often important to her that we connected on levels other than the therapeutic. At times it seemed to her that only the work on her inner system was important and she then felt as though the part of her that was doing the work was getting lost in the process of working on the inner system.

The collegial relationship also did much to bolster Dibs' confidence in her work as well as learn about herself. Often the content of our work together included aspects of self-knowledge, self-growth and life skills that increased her knowledge and skill base. When she applied what she had learnt, it increased her skill level in working with people. As she confronted her own loss and pain she was more able to be present with others in loss and pain, as she no longer needed to defend against those feelings in herself.

Strong negative feelings in the later years were present in most sessions over time. These feelings included despair, desperation, unhappiness and helplessness and anger. The feelings triggered in the present were often related to events from the past. For example, when Dibs felt hounded and intruded upon by The System, she would feel trapped and helpless and this would provoke horrific memories of past abuse and the feelings of despair and helplessness that accompanied those experiences. Other intense feelings were about the losses, such as the loss of innocence and the loss of childhood as well as the loss of a way of life and friends that she still experienced in the present. These experiences needed therapeutic work in order to bring healing from past hurts and pain so that she could manage her day-to-day life. These feelings also influenced how she thought about her future and she agonised about whether she would ever be able to reach a stage when the past did not intrude and affect her life in the present.

In the satanic cult in which Dibs grew up she was exposed to extreme degrees of control. I became sensitised by the above knowledge and leaving as much control as possible with Dibs in the process of therapy became very important. What she brought to therapy, the pace at which we worked and ending a particular conversation was left largely to her. When I felt it important to work on or return to an issue, I always checked this out with her first even though at times I felt it very important to pursue or return to a particular instance of abuse. She seemed to know when she was ready and would then be willing to do the painful and difficult work of accessing and dealing with these traumatic memories.

Further therapy is still required to work on various aspects of the past that continue to intrude into the present. One example is the surfacing of intense and excessive anger inappropriate to a stimulus in the present, such as some inefficiency of an employee. This is decreasing gradually over time. Dibs is also still plagued by strong negative feelings of anger and despair about the fact that the control and abuse happened in the first place and that she was the innocent target. She often feels helpless and despairing and has to work hard to prevent depression from controlling her life even further.

Abuse was another theme that recurred over time. Dibs was abused emotionally by being denied love and affection and being made to believe that she was responsible for incidents unrelated to her, for example when her father became angry with her mother.

As time went by and certain memories surfaced, they were often experienced as an additional trauma as she relived the horrors of the past as if for the first time. At times the work we did together to retrieve and heal memories also felt abusive to her despite the care that was taken to be gentle and leave as much control as possible in her hands.

Confidentiality and control of information about Dibs' past and the therapy was another theme that emerged from the beginning of the therapeutic and research relationship. At first she did not want a written record of sessions to be kept. As mentioned earlier at each step on the journey she was at pains to prevent information about her becoming available to additional people or organizations.

This remains an issue for her and even the request to write this chapter has been difficult for her. Unfortunately this need to maintain the secrecy or confidentiality about Dibs' past was reinforced after some bad experiences with a few professionals and family members who seemed to treat her with less respect and regard after they knew something about her history. She has also always been adamant and determined to protect her adoptive family and her child.

Connections between the past, the present and the future also became a theme. Feelings triggered by an event or stimulus in the present such as an experience of intrusiveness or feeling taken advantage of were often experienced as excessive and disturbing because they evoked memories of the past. At times the connections between past and present were clear and at other times they remained elusive. Sometimes something in the present, such as a flashing light, would trigger an unpleasant memory of the past and all the feelings that went with it. At one time when she saw the colour purple it plunged her back into the traumatic rituals where purple cloaks had been worn. Certain harsh and controlling behaviours of women employed by The System provoked strong memories of when her mother treated her cruelly and harshly. At times the past and present seemed so connected, especially in relation to similar threatening experiences with The System, that it became difficult to tell whether she was experiencing the past, the present or both simultaneously.

There are systemic connections between all the themes as mentioned above. Being controlled was an abusive experience and was accompanied by strong negative feelings, which in turn provoked a need to control the experience and expression of feelings as well as to control the environment. All the themes also occurred over time and as illustrated, the past had an influence on the present and the future.

Reflective Processes Over Time

Upon reflection I have become aware that at times certain isomorphic patterns emerged during this journey. There were connecting patterns and processes between the discussions and experiences with my supervisor and promoter and what was happening between Dibs and me and certain of Dibs' past experiences. Mattinson (1977) confirms that, "the processes at work currently in the relationship between client and worker are often reflected in the relationship between worker and supervisor" (p. 11). In supervision sessions about my work with Dibs we were often struck by the similarity between how I felt about the research at times and how Dibs felt at certain moments in the therapy process. These reflective processes also became evident in areas other than supervision as described below with regard to my experience of writing up this research.

My feelings were often around "not knowing" when I encountered knowledge, beliefs and practices unfamiliar to my previous education and training that was mainly in Social Work. Similar feelings of inadequacy and uncertainty often plagued Dibs as she re-encountered the unknown of certain memories of her past. It was of paramount importance to me to feel in control of the research, as it was for her to feel in control of her life without being overwhelmed by feelings of personal inadequacy or incompetence.

Both Dibs and I were helped to manage feelings of inadequacy possibly because of the demands made on us in the systems in which we grew up. We were both called upon to take on adult roles normally considered inappropriate for children. In my case, for example, parenting a younger brother enabled me to develop skills of caring for another that most children do not develop at such an early age. In the therapeutic relationship these skills of endurance, patience and caring helped me to focus on Dibs' needs and especially her need to be attended to and accepted as a person of value.

I have become aware of reflective processes in my struggle to express and record the story that I thought worth "telling," in the required academic writing style and Dibs' struggle to do what was required of her. My promoter has been thorough and meticulous in overseeing the written material and for that I am grateful but at the same time I experienced the process as shameful and embarrassing. This led to a loss of self-confidence so that it not only became difficult to commit pen to paper but I found myself questioning my competence in other areas of my life. It also led to feelings of immense vulnerability.

In addition it seemed to me that no matter how hard I tried, and no matter how many additions or changes I made in the text, it was never enough or good enough. Having to write according to a prescribed system I experienced as controlling and devoid of choice. Despite a considerate and helpful promoter, the institutional system lays down rigid rules that made me at times feel like a victim in a system where conformity is mandatory and the sooner I complied, the sooner the agony would end.

My experience of the academic journey as described above partly mirrors Dibs' early experience in the cult-like environment where she was controlled by the perpetrators who were never satisfied with what she did while they continually demanded more of her.

What helped Dibs and me to survive these strong negative feelings was a deep inner knowing that we both had value as people and that the work we were engaged in was also valuable. We were both helped to make connections between the assumptions of the dominant cultural narrative to which we had been exposed and the present reality. In this case we had assumed that we were totally responsible for the feelings of shame and embarrassment that we experienced. In Dibs' case she was helped to understand that the shame was as a result of past abuse. I was helped to understand that my feelings were partly to do with the academic system in which I found myself.

Coming from the discipline of Social Work with its established ways of doing research and therapy and moving into the domain of Psychology meant that I was an "outsider" trying to survive in a different context from the one that was familiar to me. For both Dibs and me, much in unfamiliar contexts was unknown and when problems arose, we often felt that we were the problems and that we had done something wrong or not done something that we ought to have done. We also were not believed by some and shunned by some when we told the story. We then both ended up feeling bad about ourselves.

In the academic research system a promoter takes up a similar role to that of a therapist in assisting someone to make a transition in life from a familiar context to a more unfamiliar or unknown context. As my promoters were also constrained by the rules and conventions of the research context, they were unable to protect me from the feelings of abuse and persecutory control that I experienced, just as I was unable to protect my client from similar feelings at times.

In addition to the experience of multiple abuses, Dibs' early experience in a cult-like environment meant that she felt an "outsider" from the mainstream of society. Growing up and being dependent on a cult-like system and being exposed to processes of external control since infancy served to silence Dibs' voice and to isolate her from many sources of potential help. Her intensely ambivalent attempts to get into an essentially unfamiliar but desired and potentially meaningful context often proved painful and rejecting. If supervisors or therapists become part of such controlling systems because they have to conform to certain laid down criteria, we need to search for ways that cause participants the least amount of damage. In the context of this therapy and research it would seem that shifting boundaries has been containing and benign. However, it seems that there will always be some tension in knowing which boundaries should remain in place and which may be regarded with greater flexibility and shifted as deemed necessary for healing.

At this time when interdisciplinary research is encouraged and is becoming more common, it behoves academics in different disciplines to be open to communicating with each other and negotiating which boundaries can safely be shifted in certain circumstances and which need to remain firm. What might also be useful in academic circles is to explore how supervision can better assist students in this difficult transitional process involving interdisciplinary research. Perhaps some of what has emerged in this thesis regarding the intense struggle to shift boundaries might also be useful in the academic context and transitional contexts associated with change in our rapidly changing world where we are daily confronted with similar transitions involving the shifting of familiar boundaries.

A Few Final Thoughts, For Now, From Dibs

Reading this dissertation was an overwhelming experience—an emotional flood! It felt at times as if my banks would burst. Seeing my journey in black and white was startling. I felt as churned up as a twisting, turbulent river. I wanted to stop this from going to print—in an effort to protect my inner self, which sometimes feels very vulnerable at the thought of others knowing about me—even though they won't know who I am. And much more so—to protect myself from those who do know who I am! Yet this is the story not only of abuse and pain, but of a relationship that facilitated for the struggle and ultimate triumph over abuse and pain. A relationship, which is precious to me. Our story goes to print with my blessing. Sometimes I am afraid—but I am no longer ashamed. And if there is a chance that someone else will be helped because of this dissertation I feel an inner calm—like the river returning to a gentle flow.

It was the hardest thing I've ever done…
Discovering hidden parts…
Of me.
Bringing them together,
Holding them together,
Letting the effort go,
Bringing them together,
Holding them together,
Letting the past go.

To those who suffered in any way because of my journey—I'm truly sorry. To those who held different views about this therapy and the shifting boundaries—while it hurt like crazy, I respect your right to deal with your clients in a more conventional way with firmer therapeutic boundaries.

To those people who prayed so very much for us during this journey, I thank you. It's painful to know you would not have me in your midst. While I respect your right to have made that choice, it is my belief that both you and I have lost because of your choice.

To the supervisor of this dissertation, I don't even know you, yet I feel deeply emotional at the thought of you. Thank you for being there. Thank you for support. Thank you for respecting me.

To my beloved therapist and friend. Thank you for believing me and for believing in me. We found my past, fought through the present. Now I have a future and "…whatever other commandment there may be, all are summed up in this one rule: 'Love your neighbour as yourself'" (Romans 13 : 9). You have done this for me and I know that it cost a great deal. Thank you. I love you.

To Jesus—you made the way.

It was the hardest thing I've ever done…
Finding those parts,
Bringing them together,
Holding them together,
Letting the past go…
And when it's hard
I will remember the little ray of sunshine
Whispering…
You can—just try…
And then I'll fly
I'll fly, fly

CHAPTER 16

The Use of Prayer for Inner Healing of Memories and Deliverance with Ritual Abuse Survivors

Tom Ball

"And these signs shall follow all who believe. They shall lay their hands upon the sick, who will recover." Mark 16:17, Jerusalem Bible

This topic is, of course, as diverse as it is controversial. Almost unlimited are the possible permutations. Without reviewing historical theological controversies between Pentecostal, Charismatic, Liturgical and Evangelical Christian denominations regarding whether or not (or which) gifts of the Spirit are still in operation today, or for that matter the existence of actual demonic entities, it is this writer's perception that personal experience has a way of impinging on dogmatism, religious or agnostic. Former missionary, church growth researcher, and Fuller Seminary professor Rev. C. Peter Wagner, Ph.D., agrees: …first hand exposure to a healing, a miracle, a word of knowledge, or a deliverance from demons is the most frequent single factor moving evangelicals from skepticism concerning signs and wonders to belief, to openness, and then to personal participation…"[1]

This chapter will focus on defining and explaining how to "do" prayer for inner healing of memories, and deliverance, particularly with clients or spiritual directees whose past traumas confound deleteriously their present experience of God. While some of the discussion will pertain specifically to sexual abuse recovery—nearly always a component of ritual abuse—as far as healing and deliverance prayers as psychological treatment modalities or spiritual direction intervention strategies are concerned, the precise etiology of one's past woundedness is quite immaterial. The heart of the matter is God tends to draw people toward wholeness and healing (which does not in the slightest suggest those who aren't whole or healed are necessarily doing something wrong—they may or they may not be—or that they are somehow "out of favor" with God. That is an entirely different issue [perhaps of a "dark night of the soul" nature] which this chapter will not pursue.) Rather, this chapter advances the contention that along with pharmacology, sound psychotherapy, nutrition, exercise, dependable support structures, and a number of other good things, God does make available to believers the special ministries of prayer for inner healing of memories, and deliverance.

Keeping in mind the many varieties of organized abuse, this chapter further contends at least one form of ritual abuse, Satanic ritual abuse, has as a primary purpose the involvement of demonic entities, thus obviating, for healing to be complete, the role of deliverance prayer. When people physically and sexually assault and abuse children in an active attempt to create personality splits, while simultaneously chanting, quoting or reading from portions of the Satanic Bible, engage in bodily penetration with religious implements such as a crucifix, and call on demons to come and "enjoy" the child being abused, in return for which requests are voiced that Satan would imbue them with power, one must assume these individuals intend and expect that Satan and demons will participate.

Later during recovery when symptomatic individuals request intervention to help them deal with their present emotional and spiritual problems, report during sessions reliving these intense experiences from the past, and describe among other things both the presence of demonic entities and their removal during prayer, one must at least attend to the survivors' subjective reports of their own experiences.

Assisting readers to better understand the role of prayer for inner healing of memories and deliverance, and learn how effectively to deal with demonic attachments, is the aim of this chapter. First described are a few of this writer's personal experiences with prayer for physical healing. Following are a discussion of prayer for inner healing of memories and an examination of the ministry of deliverance.

Physical Healing

This writer, as did many North American Christians, grew up in a small-town, conservative, Evangelical Protestant church[2] in which glossolalia during public worship service was forbidden,[3] and so-called "healing" services were extremely rare[4] …although it was normal to include prayer for someone's illness or impending surgical operation among the "regular" congregational prayers. Unlike many, for a while this writer attended a private, Christian, residential high school and lived in a dormitory on campus, an environment rich with morning chapel services, the usual Sunday and mid-week services, and numerous "special speakers" and revival services throughout the year. Ongoing student small-groups met regularly for bible study and prayer. Prayer, including prayer for healing (as described above), was a respected and valued activity.

All during those formative childhood years, each Sunday morning, Sunday evening, and Wednesday night, (including school, special services, and summer family camp meetings), this writer witnessed people praying. At every service, someone would pray for somebody's healing. Once in awhile a parishioner would "go forward" to the altar to be "anointed with oil" and prayed for by the pastor or special speaker, who usually would "call for the elders of the church" to "assist," which in this writer's denomination meant in a prayer service setting several active senior lay men, and occasionally women, would surround the supplicant, place their hands on the petitioner's head or shoulders, and pray in agreement (sometimes out loud all at the same time) along with the pastor.

On occasion, during church service "testimony time," one would rise and testify to having been "healed" of some pain or affliction. Many thanked God for "answered prayers." Yet, this writer recalls no instance while growing up of the blind seeing, the deaf hearing, the lame walking, or a demon manifesting and/or being made to leave. Folks said they "got healed," but what did that really mean? It was confusing. Eventually, for reasons unrelated to this topic, this writer left the church. Years later, having experienced a restored personal relationship with God, and having returned to the same hometown church, he again encountered prayers for healing. And he began, hesitantly, praying them himself. And over time, some people got healed.

Healing: What is It?

Daniel J. Benor, M.D., an American psychiatrist working in England, describes healing as "The intentional influence of one or more people upon another living system without utilizing known physical means of intervention."[5] Co-chair of the Panel on Mind/Body Interventions, Office of Alternative Medicine, National Institutes of Health (1993) Larry Dosey, M.D., asks regarding prayer therapy: How does healing happen? Almost always in the studies we looked at… the healer employed a prayerful attitude, if not actual prayer. This is one of the reasons why many healers use the terms 'spiritual healing' and 'prayer healing' interchangeably… Thus, practically all types of spiritual healing make use of a prayerful, meditative state of awareness. During this process the healer adopts a dispassionate, loving, and compassionate attitude toward the person in need.[6]

The Evidence

Working with the John Templeton Foundation, the National Institute for Healthcare Research in summer 1997 announced eight medical schools had been granted funds to study how social and religious factors influence mental and physical health.[7] Sponsored by Harvard Medical School's Department of Continuing Education, Herbert Benson, M.D. offered in 1997 to over six hundred doctors, nurses, psychologists, and social workers at a regional three-day conference at Houston, Texas Medical Center's Institute of Religion, a course titled "Spirituality and Healing in Medicine.[8] With over thirty of the nation's top medical schools known to be offering in 1997 teaching programs of the healing power of prayer (compared to only three in 1993), Benson says: For a long time, we've been exploring and researching the relationship between belief and healing as a complement, not an alternative, to traditional medicine.[9]

Increasing in the literature are reports of experiments involving healing prayer, and prominent in this genre of researcher-report writers is best-selling author Larry Dossey, M.D., whose numerous articles and books, among them Healing Words: The Power of Prayer and the Practice of Medicine (1993), and Prayer is Good Medicine: How to Reap the Healing Benefits of Prayer (1996), eloquently speak to the breadth and sophistication of modern-day prayer-medicine research. Dossey observes: The 'choice' between science and spirituality appears increasingly artificial today, even from a scientific perspective… The most practical reason to examine prayer in healing is simply that, at least some of the time, it works. The evidence is simply overwhelming that prayer functions at a distance to change physical processes in a variety of organisms, from bacteria to humans… Therapies should be judged according to their effects in conditions in which they work, and prayer is no exception.[10]

In his book, Healing Words, Dossey further quotes Daniel J. Benor, M.D., who reviewed all 131 studies on spiritual healing published in English prior to 1990. In the *Journal of Complementary Medical Research (*September 1990), Benor described 56 controlled trials which yielded results the likelihood of which were due to chance was less than 1 in 100, and another 21 studies which yielded results at the .02 to .05 probability level (between 2 and 5 chances in 100.) The studies examined the effects of prayer on enzymes, cells, yeasts, bacteria, plants, animals, and humans.[11]

While a lengthy duplication of Benor's review seems unnecessary in this chapter, one human subjects study on which he reported is both representative and striking in its outcome. Christian cardiologist, Randolph C. Byrd, M.D., reported in the Southern Medical Journal (July 1988):

Over a ten-month period, a computer assigned 393 patients admitted to the coronary care unit at San Francisco General Hospital to either a group that was prayed for by home prayer groups (192 patients) or to a group that was not remembered in prayer (201 patients). The study was designed according to rigid criteria, the kind usually used in clinical studies in medicine. It was a randomized, double-blind experiment in which neither the patients, nurses, nor doctors knew which group the patients were in. Byrd recruited various religious groups to pray for members of the designated prayed-for groups. The prayer groups were given the first names of their patients as well as a brief description of their diagnosis and condition. They were asked to pray each day, but were given no instructions on how to pray. 'Each person prayed for many different patients, but each patient in the experiment had between five and seven people praying for him or her,' Byrd explained. The prayed for-patients differed in several areas: 1. They were five times less likely than the unremembered group to require antibiotics (three patients compared to sixteen patients).

2. They were three times less likely to develop pulmonary edema, a condition in which the lungs fill with fluid as a consequence of the failure of the heart to pump properly (six compared to eighteen patients).

3. None of the prayed-for group required endotracheal intubation, in which an artificial airway is inserted in the throat and attached to a mechanical ventilator, while twelve in the unremembered group required mechanical ventilatory support.

4. Fewer patients in the prayed-for group died (although this difference was not statistically significant).

If the technique being studied had been a new drug or a surgical procedure instead of prayer, it would almost certainly have been heralded as some sort of 'breakthrough.'[12]

Healing Experiences

This writer has had some modest experiences with healing prayer, in both private and public settings. His first experience involved praying for his own father who, after an emergency operation to remove a bowel obstruction revealed a widespread abdominal cancer had already involved the liver, was told he'd not leave the hospital alive. This writer prayed:

> Lord, you know I don't have faith to pray he'll be healed of his cancer, but, would you give him a little more time and strength so he could reconcile with his wife, and they could forgive one another for all those years of pain and hurt? Then he could die in peace. It would glorify you if that were to happen.

Subsequently the patient experienced renewed strength and three months of vigorous, active, productive life which he did use in part to reconcile the many years of turmoil and anger and hurt in his marriage… which was the specific prayer offered. While this three-month respite might have happened anyway, nevertheless, in terms of this discussion the "coincidence" seems noteworthy.

Once on the mission field in Chili, a dull-eyed, listless, feverish, floppy-headed, dehydrated baby—accompanied by its mother—was brought by the strongly "religious" grandmother to a rural church for prayer, after the city medical clinic sent the parents home, reportedly saying, "There's nothing we can do." Gathering his students around, this writer directed them to lay hands on the child, mother, and grandmother and pray silently while he prayed aloud, rebuking the sickness and asking God to heal the child "as a witness to the community that God is in this church." That night the baby and its family were in church praising God because the child's fever was gone, its head was up, its eyes were bright, and it was smiling and taking nourishment.

Accompanying a dentist friend on a hospital visit in Seoul, this writer first asked permission, and then laid hands on the head and abdomen of a teenage boy whose pronounced jaundice evidenced his severe internal injuries acquired during a skiing accident, and prayed for a "complete, thorough healing." Subsequently, the next day's exploratory surgery was cancelled, the liver resumed functioning, and the boy soon went home. (The writer later received a nice letter from the boy's father, a judge on the high court in Puson, Republic of Korea.)

Standing in front of the entire college faculty, this writer once prayed God would "do a miracle" for a straight-laced, austere, Victorian, spinster librarian… who subsequently spoke in public of "meeting and talking with Jesus" during a time when medical caregivers were working to restart her heart which had stopped while she was on the table during a hospital procedure.[13] Such a report was most uncharacteristic for this elderly, conservative, decidedly unflamboyant Christian woman. This writer visited her home and audio-taped an hour-long interview in which she discusses this experience.

Yet, others for whom this writer prayed did not get well. Though calling together an entire adult Sunday school class (which was studying Richard J. Foster's book "Prayer: Finding the Heart's True Home") to gather around a class member, lay on hands, and join in prayer for healing, the sufferer nevertheless still had to proceed with a scheduled prostate cancer operation during which the nerves could not be saved.

After praying with another pastor and a teenaged girl's parents, the girl's cancerous leg still had to be removed, and a year or so later she died. A baby in an incubator, for whom the writer and another group of students prayed while on a missions trip to Haiti, died a few days later.

Through these and many other prayer experiences, this writer has come to understand observable results from prayer for physical healing are a hit-or-miss affair. Sometimes people get better… sometimes they don't.[14] Nevertheless, God's people are commanded to pray, while remembering God is the one who determines the outcome. This is very freeing for the one who prays. The illness can be rebuked and the patient's body and mind and spirit encouraged to trust in God, thus assisting the person to physically, emotionally, and spiritually cooperate with the care givers and the medicines and the therapies, while inviting and allowing God to do a healing work within.

Inner Healing of Memories

Prayer for inner healing of memories seems in this writer's experience a different matter than the "hit or miss" results customarily forthcoming following prayer for physical healing. (Perhaps this is because prayer for physical healing seems to produce results varying between immediate and full—on rare occasion, to partial over time—a more common outcome, while prayer for inner healing of memories is much more immediately observable in its outcome). Be that as it may, so far each time the writer has led spiritual directees in a progressive relaxation exercise followed by an invitation for Jesus to "come and bring up (in the spiritual directee's mind and memory) only what you want to deal with," whether one-on-one or with a group, reports follow of remembered instances of past hurt in which directees see Jesus entering the scene and "doing something." ("Free to Remember," an original article containing case reports was accepted in 1998 for publication in Light and Life Magazine, this writer's denominational journal.) Such healing seems clearly to be God's doing. Authority and power are completely His. This writer is being granted the grace merely to be present while God heals. But, because of the poignancy—and the consistency—of the reports, it has become clear that prayer for inner healing of memories is a powerful, powerful grace.

Author and psychiatric nurse Barbara Shlemon, R.N. advises:

> Every situation requires its own unique spiritual direction. The Gospel narratives show us Jesus did not follow a set pattern in His healing ministry but treated each request for help differently. One paralytic was told 'Take up your bed and walk,' and another advised 'Your sins are forgiven.' Jesus laid His hands on one blind man to restore his sight, and He applied a mixture of mud and spittle to heal another.[15]

Numerous scriptures (MT 10: 1 and others) exhort to, and promise authority for, healing,[16] Jesus' followers (Acts 9: 33–34) did in fact do works of healing,[17] and more and more Christians today are increasingly interested in learning about it.[18]

Forms of Inner Healing

According to "Healing of Memories," a two-hour audio-taped, large audience healing service conducted by author, psychological consultant, suicide prevention program director, and seminary professor Rev. John H. Hampsch, C.M.F., there are five forms of healing:

1. Instantaneous: dramatic.
2. Gradual: starts when prayer is uttered and may take several hours, days, weeks or even months.
3. Phase-in: spurts. A partial healing is received immediately, then more healing is received later, as when the blind man told Jesus (after Jesus' first effort at restoring his sight), "I see men who look like trees walking," and Jesus touched him a second time and then the healing was complete.
4. Delayed: nothing appears to happen immediately after the prayer, but the person awakens the next day and finds healing has occurred.
5. Recurrent: healing occurs, then later the problem returns. (This may be a temporary healing, so the person can accomplish some specific task.)[19]

Hampsh goes on to say on the audio tape the term "healing of memories" may have originated with Anglican missionary Agnes Sanford "…in her book Healing Light, or Healing Gifts of the Spirit…" Hampsch reports (then Dominican Fr.) Francis MacNutt, Ph.D. adapted Sanford's one-on-one approach for use in larger groups, and, after talking with MacNutt, Fr. Hampsch further revised the Sanford-MacNutt approach into what he calls a two-phase approach. In phase one he invites audience members to go back into their memory and recall past hurts. In phase two he asks them to use their imagination to invite (and then "see") Jesus forgiving and healing those hurts. In his healing ministry Hampsch reports mental, emotional and physical healings regularly occur.

Writing about inner healing of memories in The Gift of Inner Healing (1976), Ruth Carter Stapleton refers to:

> …the experience in which the Holy Spirit restores health to the deepest area of our lives by dealing with the root cause of our hurts and pain. In prayer for physical healing we are often concerned with the symptoms of the real need. Deep hurts and fears often manifest themselves physically as backaches, headaches, skin rashes, asthma, and other illnesses. When we pray for healing of physical symptoms, we often see no change because we are praying for and expecting God to heal the symptom rather than to make us whole… Frequently our problems are initiated by lack of love and understanding from others[20] rather than by sins we have committed… Very often we have suppressed the hurtful occurrences so completely we are not even aware of their bind upon our hearts. If we let Him, the Holy Spirit, who reveals all things, is able to bring to our awareness the situations which need our attention…[21]

Thus, inner healing of necessity involves spirit, mind-psyche-emotions, and body—because each affects the others. Fibromyalgia is a good example; stress (an emotional reaction deriving from one's mental perception of one or more present or past external [or internal] phenomena) is often correlated with the felt pain of this diagnosis. Physical therapy and medications attempt to deal with the stress and palliate the pain, but unless present sources of stress (and the emotional residue from unresolved past traumas) are reduced, the condition persists. The constant pain impacts negatively one's emotions, which after awhile begin to color one's thinking, and often interferes with one's spiritual relationship to God.

Coming at it from a more overtly religious orientation, the preferred "treatment" for guilt deriving from real sin, is not psychotherapy, but inner spiritual healing. This is so because, according to scripture, for the Christian to experience peace of mind, sin must be confessed, repented, and forgiven. "When I confessed not my sin, my bones wasted away within me" (Ps 32: 3). Regardless of professional orientation or religious perspective, spiritual healing is thought to effect positively both one's mental/emotional and one's physical well-being.

Because Hampsch does such a concise job of explaining how prayer for inner healing of memories impacts body-mind-spirit, the following is repeated directly from his audio tape:

> A neurosis is an emotional disturbance of some kind, not severe enough to be psychosis—where one loses contact with reality in some way. It is some disturbance which prevents ongoing psychological comfort. Eighty percent of the adult population is neurotic, according to Karen Horney's definition of neurosis. One in four is so disturbed emotionally he needs professional help, either a psychiatrist, psychologist, counselor, social worker, or marriage counselor. But not many will seek it because their pride won't let them admit they need help… especially men.
> Everyone has some hangups, although not everyone is neurotic. No one has a perfectly balanced personality, except Jesus Christ. Familiar examples are fear of snakes, darkness, high places, public speaking, intimacy, vulnerability, not knowing how to express affection properly, or even how to love, maturely and adequately. (Though everyone thinks he does, few really do. Think of your own needs not being met right now—and realize, the significant others in your life are thinking the same thing.) Three syndromes (symptoms) are commonly associated with neurosis: guilt (false or real) and shame, hostility or aggression, and anxiety. These syndromes may be obvious (conscious) or submerged (subconscious). These three syndromes are interrelated in the human psyche, and in part, it is these which get healed when one does prayer for inner healing of memories. But there's also a spiritual healing which results when these are taken care of.
> Hostility, guilt, anxiety: if we just cope with the first two, the third dissolves by itself. To get them healed, they have to be brought to the surface and acknowledged and dealt with. God can and does heal directly at times… but He often chooses to heal through other humans."[22]

In this writer's understanding guilt is either "real," i.e., it's deserved because one consciously violates God's or one's own moral code, or "false," i.e., one did "it" but not on purpose, in which case one is "responsible," but one's culpability is diminished.

Shame is another matter. While guilt is based on what one "does" (or fails to do), shame is a feeling or attitude about what one "is." Guilt, as in a guilty conscience, can be a good thing moving one toward confession, repentance, restitution, and reconciliation. Shame, however, is not of God. It impels not toward rectification; rather, it drives one away from reality by diminishing and destroying one's self-image and one's ability to relate to others and to God.

Hostility can be directed masochistically inward (from nail biting to suicide), or aggressively outward (from resentment to road rage). Anxiety is a sort of psychological angst or pain… a floating, undifferentiated uneasiness which underlies one's interactions with people and events.

According to Stapleton:

> When we pray for inner healing, we are really asking Jesus to walk back into the dark places of our lives and bring healing to the distressing and painful memories of the past. We need to take Jesus into the areas of our unforgiveness toward those who have taught us to fear, hate, and reject. We need to take Him (love) into the relationship where there was no love.[23]

Role of Forgiveness

While much more could be said about inner healing of memories, the role of forgiveness in psychological, mental, emotional, and spiritual healing (and even physical healing to the extent physical symptoms are exacerbated by one's emotional state) is thought to be extremely important.

Scripture, of course, strongly emphasizes forgiveness (recitation of the Lord's Prayer, for example, in which petitioners ask God to forgive them as they forgive others—a scary thought should the prayer be answered.), and so do many who work in inner healing ministry. Author and psychiatric nurse Barbara Shlemon, R.N. asserts:

> There is nothing that will impede our ability to pray for ourselves or for others more than the unwillingness to forgive. It acts as an invisible barrier between us and the Father which prohibits His blessings from being showered upon us or the ones for whom we pray. Jesus taught us 'When you stand in prayer, forgive whatever you have against anybody, so your Father in Heaven may forgive your failings too' (MK 11: 25). We cannot have the fullness of God's love for ourselves or for others so long as we refuse to make an act of forgiveness toward those who have wronged us.[24]

Hampsch says:

> If you are harboring aggression, bitterness, hatred toward anyone even though you claim you've forgiven them (sic), you've not really forgiven them (sic). The resentment, perhaps repressed a bit from conscious awareness, is doing you a lot of damage… often to the body, and the soul. If guilt feelings are still there, it means you have not received forgiveness. If you really know you've been forgiven by someone, then you don't feel dirty or guilty. You feel clean…

> free. Healing of resentment comes in the act of really forgiving. When forgiveness is complete, not the slightest smidgen of resentment remains. If the receipt of forgiveness is complete, no guilt remains. Thus, active—and passive—forgiveness is the underlying key to emotional healing. The key to inner healing of memories is giving—and receiving—forgiveness. Active and passive forgiveness resolve hostility and resentment, and their resolution eliminates anxiety all by itself. Jesus gave in Matthew 6:12 and Luke 11:4 (in the Our Father) a lesson in active and passive forgiveness: Passive: "…forgive us our trespasses…"
> Active: "…as we forgive those who trespass against us."[25]

Stapleton goes on to write:

> Forgiveness is at the heart of Jesus' message and it is at the heart of inner healing. But so much which needs to be forgiven is a part of our distant past. How can we forgive the forgotten? If our Christian life is contaminated by unforgiven pain inflicted upon us by incidents and people we don't remember—and it is—what can we do about it? When pain too agonizing to be born has been inflicted upon a little child and the traumatic experience has been repressed, sealed in the vault of forgetfulness, how can the memory ever be brought out into the light and dealt with? How can anyone forgive something buried so deeply?"[26]

Preparation

To elicit readiness for inner healing prayer it is necessary to get in touch with those memories requiring healing.[27] Author and Asbury Seminary professor emeritus David A. Seamands suggests, among other things, assigning homework:

> The purpose of homework for counselees is to help them get in touch with the repressed memories and feelings which are causing them emotional and behavioral problems. At the heart of all remembering is association, for associations are the links which cause our minds to recall experiences. By remembering one picture, we then recall another, because our minds have somehow associated the two. When the memories are clearly recalled, there is a strong possibility of re-experiencing the emotions which originally accompanied the experience. The reverse is also true. That is, if we can experience certain feelings, there is the possibility the memories associated with those feelings will reenter our consciousness. [28]

Useful homework experiences can encompass writing assignments (taking notes about one's feelings while listening to teaching tapes, for example; or journaling about one's consolations, desolations, and feelings while at prayer), looking at old family photographs and grade school, high school, and college yearbooks,[29] taking journeys to places associated with painful memories,[30] and working through various self-help books and workbooks.

The Prayer

Most important, however, is the actual prayer for inner healing of memories. This is where the actual healing takes place. Seamonds further explains:

> The most distinctive part of the healing of memories is the time of prayer. Through the use of imagination, we try to recreate the painful memory and then actually visualize it as it once took place. We pray as if we were actually talking to God on the spot, and ask Him to do for us what (He would have done) had we asked (at the time the original hurt was happening.) We ask Him to heal the little child or teenager who underwent those experiences—things which really did fixate (some part of the child's personality or emotional development) at that stage of growth."[31]

Stapleton explains:

> When we pray for inner healing, we are really asking Jesus to walk back into the dark places in our lives and bring healing to the distressing and painful memories of the past… As we respond to prayer by imagining Jesus moving back into our lives, we picture the little child within us who hurts, who was rejected, who failed to receive healthy love, who was neglected by the parents' failure to give corrective discipline in love, and who wasn't understood. That little child within each of us must hearken to the healing love of Jesus Christ. [32]

In the prayer for inner healing of memories, the spiritual director-pastoral counselor assists the client to come closer to God by inviting Jesus to fulfill through action His desire to reconcile every part of us to Himself. In this prayer Jesus responds to the deepest longings within hurting people by enabling them to experience the love of God through a gift of increased emotional wholeness and freedom. Author and Wheaton College psychology professor, Mark R. McMinn, Ph.D., describes the spiritual director/pastoral counselor-directee-God relationship thusly: If God longs to be in relationship with us, and if the deepest longings of the human soul point toward God, then the goals of Christian counseling go much deeper than changing behavior. Even those who do not know God long for the things of God—peace, hope, love, and justice to name a few. These longings are spiritual in nature, and so it is inevitable that every counseling session that digs beneath the behavioral veneer of human experience has something to do with spirituality and religious experience. Christian counselors attempt to do this work while being intentional about religious and spiritual matters, explicit about the guiding values and assumptions of the counseling intervention, and ethical in every counseling interaction.[33]

Deliverance

Amongst much of the general public, and too many clergy, three attitudes seem prevalent today regarding ritual abuse, Satanic ritual abuse, and demonic entities. First, many in early twenty-first century North America view serious belief in the existence of cults, organized abuse groups, or demons as either superstitious, illogical, or ignorant. Such beliefs, they feel, are simply incompatible with scientific rationalism. Comedian Flip Wilson's popular TV quip "The devil made me do it!" epitomizes a second public perception: it's a harmless joke. Thus, toddlers' mothers dress them up as ghouls, ghosts, and goblins on Halloween night, and grownup's movies (and Saturday morning children's TV programs) portray demons and satanic possession as "entertainment." Third, there is a growing fascination today with the occult, as evidenced by the "psychic reader" TV channel and the many astrology magazines at the supermarket checkout counter. The craving for esoteric, "extra" knowledge in our culture is evidenced by people considered celebrities "channeling" on TV and radio programs, and the growing number of "psychic fairs" in cities across the land. (Nancy Regan even reportedly consulted on behalf of her husband, the then President of the United States of America, a well-known California astrologer to determine an "auspicious" date on which to consummate some official Presidential action.) What the Bible Says About Demons

On the other hand, the existence of Satan (Gen 3:1ff) and demons (Deut 18: 9–13) is attested in the Old Testament, while involvement with occult powers and activities (Lev 19: 13, 31) is clearly condemned. In the New Testament Jesus (Lk 9: 37–43) and His disciples (Lk 10: 17) are scripturally described as encountering, recognizing, and dispatching demons from afflicted people. Jesus made clear His followers were to do the same (Lk 9: 1–3; 10: 19-20; Jn 14: 12–14). According to the early church fathers, they did. Tertullian wrote: All the authority and power we have over them (demons) is from our naming the name of Christ, and recalling to their memory the woes with which God threatens them… Fearing Christ in God, and God in Christ, they become subject to the servants of God and Christ. So at our touch and breathing, overwhelmed by the thought and realization of those judgment fires, they leave at our command the bodies they have entered, unwilling and distressed.[34]

The Church's Position Today

Today, the Christian church officially recognizes the baptized Christian's positional authority over demonic entities (Mk 6: 7, 12–13; 16: 17; 20). Receiving the Nihil Obstat May 9, 1997 and Imprimatur May 20, 1997 (a declaration a book or pamphlet is considered by an official representative of the Roman Catholic Church to be free of doctrinal or moral error), Seek The Gifts Of The Spirit, published by Presentation Ministries in Cincinnati, Ohio instructs:

> Deliverance: In the name of Jesus Christ I command you, come out of her! Then and there the spirit left her. (Acts 16: 18)
> Every Christian can drive out demons in the name of Jesus (see Mt 10: 1; Mk 16: 17), but some have a special gift of deliverance. Peter set people free from the devil by his shadow falling on them (Acts 5: 15-16). Paul used an extraordinary method: 'when handkerchiefs or cloths which had touched his skin were applied to the sick, their diseases were cured and evil spirits departed from them.' (Acts 19: 12) Although we may not drive out demons in such dramatic ways, as members of the church we can attack the gates of Hell, which cannot prevail against us (Mt 16: 18). We can command Satan to leave in the name of Jesus (Mk 16: 17). Some demons are driven out only through prayer and fasting (Mt 17: 21). 'Prayer and fasting are the first and most effective weapons against the forces of evil' (The Gospel of Life, Pope John Paul II, 100).

By obedience to Jesus we can bring down the strongholds of the evil one and demolish his sophistries (2 Cor 10: 4). We can disarm and despoil Satan (Lk 11: 22), break his chains, and make a public show of him (Col 2: 14–15). We can quickly crush Satan under our feet (Rm 16: 20), for the One in us is greater than the one in the world (1 Jn 4: 4). The world need not be in bondage to the evil one. Use your deliverance power."[35]

The Believer's Authority

Why then do so many Christians seem unaware of their Christian authority over Satan's demons, or how to exercise it?[36] According to Francis MacNutt, Ph.D., "…because Christian churches generally neglect to teach about deliverance…"[37] Neil Anderson, asking in The Bondage Breakers (1993) "Do you have what it takes to effectively exercise Christ's authority over spiritual powers?"[38] goes on to suggest four qualifications for demonstrating authority over demonic entities: belief one actually has sufficient authority, humility to recognize and acknowledge one's authority comes only from Christ, a godly sense of courage and boldness in spiritual warfare, and dependence totally on Christ to fight the battle for us. In Christ, the victory is already won.[39]

MacNutt advises solid preparation before embarking on a deliverance ministry, and strongly encourages active and adequate follow-up afterwards.

> Prayer for deliverance should not be entered into without real prayer and discernment beforehand. Like major surgery it should not be lightly suggested. Many people have a need for prayers of deliverance, I believe, but the time cannot be hurried, and there is great need for follow-up. If follow-up cannot be provided, if there is no Christian community to help the person grow, we should hesitate before embarking on a prayer that cannot be finished: the last state of the person may end up worse than the first (Lk 11: 24-27).[40]

While reminding "Satan can do nothing about your position in Christ," Anderson cautions, "But, if he (Satan) can, he will cloud your perspective and thus diminish your faith and dull your effectiveness in the spiritual battle."[41] Anderson's thought brings to mind Paul's instruction to the Ephesians: Your strength must come from the Lord's mighty power within you… We are not fighting against people made of flesh and blood, but against persons without bodies —the evil rulers of the unseen world, those mighty satanic beings and great evil princes of darkness who rule this world: and against huge numbers of wicked spirits in the spirit world… In every battle you will need faith as your shield to stop the fiery arrows aimed at you by Satan." (Living Bible. Eph 6: 10, 12, 16)

When is Deliverance Appropriate?

While numerous writers describe various levels or orders of demonic beings, MacNutt's earlier book Healing (1974), after describing three other kinds of healing, ends with deliverance: breaking free of bondage from forces of evil, i.e., demons, principalities, and powers. An extraordinary kind of demonic activity is “possession,” a taking over of an individual (thought to be impossible if one is a born-again, in-dwelt-by-the-Holy Spirit, Christian[42]) which requires exorcism to expel. Other lesser demonic involvements include obsession, oppression, infestation, and temptation.[43] In this writer’s experience, this type of involvement is almost uniformly encountered by spiritual directees seeking recovery from Satanic ritual abuse.

In Deliverance From Evil Spirits: A Practical Manual (1995), MacNutt explains how to tell when a person needs deliverance:

1. When the tormented person is aware of the spirit(s).

   Hearing voices typically impelling one toward suicide or hate.

   Seeing visions or having nightmares filled with terror.

   Feeling impelled to do things one would never ordinarily think of doing.

2. The spiritual director-pastoral counselor observes symptoms.

   Body contortions: violent shaking, rigidity, arched spine, slithering on the floor like a snake.

   Facial changes: eyes filled with hate, mockery, pride, eyes roll upward, look serpentine.

   Unpleasant smells.

   Room goes cold.[44]

However, symptoms this obvious are not always present when some forms of demonic oppression are occurring. So absence of the above symptoms is not a fail-proof indicator no demons are in operation. Sometimes more subtle feelings of strong anger, wanting to express foul language, or encountering or engaging in (for no discernibly valid reason) unusual or unexpected disunity with family or coworkers are the manifesting symptoms.

In addition, numerous author-mental health practitioners caution against confusing demonic activity with other mental disorders.[45] Of particular concern is dissociative identity disorder (multiple personality), wherein it is not uncommon to find alter personalities who’s characteristics may resemble a demon’s, i.e., a “different” voice, aggressive personality traits, persecutory, self-harming ideation, uncharacteristic language, etc. While this writer believes the best proof is if, when the demons are prayed against authoritatively and commanded to stop bothering the person and leave, the upsetting feelings, ideation, and symptoms do in fact stop quickly, others assert the best method to be sure a demon is present is to exercise the gift of discernment of spirits.

The Writer's Experience

This writer's personal experience with deliverance prayer began with reading MacNutt's Deliverance From Evil Spirits: A Practical Manual (1995) and McAll's Healing the Family Tree (1982) while on retreat in summer 1996. Subsequent to that awakening, he twice recognized and rebuked with authoritative prayer demonic oppression of himself which took the form of irrational and strong feelings of anger accompanied by thoughts of foul language. The feelings and thoughts ceased immediately.

Later, while on a missions trip to the Dominican Republic, relations between the writer's student video production crew and the host missionaries were deteriorating rapidly to the point the next sentence he intended to say would express regret things weren't working out but the project would have to be cancelled and the crew would return home. Just as those thoughts were forming, God granted the realization the conflict was demonic in origin. Quickly sharing his insight with the missionaries and the video crew, as soon as the vehicle reached it's next stop he gathered everyone together, explained what had been happening was demonic opposition to the project, and how to pray against it, and led the group in authoritative prayer commanding the oppression to cease and the demons to leave. The problem cleared up that moment, and relations improved so much for several years afterward the team co-leader maintained personal correspondence with one of the missionaries.

On another trip, this time to Haiti, after recognizing the sudden onslaught of feelings of intense sadness (related to a miscarriage she'd suffered years earlier) being experienced by a female team member were of demonic origin, they were prayed against and commanded to leave, whereupon the sad feelings abated sufficiently for the woman to resume her duties.

Finally, a couple of weeks following that Haiti trip, two medical members who had accompanied the church work team confided they were experiencing disordered thoughts, irritability, inability to concentrate, disrupted sleep, and bowel problems. Explaining the possibility these symptoms may have been a result of demonic oppression sent against them by Voodoo practitioners actively opposed to their work at the rural Haitian mission hospital, this writer led them in a prayer of authoritative rebuke and ordered the demons to leave. Both individuals subsequently reported the symptoms ceased immediately.

Other members of that same church work team led a worship service in a Haitian church in Port au Prince, the substance of which was prayer for physical and emotional healing and casting out of demons. None manifested at the service, but the local pastor's wife's mother who earlier that week had been diagnosed by the team optometrist as having a large cancerous tumor inside her eyeball, came forward for healing prayer. Later she reported feeling “heat” had gone into her head when team members laid hands on her and prayed for her healing. To date (over five years later) the missionaries continue to report she’s not felt a need to see a doctor, and she says she’s “better” and is claiming to have been healed.

This writer has on occasion been asked to consult with mental health practitioners via the Internet, and by telephone with a senior pastor of a church in his own denomination.

In recent years, to overcome a block to progress in emotional healing, this writer has had increasing occasion to assist sexual abuse and Satanic ritual abuse survivors who had developed DID to prepare for and then engage in deliverance prayer. To date no demonic entities have manifested during these activities, other than to respond to a direct command to reveal their name and how they came to be attached to the survivor. In each instance, following prayer intervention, the spiritual directee has reported either experiencing sufficient immediate relief to be able to continue the session, or reported being able to see the demons in the memory being processed, see Jesus come into that memory scene, watch Him confront them, and feel them leave.

How is it Done?

Comparing authorities, it would appear the steps to deliverance are many and varied, with all kinds of prayers, warnings, advices, caveats, and “special” situations. After presenting a simple, straight-forward, clearly delineated seven-step approach devised by chiropractic intern and Association of Christian Therapists member Allan Weilert, M.T.S., this paper closes with a brief description of the writer’s preferred approach, direct application of TheoPhostic Prayer, developed by licensed clinical psychologist Ed Smith, D.Min.

Allan Weilert’s Deliverance Method

Praying for deliverance presents unique challenges to healing ministers today. Often, excessive attention is placed on the actual expelling of evil spirits at the expense of caring as Jesus would for the person seeking our assistance. After years of experience in healing ministry, Allan Weilert suggests a seven-step deliverance procedure which preserves reason and balance in the sometimes confusing realm of spiritual warfare.

1. Substantial Inner Healing Prayer (see above)

Since deliverance is primarily a spiritual issue, the afflicted individual essentially requires in-depth inner healing prayer, addressing spiritual and emotional concerns… targeted to traumatic events and patterns of sin within the person… As layer upon layer of hurtful memories are entrusted to the Lord, sometimes hidden obstacles rear up to hinder reception of true freedom.

2. The Interview

The interview is conducted only if there is legitimate reason to suspect there seems to be more than the common defense mechanisms at work to retard one's advancement in inner healing or in the spiritual life. Uncontrollable rage (for example, "might" be an indicator.)

3. Discernment of Spirits

This phase of deliverance ministry relies solely on insight granted by the Holy Spirit to confirm the interview and observations made earlier. There is no substitution for the information that the gift of discerning of spirits affords… The end result is a detailed description of which particular evil spirits hold positions of authority, the types (and sometimes names) of demons present, and their functions and relationships with one another as they affect an individual's life.

4. Preparation for the Deliverance

For an harmonious session, it is imperative each team member assumes only the role assigned by the team leader who alone addresses and casts out the evil spirits and directs the session. Obedience insures order and highlights clear lines of spiritual authority: thus a 'united front' is preserved in the face of our enemy. Possible roles of team members include an intercessor praying in tongues, someone continuously calling on the protection of the Blood of Jesus, another praying silently or making a litany of saints, angels, and Our Lady to pray for us. If an intercessory prayer ministry is available, seek their help in preparing for and during the session.

5. The Actual Deliverance

Starting off the deliverance session with praise and worship is most appropriate. During this prayer time, the 'Binding Prayer' (McAlear/Brennan) should be recited aloud.

Grounding the person in Jesus can begin the ministry segment of the session… direct him/her to inhale the presence of Jesus Christ and to exhale any fear, and darkness. Brief inner healing prayer may also be done if necessary.

The team leader binds each evil spirit separately away from its ruler, with its aspects, attributes, and endowments bound to it. It is cast out in the Name of Jesus Christ and compelled to go directly to His feet.

One group of demons is cast out at a time, beginning with the weakest, ending with the demons in authority.

Ask the person being delivered to repeat the command to leave… Periodically, the leader may question the person being delivered to ascertain his/her sense of what is happening.

To be certain no one is 'hiding,' command any evil spirits that may be remaining to be bound together, to come out, and to go directly to the feet of Jesus. Inner healing prayer, which invites the Holy Spirit to fill the void left by any departing demons, is very helpful. Reception of Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, renewal of baptismal promises, and baptism in the Spirit are also fitting at this time. End with praise to God.

6. Aftercare

Conscientious ministry applies follow-up consisting of more inner healing prayer, dialogue, and ample encouragement… A phone call to check on him/her can do wonders… A ministry of 'befriending' may be appropriate.

Shift the focus away from demons and from even the deliverance session itself… and onto personal responsibility and spiritual growth.

7. Integration

Integration is really the ultimate goal of deliverance ministry, i.e., empowering an individual to walk free from bondage in order to glorify God and serve the Body of Christ… means helping the one just delivered become involved in ministry, healthy relationships, and personal growth and development… Church youth groups, singles organizations, or… prayer communities can be tapped as resources for meeting new friends.

Theophostic Prayer

Reminiscent of healing of inner memories prayer approaches mentioned above by Agnes Sanford, June Carter Stapleton, Fr. Francis MacNutt, and others, licensed clinical psychologist Ed. Smith, D.Min., at his Alathia treatment center in Kentucky has developed a healing of memories prayer approach which incorporates deliverance from demonization as needed.

Naming his approach Theo (God) Phostic (light), Smith engages in a three-way conversation between Jesus, the client and himself throughout the counseling session. He asks Jesus questions and requests the client report "anything you see, hear or sense Jesus say or do." Teaching his method in a three-level TheoPhostic Basic, TheoPhostic Advanced, and TheoPhostic Internship format, Dr. Smith reports unusually rapid and thorough amelioration of debilitating symptoms.

Though the name “TheoPhostic” may as yet be unfamiliar to many, the method is highly applicable to ministry in either a church setting or an intervenor’s office. It requires dependence on Jesus both to reveal the cause of the client’s suffering, and to remove it. The process essentially is as follows:

1. Find the feeling (fear, anger, sadness… whatever the directee is experiencing).
2. Ask Jesus to take her to “the origin and source” of that emotion.
3. Instruct the directee not to “censor” whatever memory comes up.
4. Ask her to “look around, and tell me when you can see, hear, or sense Jesus’ presence” in the memory-scene.
5. Encourage her to “stay with the memory, all the way to the end.” (This usually involves “feeling” the pain associated with the memory.)
6. Find the “lie” embedded in the memory (it was your fault; you are too bad for God so He can never forgive you; you deserved it, etc.,).
7. Ask Jesus to bring His truth to that lie. (“Jesus, was it really her fault? What is your truth about that?”)

While appearing deceptively simple, it appears Jesus actually does minister to the person in the way requested. In this writer’s experience, release and freedom are often so rapid—and sometimes so dramatic—they have to be seen to be fully appreciated.

When demons manifest, or appear to be causing the person distress, or she reports their activity, or any symptoms of demonization appear, this writer asks if it is alright to “take action against anything which might be present which is not of God,” and then he verbally binds to silence and immobility any demonic entities presently interfering with the session. So far, when demonic activity has been present, this simple action has uniformly resulted in the spiritual directee being able to continue the session.

At an appropriate point, this writer recommends asking Jesus if now is the time to work on the demonization. The steps to do so include determining how it became attached in the first place (the opening to the spiritual directee), and taking whatever action is necessary to remove its legal right to be present, i.e., break ancestral curses, confess and repent of any past occult involvement by the directee, do TheoPhostic prayer to remove any unresolved anger or unforgiveness or whatever else Jesus reveals to the person. When this work is finished, the directee is encouraged to assert her rightful authority as one belonging to Jesus and in-dwelt by the Holy Spirit to command the demon to “go directly to the throne of Jesus for Him to do with you as He will." The demon is forbidden ever to return to the person or any other human.

Finally, the spiritual directee prays that God would seal that opening with His healing love, grace, forgiveness, etc. When it is time to expel them, Dr. Smith recommends binding together the presenting demon and all others present, ordering the one presenting to speak for and represent all others present, by verbal assertion cutting them off from all outside communication with other demonic entities, neutralizing their power, canceling their assignments, and when finished with them sending them all to the throne of Jesus for His disposition. Smith permits no disobedience of his calmly delivered commands, allows no "acting out" (cursing, vomiting, etc.), forbids any demon speaking to lie, and requires it to speak only what Jesus desires it to reveal at the present time. Smith's method is clearly explained and repeatedly demonstrated with DID and ritual abuse clients presently in therapy with him, in his TheoPhostic Advanced and TheoPhostic Internship workshops.

Conclusion

It is this writer's understanding the Christian scriptures assert in the latter days evil, unclean, lying, deceiving spirits will flood the land causing havoc and doing their best to lead people into depravity while destroying their faith.

It is this writer's belief, from working with a seemingly never ending supply of sexually abused and family traumatized individuals, most of whom are Christians, and from the reports contained in literally each night's evening newspaper depicting a real-life epidemic of rampant abortion, physical and sexual abuse, assault and trauma, and the obviously growing incidence of ritual abuse, those latter days may now be upon us.

Be that as it may, those desiring to help ritual abuse survivors achieve emotional recovery and freedom are faced today with a choice. Lay leaders, pastors, spiritual directors, counselors, social workers, psychologists, psychiatrists —all of us can either open our eyes, look around, compare what we see in our offices to the now hundreds of published juried articles about healing prayer, and then decide to learn about it and do something about it… or we can continue as for the most part we have in the past, and play it safe by ignoring and denying what the evidence is now making clear.

This chapter is written to encourage those willing to begin exploring this long neglected but increasingly visible aspect of human healing. It presents information, provides references for further information, and describes real-life examples and approaches to help people integrate into their professional armamentarium an intervention strategy which deals specifically with a critical spiritual aspect of helping survivors heal from ritual abuse… prayer for inner healing of memories, and deliverance.

What I mean by evangelical… is uncomplicated. I'm using it the way most Christian people in the pews are understanding it here and now in America. I simply mean the made-in-Wheaton, Christianity Today, Moody Bible Institute, Lausanne Committee, InterVarsity, Gospel Light, Billy Graham, Southern Baptist, Zondervon type of evangelical. It involves a bit of overlapping on the right with fundamentalists and on the left with conciliar evangelicals… I am using the term in a narrow sense which does not include Pentecostals or Charismatics." Other evangelicals, particularly of the Weslyan Holiness persuasion, agree there is a second work of grace, but see personal sanctification rather than tongues as the chief validation of the experience." [42] A. “We need to be very careful in making the proper diagnosis from the clinical point of view so we don’t just throw our psychology or psychiatry out the window. We need to use the proper methods of diagnosis to assess, and then spiritually discern. Spiritual discernment goes beyond psychological testing, assessment, diagnosis, and so on. We can have DSM-IV and all the psychological tests to make the differential or proper diagnosis, but we need to go beyond that. We need the Holy Spirit’s wisdom to discern what on earth is really happening. And it’s not always very clear.”

(Ibid., pp. 40–47).

B. “Because of the spiritual nature of the demonic, we must exercise care in discerning what is an explicit demonic component and what is not. What may appear to be demonic may in reality be psychosomatic, thus requiring medical or psychological intervention. Other cases which may present as psychosomatic may in reality turn out to be demonic. The critical requirement for biblically sound diagnosis and therapy cannot be overemphasized if we are not to risk ‘directly’ addressing patients (or their illnesses or symptoms thereof) instead of demons! Thus, while there are spiritual factors behind all manifestations of sin, it would be simplistic to automatically associate behavior such as anger, guilt, and even addictions, with demons.”

CHAPTER 17

Recognizing and Treating Survivors of Abuse by Organized Criminal Groups

Alison Miller

A reality of our interconnected world of the 21st century is that organized groups abuse children for their own purposes. Such groups include cults of various religions, especially Satanic and occult groups (ritual abuse), political mind control groups of various kinds, and commercial child pornography interests. There is evidence of networking between these groups; they share children, and they share strategies. Groups who use children in child pornography often use children from multi-generational incestuous families, which are to be found in organized cults. Military mind control trainers also find cult children a ready source of potential spies and killers. In Germany Michaela Huber has found a blending of SS-style military fascist groups with Satanism. All these groups use torture and interrogation and training techniques used by military and police all over the world, e.g., for training child soldiers.

These organized abusers, whether commercial, religious or political/military, are aware that dissociation is the lynchpin of secrecy, hiding the abuse from the survivor himself. As we know, dissociation is primarily brought about by extreme physical and/or emotional pain and betrayal in early childhood. These groups deliberately create dissociative disorders in children in order to be able to continue abusing and training the children without the children breaking the silence.

Organized criminal groups who abuse children, whether religious, occult, political, or commercial, tend to train their children in similar ways. Because of this, when survivors of these groups enter psychotherapy, they often present certain predictable problems. This article focuses on the nature of the training of children by organized abusive groups, and on the practical problems of dealing with survivors of this abuse in psychotherapy.

The purpose of understanding this is still to engage in ethical and effective psychotherapy.

It can be very helpful to know the basics about the nature of the personality systems created by organized abuse, as well as about the dangers of ongoing contact with the perpetrators. Knowing the basics can save a lot of therapy time and can help our clients feel understood. But don't get hung up in the details of sophisticated "programming." Just get to know your client, care about him or her, develop a trusting relationship, and use the specialized knowledge I am providing here in the context of overall competent DID therapy.

The suggestions for treatment in this chapter are general guidelines for recognizing and working with survivors of organized criminal child abuse. They are not to be put into practice without adequate training and supervision. A therapist using these methods must already have good basic training and well-developed understanding of and experience with treating trauma and dissociative disorders.

Part 1: The Structured Personality System of the Survivor

The personality systems of ritual abuse and mind control survivors are different from those of dissociative individuals whose abuse has been less systematic.

Characteristics of these systems often include:

An internal structure in which the alters are placed

A complex inner world

Observer and recorder alters who know everything that has happened to the person

Internal filing systems for memories, especially of training sessions

A hierarchy of alters

Alters with "jobs"

Alters who believe they are animals or demons or aliens

Internal calendars with "jobs" to be done on certain dates

Spinner alters who send out feelings or impulses to the rest of the system

Deliberately placed "triggers" for learned behaviors

"Booby traps" of despair or suicidality triggered by talking about the abuse

Recycling of memories and reappearance of trained behaviors

Reported use of technologies in training

Certain predictable mental disorders as side effects of training

If you have a client who has most or all of these characteristics, you may suspect he or she has been abused by an organized criminal group. Though, of course, you will refrain from suggesting it until and unless the client brings it up.

1. An Internal Structure

Ritual abuse survivors have been called “structured” as opposed to “reactive” multiples (persons with Dissociative Identity Disorder) because very often their deliberately created personalities have been organized into some kind of an internal structure, shaped like a pyramid, or a prism, or a tetrahedron, etc. This is also true for mind control survivors. The structures that are created by the group are fixed by the trainer and the specific group. These are purposefully made to keep it easy for the trainers to retrain alters over time. In some groups they are constructed using geometric shapes, others use trees, others use the Kabalah. Each substructure has a department head, and workers. Colors and symbols are used to categorize different groups of alters in the structure. There is also a dump, for discarded or untrainable alters.

Once a therapist knows the physical look to a structure (which may be the last thing you ever find out) it makes it easier to work your way through the system. Unfortunately only the internal department heads actually know what the structure is based on, and it takes time to establish trust with these alters. If a client is talking about an internal geometric structure, it is a “red flag” for organized criminal abuse. Structures are used for perpetrating groups to locate specific alters, and to call out specific combinations of alters for certain tasks. Often there are codes for each space in the structure or matrix.

In a typical group, an original group of “foundational” alters are split off between the ages of 6 weeks and 6 months by means of loud noises, bright lights, small electric shocks, and other noxious and shocking stimuli, so that by the age of 6 months the child has at minimum 18–20 alters. Each alter will come out in response to the trigger that created it. These infant alters are then trained to recognize their names, special colors, magical symbols, and location in the structure, which is simulated in the outside world so that the child will internalize this image of who all the alters are and where they “live” on the inside. Torture is not used in teaching the infant alters about who they are and where they live; it is a game which is fun for the child and gives him or her attention. This makes it less likely that the person will remember it in therapy, as therapists tend to go for all the traumatic events, and in any case non-traumatic events from infancy will not be available to explicit memory. This is called building the base or the foundation; it is complete by 6 to 10 months of age.

In some groups, as the child gets older, this structure is imprinted on the child's unconscious mind by training an alter to build a structure with building blocks of varying colors, and place dolls of the same colors representing the alters in their places in the structure. They are told that everyone must be kept in their places. The structure is gradually developed and elaborated over the years. Walls between the alters or alter groups prevent their communication, and taking down the walls causes alters to join. Often the builder alter is supposed to take down certain walls when the survivor gets to a certain age, so that, for example, the everyday life alters integrate with the cult-loyal ones, leaving out the pain holders. Knowing the structure can help the therapist know how many alters there are and which ones are most important to work with.

2. A Complex Inner World

Many survivors have been encouraged to create, either instead of a structure, or in addition to a structure, a complex inner world in which the alters live. It is often based on fairy tales or stories or movies which have been shown to the child. It may have frightening places in it, some copied from the outside world (e.g., a "pit" or a "torture chamber") and some created by suggestion. The internal disasters which can be triggered happen in this inner world. The trainer gives the child suggestions about the appearance of the internal world, through showing the child a picture of a tree, or a pyramid, or a house or a box, and playing games of "Let's pretend little Susy (or whatever alter is out at the time) lives in the roots of a tree."

If the internal world is frightening, the therapist can later help the client use her own imagination to redesign it and put the alters in safer places. But first it is necessary to overcome the effects of the training that dictates that everyone inside must stay in his or her place.

A "reactive multiple" (a survivor whose alters were not deliberately created by an organized group) may also have a structure, but it is simply a place for the alters to "live" inside, such as a house. Sometimes places or structures inside are copies of outside places, including places where abuse happened. This is true for both structured and reactive multiples, but many whose abuse was not perpetrated by an organized group have no inner world at all, and alters when not "out" simply disappear into blackness or exercise an effect on the person's emotions without being internally visible.

3. Observer and Recorder Alters

Survivors of organized abuse often have observer alters (often known to therapists as Inner Self-Helpers) who are aware of and remember everything that happens to the child. Often observer or recorder alters are told that they can see everything but cannot and must not act in the outside world. They may believe they are non-human, e.g., aliens or whales or spirits. These alters, who are created very early, can be very helpful in accessing memories for processing.

There may also be "floating alters." These are not deliberately created parts of the system, but alters that were accidentally split off at the same time as others. They are able to float around the system learning everything they can, often unnoticed by the other alters. Since the perpetrating group is unaware of them, they don't get hurt unless they get in the way accidentally or they choose to take someone's pain. They can be an incredible source of information about the system and about what has happened. Reactive multiples also have floating alters.

4. Internal Filing Systems

Many survivors of organized abuse, particularly ritual abuse and mind control, have internal filing systems, usually with a "control room," files, a file manager or controller, and labels on the files which refer to such things as the type of training, age, and place where it was done. When you come to working with the memories, it is very important to work with the file manager alters. In some cases, there are "program codes" which when said in the right order will make certain programs or pieces of training cease to work.

5. A Hierarchy of Alters

The alters within most deliberately created systems are hierarchically organized. There are generally levels or layers, and each level has a boss, who reports to someone on the next higher level. There are often several alters with the same name but different functions, usually on different levels. The ones in charge usually have titles representing their authority. In political systems there are captains, leaders, and soldiers; in ritual systems there are demons, Satans, high priests or priestesses, and representations of family members who have authority in the person's life. Each layer in a Satanic system usually includes a Satan, a few demons, a high priest or priestess, a copy of the primary trainer, and various guards. Authoritative alters have the job of disciplining others under them for disobedience (such as talking about the abuse). If the disciplinarian on one level fails to do his job, the discipline moves up to a higher level. There are usually also fail-safe alters outside the "layers" to deal with the problem if the ones in charge prove disloyal. These have been told they are such entities as ghosts, chameleons (who can impersonate other alters), deceivers, and spiritual guides.

The alters in charge of the system are always watching what goes on in the outside world, but rarely intervene directly at first. The therapist can “talk through” the system to them, as they are listening. In doing therapy with a survivor of organized abuse, your objective is to get through to the alters in charge of the hierarchy and convince them that they have been deceived. They often believe they know everything about what has happened to the person (not true), and have never been hurt; they may believe that they don’t belong to the body at all. Gently exposing their false beliefs, as you talk to alters with increasing authority, gradually builds trust and helps the client see what has really happened to them. You cannot succeed in therapy with a survivor of organized abuse unless the alters in charge of the hierarchy at first allow you to proceed, and later actively cooperate with you. Although these alters have observed the “real” world, they have rarely been out in it, and have very limited experience of anything in life other than group events and training. Their rewards have been sex, drugs, and power; they know nothing of love or caring or pets or snow or anything else positive in life. Other alters can share these positive experiences with them to help them see what they have been missing.

6. Alters with “Jobs”

All alters in a deliberately created system have jobs to do, and doing one’s job is the most important expectation, after compliance and silence. Categories of jobs include: learning languages, guarding secure information, various sexual behaviors, killing and dissecting and sacrificing, holding physical and emotional pain, doing magik, reactivating training, and worship.

Gatekeepers are special kinds of guards. They are told they are in control of the mind and all emotions. They work in combination with those in charge of the Pain. A gatekeeper is never hurt himself after his initial creation or “birth,” holds feelings and memories back, and observes everything that happens.

Garbage Kids are alters who wouldn’t comply in training, or couldn’t learn quickly enough. They may have been discarded by being taken to the point of death or unconsciousness via drugs or severe electric shock, or they may have just never been called out again after their failure. Other alters may believe these ones are dead, while higher-ups may believe these alters are failures so are not worth consideration. Often garbage kids are hidden pain-holders, and continue to participate in some memories. It is important to seek them out so that they can contribute when memories are being processed. If they have been “killed,” they are stuck in the memory of being unconscious, rather than actually destroyed.

7. Non-human Alters

Organized abusers often want alters to believe they are anything other than parts of an abused child. One simple way of creating non-human alters is to split off an alter by inflicting pain while the child is exposed to circumstances which lead her to believe she is not human. For example, the child is given a hallucinogenic drug while suggestions are made about demons, and people are wearing demon costumes. When the new alter appears, she is shown a “mirror” with a picture of a demon on it and told this is her. Or the child is put in a cage with a fierce dog, and only fed dog food when she begs for it like a dog. Or the child is given a paralyzing drug so that she cannot move, shown movies about aliens, and told she is an alien who can observe this world but cannot act in it.

The purpose of the demon alters is to keep the child in line (ensure compliance) by the constant fear of being grabbed and harmed by a demon. They represent actual demons which the group believes in, just as idols may represent deities in the Hindu faith. If the child is about to disclose something to an outsider, a demon will come up and scare him. The demons are set up in a hierarchy. They are given names of actual demons. Demon alters are led to believe they are entirely evil and are therefore not loveable by anyone, except Satan. They also believe they are very ugly so that anyone from outside will be afraid of them.

Animal alters are used for purposes consonant with that animal’s nature, such as a cat for going through the bushes at night. Alters who believe they are large animals such as dogs are also used for sexual intercourse with real animals. Alters who believe they are aliens or ghosts typically believe they don’t belong to the body; they don’t feel the body’s pain, and they are very useful when the person requires punishment such as self-harm or suicide attempts. They usually believe they will live on if the body dies, since they think their “internal bodies” are the real ones.

8. Internal Calendars

If the group has a long-term agenda—and most ritual and political groups do—there are alters who hold a “calendar” which lays out the “jobs” to be done on certain dates. Regular ritual dates are part of the calendar for a ritual abuse survivor. They are learned in a normal everyday way, like learning the dates of your birthday and Christmas. Some survivors also have alters who hold future dates such as the return of Satan (in 2012), or the date of the political group’s battle to take over the world. In addition, some groups implant personal dates (years) in which survivors are to return to the group, integrate real-life alters with cult-loyal alters, commit suicide or become ill.

There are often internal punishments, such as a very annoying sound, spinning, or a sensation of being shocked, if the person does not return when told to.

9. Spinner Alters Who Send Out Feelings or Impulses to the Rest of the System

Cults and mind control agencies use physical spinning of the child a great deal. It is meant initially as a form of compliance training; a baby is spun on a turntable, along with hearing an annoying noise, until it stops crying. This process is repeated many times, using each alter. After that, spinning to the point of making the child physically ill is used extensively in the first two years of life every time the child is disobedient. A spinning chair is used at later ages.

The vestibular (balance) system in the brain is closely connected with the limbic system, and spinning can have the effect of spreading post-traumatic effects throughout the personality system. In organized abuse, spinning is used to teach the child's alters to come forward quickly and take parts of the child's pain, fear and nausea, as well as to share the lesson being taught at the time. The child learns to involve a specified group of alters in a spin.

A specific training or "program" is given to a group of alters, who each hold a part of the training. If the program goes into effect, all these alters are involved through internal spinning by a spinner alter. If the lesson is one that the trainer does not want a single alter to hold, such as suicide, or homicide, all the alters in the training group must be activated in order for the target behavior to take place. This is a security measure, so that one alter can not kill the entire system, or one alter cannot kill another member of the group. This is why the majority of people only injure themselves rather than die in their suicide attempts.

Spinner alters have the job of sending out feelings or impulses to the rest of the alters, the host, or a group of selected alters. Often when a certain training is in operation, the survivor feels dizzy, as though something or someone is "spinning" inside her head. If this is happening, ask to speak to the alter who is maintaining or distributing the spin, and ask her to stop spinning. If she is unable to do so, talk to whoever is making her spin. When a survivor feels spinning, it is because the memory of an abuse which involved extreme spinning has been triggered. Usually this was in the first year of life.

"Spin programming" is a misnomer. Spinning is used very generally, in many kinds of training, just as torture and rape and disgusting creatures. We do not speak of "rape programming" or "rat programming" or "asphyxiation programming." Some survivors report having been spun on a huge Catherine Wheel, sometimes going in and out of water. This is known to have been used in political torture.

10. Deliberately Placed Triggers

The basic training (compliance, loyalty and silence) has been given to all alters, and cannot be turned off. However, many other specific trained behaviors such as self-harm or disrupting therapy have “on” and “off” triggers or switches. There are not only external triggers, such as certain touches or sounds or words, but there may be internal switches. These behaviors can be stopped if the therapist can either speak with the alters responsible and ask them to turn off the programs or learned behaviors, or use group-created triggers to turn them off. Triggers are installed using drugs and punishment, repeated over and over while the child is in a semi-conscious state.

If you use triggers (e.g., special touches) make sure that your client has confirmed what effect they will have on her. Some of the triggers are common to many survivors, but some are unique. The only thing that all triggers have in common is that they are installed at acupressure points. (For this reason, acupressure techniques can cause unexpected effects in this population.) Sometimes the same trigger will activate or turn off different behaviors in different survivors, so be careful in using triggers. Turning off a behavior through a trigger does not mean it will not recur. Permanently deactivating the training can only be done by working through the training memory with all involved alters.

It is possible for the therapist or the client to use group-created triggers for helpful purposes. For example, an alter trained not to feel pain can reduce the pain resulting from a re-abusive group contact. An alter trained to put other alters to sleep can put to sleep alters who are programmed to go to group meetings or to harm the body. An alter trained to make the others forget events can make the alters who are supposed to report to the group what they have disclosed forget having talked about the memories.

It must be remembered, however, that use of triggers by the therapist, or use of force by certain alters of the client on other alters will be experienced by the client as coercive if the alters being triggered do not consent. Cooperation is always to be preferred to coercion, and can often be achieved. For example, an alter who is trained to harm or kill the body may agree to be put to sleep or internally isolated until the next therapy session, when the self-harm program may be undone. It is preferable to convince the internal alters to do these things rather than having the therapist do it. Sometimes it may be necessary for the therapist to use touch triggers to turn off dangerous behaviors. Before this is done, an alter should be out who doesn’t mind being touched, and who understands that the therapist is not a group member just because s/he knows about triggers.

11. Booby Traps

“Booby traps” are dangerous internal events that are triggered to happen if the client (with or without a therapist) messes with her own training, and/or becomes aware of memories she is not supposed to know. They include such things as suicide attempts, serious self-harm, or falling into terrible depression. Booby traps are caused by flooding of the feelings from very emotionally traumatic memories without the content. The memories will be of the death of a person or animal they love, and/or of abandonment by “God” and by family members, being told they are worthless and no one can love them, even God, and no one can save them.

The booby traps are deliberately created as part of the training. They create unbearable feelings, and offer relief from these feelings through becoming catatonic or killing oneself. A booby trap can be set off without the knowledge of the host. The host may leave a therapy session feeling just fine, then go and jump off a building. Because of such traps it is very important to go very slowly in therapy with survivors of this kind of abuse.

12. Recycling of Memories and Reappearance of Trained Behaviors

A recycler alter is one who has been trained to keep a small piece of each training memory, so that the survivor will be unable to recover the entire memory and thereby undo the training. The recycler may be given a name like Piece Keeper or Puzzle Maker or Collector, and will be instructed to do something with the pieces, which are not kept in the files with the rest of the memories. When the therapist and client are ready to go through the training memories and undo the effects of the training, it is essential to find any recycler alters and ask them to put in their pieces as well. Otherwise, the memories which have been processed will be re-dissociated and the training will begin to work again.

13. Technologies Used for Deception and Training

Stage magic is used extensively to create non-human alters and simulate various false scenarios such as murders or alien abductions. Trapdoors, drugs, hypnosis, and various kinds of illusions are used.

In addition, specific technologies which have been reported by survivors include:

- various spinning devices
- a red light flashing machine normally used for neurofeedback
- a helmet which administers small electric shocks to different areas of the head (originally developed by a Canadian inventor for use with epilepsy)
- a small soundproof and light-proof box (“deprivation room”)
- a sound-emitting machine normally used for testing hearing, used at very high volume to create aversive memories which are later used as booby traps for internal punishment
- a bed equipped with electrodes (“electronic board”) to teach touch triggers virtual reality glasses

14. Mental Disorders as Side Effects

Various kinds of mental illness occur when for some reason the dissociation in the personality system breaks down. In survivors of organized abuse, there are some predictable symptoms.

Post-traumatic Stress Disorder: The flooding, flashbacks, and self-harm of some of the internal punishments give the client an extreme case of post-traumatic stress disorder. This can also be caused by early and incomplete attempts at memory work by the client and/or the therapist.

Eating Disorders: The child is fed raw flesh, feces and urine, and cookies that contain bugs instead of chocolate chips. This is necessary to train them to eat disgusting things in rituals. Eating disorders often occur as a side effect.

Bathroom Problems: There may also be difficulties with urination and defecation (from having to hold these back in sexual or ritual training), and fear of bathrooms or showers (because of near drowning experiences). A combination of all these things is a sign of the kind of experiences the child may have gone through.

Sleep Disturbance: Alters are also trained to stay awake by being stuck in a cage or tied to a stake for a very long time, being painfully prodded awake if she falls asleep. This is done because most ceremonies take place after midnight, so the child must learn to be awake for ceremonies and in school the next day. There is, of course, also sleep disturbance from being sexually abused at night.

Rapid Switching: This occurs when something has gone wrong with the internal “gate control mechanism,” or sometimes when the person is so anxious that no alter wants to stay on the outside for long. Some groups deliberately induce it and train alters to do it to appear crazy. The effect is an inability to complete a thought or sentence, which looks like the schizophrenic “word salad.”

Scrambled Speech and Perceptions: Scrambled speech is taught using hallucinogenic drugs and microphones that cut in and out, speaking to the child in several languages. It can also be done using a rapid switch between deaf alters popping in and out, along with any alter who speaks other languages. The purpose is to confuse the host, and to prevent outsiders from getting to close to important information or alters.

Alters’ Identity Confusion: Sometimes alters have been told they are specific outside people, such as rock stars or politicians, or are to take on the identities of whoever is around them. One purpose of this is for training them to impersonate outsiders. If the client is hearing voices who claim to be famous people, she appears to be schizophrenic.

Addictions: Since drugs are commonly used as part of the abuse, survivors easily become addicted to various drugs. Sometimes their drug dealer is a “watcher” or representative or the abusing group.

Part 2: Training of Children

Many organized criminal abuser groups deliberately create alter personalities in infants, and use behavioral conditioning sequences to train these alters to behave in certain ways without the host personality being aware of it. In some groups, this is called “programming,” while in others it is simply “training.” Drugs, extreme arousal, pain, and life-threatening situations are used, as well as movies, music, stories, and virtual reality technology. The memory of a training situation is often split between several alters, so that the alters who have to produce the programmed behavior are amnestic for the conditioning sequence. The effect is like that of a post-hypnotic suggestion. Alters are instructed to “do their jobs” in response to specific conditioned stimuli or “triggers.”

This paper addresses issues with people raised as young children in perpetrating groups. The groups believe it is impossible to “split” a person into alters after the age of nine. People who are recruited as teens or adults do not necessarily have dissociative disorders, though they may suffer from Post-traumatic Stress Disorder.

The most basic lessons, which the child raised in such a group is taught when he or she is under two years of age, are (1) total compliance, (2) loyalty to the group, and (3) silence. All alters receive this training, which is reinforced throughout life. In addition, specific alters are given specific jobs, and are taught to do them to the best of their ability. These jobs include re-contacting the offending group, punishing deviant alters, and interfering with relationships and therapy. If the training breaks down in any way, certain alters are trained to re-contact the group, who will reinforce the lessons taught earlier. Alters are also trained in sexual and violent offending.

Specific trained behaviors or “programs” can be activated by remembering the abuse, talking about the abuse, everyday “accidental” triggers (words, touches, sounds, sights), deliberate triggers provided by group members, events and dates. The host personality is often unaware of why he or she is behaving in these ways, and feels powerless to counteract it. This is because the alter “out” in the world is not the one in control of the behavior. The perpetrators are capable of attaching conditioned responses (such as falling asleep, or becoming violent, or feeling great pain) to particular events, such as entering the therapist’s office, or working through specific memories.

Specific types of training are recognizable by their effects. When a specific training is in operation, the survivor often feels dizzy, as though something is "spinning" inside her head. A spinning alter, who is not herself affected by the specific training, may be using the spin to distribute the effects of the training to other alters.

The following are some types of training which you may expect to encounter in survivors of organized abuse:

1. Compliance and Loyalty Training

This is done with "horrible examples" of what happens to "traitors": severe punishment for disobedience, vows signed in blood by important alters, forced perpetration, and threats to kill loved ones. If the perpetrators discover that a survivor has been talking to an outsider, the group will reinforce the loyalty and obedience training through repetitions of elements of the original training.

The most important ways to combat loyalty and obedience training are to show the survivor, especially the loyal alters who are in charge of the personality system, the ways in which they have been deceived. If the client is currently safe, emphasize that behaviors which got her "in trouble" years ago will no longer get her in trouble. Show the alters who are still loyal to the group the ways in which the perpetrators have tricked and deceived them, so that they will become justifiably angry. Be absolutely sure the client is currently safe before you tell her she is; otherwise she will be severely punished and will look upon you as a liar. Many survivors are unaware that they are still in contact with their perpetrators.

2. Silence and "Shutdown" Training

Almost all training sessions have a "Don't Talk" component built into them, usually in the form of a threat to the life of the survivor and/or others whom the survivor loves (family, friends, therapist, therapist's family). When a survivor stops in the middle of telling you something and appears to be listening internally, you can suspect that another alter is telling her not to talk or threatening her. When she changes the subject, or becomes afraid, or tries to leave when certain things are asked, or cannot speak at all, shutdown training is taking effect.

Besides the general training not to disclose anything about the group, there are several specific kinds of training designed to make the survivor not talk. These include training to believe it was a dream, electroshock after an event to make the survivor forget, training to disbelieve her own memories, training to believe the group overhears everything the survivor says (done with a hidden microphone), training to believe that a creature or device placed inside the survivor will destroy her if she talks, and training not to appear dissociative, usually done with administration of an antipsychotic drug. This latter training means that many survivors always have the host personality at the front, and other parts cannot come out directly. It is still possible to work with the parts via the host communicating with them.

Silence and shutdown training is all based on lies and trickery, but nevertheless it presents a considerable barrier to effective therapy. Some of this training (e.g., to forget, and to disbelieve her own memories) could potentially make a client deny what she has previously disclosed, and accuse the therapist of planting false memories. When this is coupled with present-day re-abuse and threats to the client and others, a survivor could feel she has no alternative but to recant.

It is therefore very important to access at least the knowledge portion of the memories of some of this training, so that the client can see how and when she has been deceived. Again, showing the survivor, especially the alters in charge of the system, the perpetrators' deceptions, is crucial to getting these alters to work in therapy. It is, of course, very important that you not suggest to the client what may have happened to her to make her believe the irrational things such as "The group knows everything I think." But ask the system to show the significant alters the trickery behind each belief.

3. Training in Self-Punishment for Disobedience or Talking

If a survivor disobeys the group, usually by disclosing secret information, various groups of alters will act on their training to punish the survivor. Methods include self-harm, suicide attempts, insomnia, eating disorders, sickness, and various kinds of flooding programs, including depression, emotional lability, offender memories, and physical pain or nausea.

The self-harm and suicide training results from behavioral conditioning. Children and adults are generally taught several specific ways of harming and of killing themselves, down to the details of how many of each kind of pill to take. Self-harm programs are specific, e.g., cutting or burning. These behaviors are triggered by disobedience, and can be turned on and off with triggers. In contrast to people who harm themselves in order to feel pain, in programmed self-harm the alters who inflict the pain are generally not the ones who feel it. Usually the suicide attempts are not serious, or are aborted at the last minute by other alters, as the client is not permitted to die until the group gives her permission. The risk of completed suicide is higher if the client is still in contact with the perpetrating group, and increases in this situation as she progresses in therapy, as she becomes less useful to the group and more of a security risk.

Another kind of self-punishment uses flashbacks of various parts of traumatic memories to cause extreme discomfort in the survivor. This includes physical pain, flooding with emotions, hallucinatory flashbacks, memories of having to perpetrate, and disasters happening to the internal world (done by destroying the child's model of the "world" while the child is shaken, almost drowned, or blown around).

The most effective treatment for all kinds of self-punishment is to ask to talk to the alter who is inflicting the punishment, ask them why they are doing this, and then negotiate to get them to stop. If this alter is obeying someone else inside, you need to speak with the one giving them orders, and work your way up the hierarchy until you find someone who has authority and will cooperate with you.

Sometimes the internal events which cause flooding appear to the alters to be mechanistic. An alter "presses a button" inside, and the client immediately experiences a horrible ongoing noise, or a sensation of electric shock, or continuous flashbacks of some awful event. Mechanistic concepts can be countered with other mechanistic concepts. If there is a "wire" attached to the "button," have the client cut the wire. If an internal "tap" is "leaking," add some more plumbing and allow it to leak into a large sealed container.

4. Training Which Facilitates Continued Access by Perpetrators

In some cases, the survivor has alters who are continuing to be active in a local group without the knowledge of the host. With ritual abuse, there are alters who are supposed to attend rituals on specified dates. These include "Hallmark holidays," such as the survivor's own birthday, family birthdays and anniversaries, and Mother's Day. They also include occult holidays belonging to the group, such as full moons, blue moons, Satanic Revels, the Feast of the Beast, Beltane, Candlemas, and dates specific to various ethnic groups. Satanic groups of course celebrate Christmas and Easter with reversals of the Christian ceremonies, including the "black mass."

a. Training to Report Disclosures to the Perpetrators

Most survivors have alters whose jobs begin when the client talks to an outsider about her dissociative disorder or her abuse. They have to report to the group what she has disclosed, and to make her return for punishment and retraining. This is the kind of training which creates the most danger for the client, and it will "kick in" as soon as the client discloses anything of any significance. The alters who report are trained to believe that the group knows whatever they have said or done, so they are afraid they will be punished if they do not report. There may be a person who typically telephones the client, or who the client telephones for debriefing, immediately following a therapy session. Identifying who this is may help the client recognize who is and isn't safe.

In some cases the client is completely out of touch with the original perpetrators and does not know how to contact them; in other cases the host and other disloyal alters are strong enough to prevent group-loyal alters from acting on this training. But in many cases the host is unaware, and if the client's family members are among the perpetrators (which is often the case), the client is immediately endangered if she discloses anything significant in therapy. The "reporting" alters are supposed to telephone a group member, usually a family member, if the client discloses anything of significance. As the survivor moves to different locations around the country, her reporting training can be attached to specific individuals in each location to whom she must report. She is supposed to report any change of location. During the reporting phone call, the perpetrator calls out alters and gives them specific instructions, such as to come to a certain place or to attempt suicide. See the later section on "Maintaining the Client's Safety" for tips on how to deal with reporter alters.

b. Training to Return to the Perpetrating Group

Avoiding punishment is also a major theme in the training to return to the group. There are, however, other kinds of training to make the survivor return to the group. Positive reinforcement is used. A young alter is trained to come to a perpetrator who gives him ice cream or a toy. If he doesn't come or misses an event, he is told he missed some very special reward or pleasure. In ritually abusive groups some alters, usually those who have to harm others in rituals, are trained to return for rewards. These alters experience none of the abuse, and are rewarded with massage, drugs, pleasurable (often violent) sex, money, toys, and power (e.g., to decide who gets hurt). Sometimes they are told they don't belong to the same body as the alters who are harmed. The alters who are supposed to return for the survivor's personal birthday are often of this type. These alters really want to go back to the group, and this desire can only be stopped by showing them how they were tricked, and eventually having them feel the pain of what has happened to other alters at group events. Rewards are tailored to what the individual finds pleasurable. The reward aspect of the group often doesn't come out in therapy, because it can be very embarrassing for the survivor to talk about it, and because she feels great guilt for enjoying these things.

The groups also use the client's empathy and compassion to make her return. They tell the child that she has to return to save a younger sibling or friend from being killed. (This is even used to get a member to attend the murder of the person they want to save!) The alters who have this training will feel a desperate need to return to the group, feeling that something awful will happen to someone if they don’t. This kind of threat is frequently made to ensure the obedience of survivors who are in therapy.

The reality is that people are tortured and sometimes killed at most cult ceremonies, not just ones that happen without the client present. If someone else is to be punished because of the client’s disobedience, it will only happen when the client is attending to watch and take part in the event. It will not happen if she is not there. Help your client realize the logic of this.

c. Training To Respond to Access Triggers

Even when the client is not returning to the group of her own free will, she may often continue to be accessed by the group (if it is local) because of other training. Most access training has specific auditory triggers, such as a certain number of rings on the phone, the honk of a car horn, or a beeping sound, or hand signals, words or touches. Young child alters are trained to answer the door or the phone through games and rewards. There may be special knocks or rings to indicate the call is for them. More violent groups may use electroshock and other punishments for not answering the phone, and may have “Satan” on the other end of the phone to enforce this. A series of beeps on the phone (made with a telephone keypad) may convey a message to a specific alter. Less sophisticated groups may make an alter deliberately addicted to narcotic drugs at age 9 or 10. This alter is conditioned to feel withdrawal and go outside at the sound of a car horn (or dog whistle, etc.) to get the drugs she needs. The group may then create a new addiction later in life to keep the client returning to them.

“Come when called” training involves punishment if the alter doesn’t come, and reward if she does: simple conditioning. Training to be unable to run from an approaching perpetrator is done with small doses of anesthetic, which makes the alter’s body feel so heavy she is unable to move.

In Satanic groups, alters are taught that the left side of the body is owned by Satan, and they must respond when he calls. During ceremonies a child is always tapped on the left shoulder when presented to the Master, who then places his hand on the left shoulder and gives commands. Because of this, for many survivors, a single touch on the left shoulder with the alter’s name is then enough to call out any alter. See the later section of this paper on “Deliberately Placed Triggers” for guidelines on when a therapist may use these touch triggers with a client.

During a recall, alters are interrogated for information about what they may have disclosed. Disobedient alters are punished by violence or rape, then sent away inside. Dormant alters who are “backups” for those who have become disobedient are activated and given the jobs of the punished alters, which they have already been taught. Recalls are horrible for a client, but can actually give a therapist clues about what training the client has and which alters are involved in it. With one client who has constantly been harassed, each time I have found "new" alters it turns out that they have been activated by the perpetrating group and thus have become available to be found by the therapist.

5. Training to Disrupt Relationships

These groups want their victims to have relationships only with them, so there is training to undermine the survivor's relationships, especially with persons who could obtain hidden information or assist the survivor to become a "traitor." Some of this is general, and some of it is specific to relationships with such persons as physicians, therapists, police, and clergy. Some of the training involves harming or killing other people, so it can be dangerous. If the ritually abused client suddenly distrusts (or fears, or tries to seduce) her therapist or friend or physician with no apparent reason, this kind of training may be operating. For some survivors, the "off switch" for the training to interfere with any relationship is to hold the person's head and make it nod, then trace on their forehead the initial of the person they are to like or trust again.

Infants in cults are deliberately bonded to the group rather than to the mother. To break the maternal bond, the child is passed around between the group members. The child is taken out of the home, and can't see the mother except at a distance. It is teased by being shown the mother at a distance, and told "If she loved you, she'd be with you." The baby is made excited—"Mommy's coming." Then Mommy comes and walks right past. The length of time the baby is kept away from the home is how long it takes to break the bond with mother. So the child never really trusts the mother again. The bond is made deliberately in the first two weeks, with the mother and the trainer. Then later the one with the mother is broken. The trainer will always be the rescuer.

Persons the child might want to trust, such as non-offending parents, police, clergy, teachers, school counselors, therapists, and non-offending parents, are frequently impersonated by cult members who abuse the child.

If a child is being severely abused by a group, physicians are involved in the group to repair any physical damage. The group's doctor will ask the child what happened to her, then if she talks, will painfully rape and/or electroshock her, telling her that he doesn't believe her. Until these memories have been worked through, the survivor will resist medical exams after being abused in current life. Training not to trust police involves the child being called a perpetrator and put in a simulated jail where people in police uniforms or other "inmates" abuse her. In ritually abusive Satanic and occult groups, there is training against religion, including churches, ministers or pastors, and God. This training prevents the survivor reaching out to more positive religious groups for help. “God” and “Jesus” are frequently impersonated in very unpleasant ways when the child is very young.

Training not to trust therapists often involves the child being called “crazy” and put in a simulated mental hospital where she receives electroshock and strong antipsychotic medicine. Children are also trained not to look at therapists by therapist impersonators putting on devil masks and horns while they abuse the child. The training not to look at a therapist sets the stage for impersonation of the survivor’s actual therapists in later life. Retraining of a client who is in therapy builds on the old training to interfere with relationships in therapy.

If the client is in current contact with the group, other behaviors may be triggered which disrupt therapy, such as falling asleep in session, or inability to speak. There are often alters who are trained to distract a therapist, so that he or she won’t get to the important information. These are often “cute” child alters. They can waste a lot of a therapist’s time. Others bring up current life issues. Watch for sudden changes of subject.

It takes time for an abused person to build trust, even when they have not been trained not to trust anyone and trained specifically not to trust therapists. Also, the client may well have been brought up with dissociative parents who change suddenly, so she will be expecting you to change as they do. The best antidote to the “Don’t Trust” training is to be consistent, keep good boundaries, and keep caring about your client. There is no substitute for time in building trust.

6. Training To Discredit the Survivor and/or Therapist

False Memories: Training involves a lot of trickery. For example, the child is led to believe she has witnessed the murder of someone she knows, who has actually moved to live somewhere else. Or she sees someone being killed (an unregistered child or a doll) but is drugged and confused, and believes it to be whoever the group tells her it is. Never be sure that what a client reports to you is what actually happened. Remember that you are dealing with memories of child alters, who under conditions of drugs, hypnosis and torture experienced events involving deliberate falsification.

Cover Memories: The group deliberately simulates impossible or highly unlikely things, such as an abduction by aliens, and instructs certain alters to make the survivor remember these events if s/he starts to remember other group events. The key to dealing with such memories is treat them like any other memory, and when you process the entire memory you will discover where the tricks existed. For example, one of my clients discovered the “alien spaceship” was entered through a door in the cult training centre.

7. Training to Perpetrate

All ritually abused children are forced to harm and even kill animals and other people, and all adults are expected to return to the cult and participate in rituals in which people are hurt and killed. Mothers are trained to abuse their own children in specific ways. Mind control groups similarly train alters to kill, in particular producing "programmed assassins." Pornography groups train children to sexually perpetrate, often in sadistic ways, on other children. In ritual groups, children are frequently made to stab victims while an adult holds their hand over the knife. The sacrifice may be actual or simulated, but the child believes it to be real.

One of the most difficult parts of work with survivors of such groups is working through the offender memories. What is appalling is the way in which offending groups will use the child's own empathy to teach her to offend. For example, a child refuses to kill a puppy and then sees someone kill a baby "because she refused to kill the puppy."

Perpetrator memories are real. Even if some of the murders are simulated rather than real, the survivor has had the experience of believing she was killing someone. For this reason, the guilt is real, and should not be minimized. It does help the survivor to discover the way in which she was trained to hurt and kill, so she realizes she did not just do it for the thrill of it. Often the alter who does these things is initially unaware that other people have feelings; once this alter has been through some memories of being hurt, she will develop empathy and will no longer be able to enjoy doing harm. It will take some time in therapy to work out ways to deal with the guilt, to experience forgiveness, and perhaps to forgive the offenders once the client recognizes she too is an offender.

8. Training for Discarded Survivors

At times a perpetrating group decides to discard an individual, often during adolescence. This may be because the person is too rebellious, or because she remembers too much of the abuse, or because she has gathered too much attention from therapists and agencies, or because her family is moving away from the perpetrators—or simply because her use by the group was time-limited, for example in child pornography. If a person is discarded, alters are given various trainings which will lead the person down a path of self-destruction. Trained alters are locked away in internal prisons, along with their memories. Alters destined for "real life" are trained in substance abuse and promiscuity. "Booby traps" of despair and suicidality are scheduled to go off a few years down the road. The person appears to choose a negative life path in her teens and to self-destruct, but it actually results from training by the perpetrator group, whose main concern is that the person not live long enough to remember and tell what has happened.

Part 3: Psychotherapy with Survivors

In general, therapy with survivors of abuse by organized abuse follows the same general principles as any therapy with dissociative disorders. I am not going to reiterate all the things we have learned about dissociative disorder treatment, but shall emphasize some which are especially important with this special kind of survivor.

It can seem overwhelming to the therapist to work with someone with so much trauma, and so much complicated training. Remember that each change, however, small, has an effect on the whole system and can make a real difference to someone who is experiencing intense suffering.

Stage 1: Establishing Trust and Safety

With this group, more than with other dissociative clients, there will be issues with trust and with safety. Much of what I have stated above describes why these issues exist. These clients have been taught as children that they can trust no one but the perpetrators. They have been taught that the perpetrators know everything they say and do, and that they will be destroyed if they talk. They have often been taught specifically that therapists will abuse them. They have often been taught to report their disclosures to representatives of the perpetrating groups.

With regard to trust, be patient. It takes time to convince survivors that you are not going to switch into another alter or ego state and abuse them next time they see you. It takes time to convince alters that you will not hurt them, as many of the alters have known nothing but abuse and betrayal. There is no substitute for time. Tell the client that you are not dissociative (if that's the case), and that there is no one else inside who you can switch to. They grew up with people who had many different ways of being. I cannot emphasize sufficiently the importance of establishing sufficient trust before you attempt to work with the memories. Otherwise you will trigger trained alters to engage in punishment procedures or to contact the perpetrators.

It is important to note that this is long-term psychotherapy; it takes years, probably a minimum of five years, depending on the complexity of the system. It often takes two or more years to establish enough trust for the client to be able to disclose any important information. When a person's entire childhood has been filled with betrayal and deception, and she has been systematically coached to distrust people, this is not surprising.

Don't even take these clients on unless you can make a commitment for a period of several years. Funding should be available, or you should be prepared to do pro bono work for years after funding runs out. Not many people can afford ongoing psychotherapy for years.

Assessing the Client's Safety

With regard to the client's safety, it is important quite early in therapy to help the client assess her present safety. I remember my shock when my first three such clients, all at around the same time, discovered that they were still involved with the same perpetrating group!

I believe that a great many of the clients who have been deemed "unworkable" dissociative disorders, as well as those who recant and sue therapists, are organized abuse survivors who are being re-abused while in therapy. It is therefore of the utmost importance to make sure this doesn't happen. As soon as a client discloses organized abuse, ask the system whether any alters are still involved with the group. They may reply with finger signals so that the alter who lets you know is not identified by others in the system. Whether or not the client is still involved, therapeutic progress will be significantly impeded if she reports to the group on the content of the therapy sessions.

Maintaining the Client's Safety

The risk of reporting and returning is a very real one, and it exists from the start of therapy. It is of the utmost importance to disable the reporting before you begin talking about any memories.

If the client comes in announcing that they have been abused by an organized group, you may talk with them directly about reporting. Unfortunately, however, many clients come in without this awareness, and certainly without awareness of any current contact with the perpetrating group. In such a case you can perhaps emphasize two-way confidentiality—"What we do in therapy is private and confidential; I don’t tell anyone about what we talk about, and I expect that no part of you will talk to anyone about it either.”

If the client is aware that she is dissociative and has been abused by an organized group, you may ask whether there are any reporters inside, and if so whether they still know how to do their jobs. (If the perpetrating group has moved away, they may not have anyone to contact, so the client will be safe). If there are active reporting alters who have someone in the outside world to report to, you need to speak with them. Ask them why the perpetrating group needs them to report if (as they believe) the group already knows what they would say. Explain that this is a trick, and that the only way the group knows what the person does or says is by the reporting. Assure her that you do care what happens to her, and that you don’t want her to get in trouble, but the way to avoid trouble is to stop reporting. If the client assures you there is no current contact, be cautious—the part of her speaking with you may just be unaware that the contact exists. Don’t you, the therapist, trust the client about this before the client trusts you enough to tell you the truth!

Ask her if she ever got in trouble before for something the group just seemed to know. If the answer is yes, tell her to “ask inside” about whether anyone inside told the group. The answer will again usually be yes. Other alters are not supposed to be aware of the reporters, and will be surprised that they exist. Once the client begins to question what the group told her, she may be willing to try disabling the reporting. Talk to the alters in charge of the system. (Don’t worry if they refuse to come “out”; they are always listening, so just talk to them anyway). Tell them that they need to prevent the reporters from reporting, so that the client won’t be harmed. You may suggest using existing training to put the reporters to sleep during therapy sessions or to make them forget the sessions. They may be able to substitute memories of previous insignificant therapy sessions in place of what really happened. One client of mine had the reporters report to the internal copies of the abusers rather than to the real people.

Remember that some alters return for rewards. Emphasize to them that there are rewards which the group cannot give: true love and friendship, and freedom. One integrated survivor wrote: “The good thing is that I now have freedom of body and soul. I cannot ever describe to you what a trapped soul feels like, but I can say this feels a hell of a lot better.” Ask the alters who get hurt to show those who return for rewards what the punishment feels like. It is better to traumatize these alters with memories than for the whole person to be re-traumatized with new instances of abuse.

In the long run, you need to get the client to share internally the memories regarding how she was trained to return, to report, and to give the group access to her, so that all alters become aware of how she was deceived. Alters who believe the group knows everything need to be convinced that the group does not know everything. Alters who return to save someone need to learn that the group only hurts someone they love because they are present, and the person is less likely to be harmed if they don't return than if they do. Also that the group is unlikely to harm outsiders, although they frequently threaten to do so, and that the group rarely, if ever, kills people who have a known identity and connections in the outside world; they only kill unregistered children and vagrants—people who will not be discovered to be missing.

How do you get the client to the point of willingness to test the veracity of what they have always believed? It takes time to establish trust in the therapeutic relationship, and sometimes, particularly if there is reporting or current contact with the group, this time isn't available. You can suggest internal sharing—e.g., for alters who believe a particular deception practiced by the group to ask internally if anyone knows how it was done. Often there are other alters who have this information and can communicate it internally without anything being told to anyone in the outside world. Some clients have programmed barriers to internal communication; others don't.

Re-Establishing the Client's Safety

What actually happens when a survivor who has disclosed group secrets is re-contacted by the group? The survivor describes it as "getting into trouble." This means that as a minimum she is drugged, tortured, and raped. She may be forced to repeat her loyalty vows and to harm someone else to prove her loyalty. Various "lessons" she learned as a child will be repeated. In addition, alters will be commanded to carry out their jobs of self-harm, acting crazy, making the client ill, or anything else which will continue the punishment when the survivor is returned to real life. Disloyal alters may be replaced in their jobs with backups who are loyal to the group.

You can see that the access training is quite complex. It is usually held by child alters. It is important for the client's personality system to identify these alters and prevent them taking over the body until they no longer have to do their jobs. Access training is only a problem if the client is known to the local cult, which takes us back to disabling the reporting. I had a client who was not being harassed by the cult until she disclosed some of the abuse to her pastor (before I knew her), and an alter promptly did his job of reporting. She has been harassed ever since.

If your client is local, and the perpetrating group is still active, you could have a major problem with continued access. I do not have a "quick fix" for this problem. Just persist in therapy, process memories of any perpetrator re-contacts as soon as they happen, and as soon as possible work through the memories of the access training so that the triggers will no longer work. I have seen the intensity of the re-contacts grow, as the client becomes increasingly disloyal to the group. They have progressed from reinforcing lessons when an alter returns voluntarily, to kidnapping her off the street and instructing her how to kill herself, to attempting to murder her and make it look like suicide. It is important to have safe police contacts in cases such as the latter, and to work through memories which prevent the client from talking to police. Do not assume that any police will necessarily be helpful; sometimes the police officers who volunteer to deal with this kind of case are those who have some involvement with the perpetrating group.

It's important for a therapist to be aware that he or she may be impersonated by a member of the perpetrating group, especially if the client is local. Some group members have alters trained to mimic and even believe they are other people who look somewhat like them, and these alters are used to impersonate current therapists and abuse drugged clients. It will be done in your office, if possible, and of course the perpetrating groups have locksmiths. A monitored alarm system is your best protection against it happening in your office, but does not prevent your office as well as you being simulated.

If your client suddenly becomes hostile or afraid of you or your office, suspect impersonation. If your client comes up with "memories" of seeing you when you are on holiday, or being abused by you, or having an argument with you—anything which you know did not happen—suspect that access is happening and you are being impersonated.

If you know that there is current group contact, have the client select something in your physical appearance, voice, or even odor, by which she will be able to recognize to tell you apart from the impersonator. Good therapeutic boundaries are also important in order to minimize the danger of the client believing that the impersonator is you. Tell the client that you will not call her at home unless you are returning her call, and that you will never just drop by her home. Do not give your client your home phone number, or you may find that alters trained to harass you may be calling at all hours of the night. If the client tries to seduce you, document it and tell a colleague immediately.

If your client has been abused by someone impersonating you, it is important to work through the memory as soon as possible; otherwise the client will continue to believe that you abused her, and may drop out of therapy or accuse you of abuse. If she is afraid to be alone with you, have her bring in a support person while the memory of the re-abuse is accessed.

Maintaining Your Own Safety

Do not believe threats made via the client regarding the physical safety of yourself or your family. Perpetrating groups rarely, if ever, physically harm therapists or their families. However, they may want to make the client believe that you will be harmed if she does not return. Tell her that is not the case, and work through the issue until she understands it. You may choose for your own safety to write down information you know about identities of perpetrators and actual crimes, and give it to a third party who is instructed to give it to the police and the press if anything happens to you. Then tell the client you have done that. She will send the message back to the group.

You are, however, much more at risk for complaints to your professional association and (particularly in the U.S.) lawsuits. Obviously you will abstain from leading questions. If you document what you have been told by the client, remember that you may never know what actually happened. Not everything the client remembers is literally true. These groups use trickery, stage magic, drugs and hypnosis to create memories of events which never happened as the child remembers them, including both possible and impossible events. It is possible to believe the child has been abused by such a group while not believing everything the client believes about what happened. It helps to ask alters to ask the rest of the system if they know what tricks were used. Often there are older alters who know the trickery behind the false memories, and can help the others see through it.

Many other experts, such as Alan Scheflin and Laura Brown, have given us detailed guidelines for protecting ourselves from false memory syndrome accusations. Follow their advice, and remember that FMS (false memory syndrome) accusations are much more common in cases of alleged ritual abuse than in cases of non-ritually created DID.

Stage 2: Stabilization

This stage takes as long as it takes. Establishing boundaries, working with medical personnel on medication and other health issues, and dealing with dramatic presenting problems such as self-injury and substance abuse belong to this stage. Often unstable behaviors result from premature disclosures of abuses which were supposed to be kept secret. Do not work on any memories until and unless the client is ready! Especially with clients abused by organized groups, premature memory work will only provoke destabilizing symptoms. Teach the client how to close down flashbacks, and do not ask her the content of them. Standard “safe place” work is very helpful, as well as teaching the client to deliberately dissociate unbearable feelings and flashbacks into some kind of internal container.

Stage 3: Establishing Rapport with Dominant Alters

Remember that the system of the survivor of organized abuse is a hierarchy. Before you can do effective work with it, you need to work your way up the system to speak with the alters at the top (or down to those at the bottom; sometimes Satanic systems have the authority at the bottom). These alters recognize authority and, paradoxically, like to be recognized as the authorities in the system. They are often quite lonely if they have been out of contact with the perpetrating group for some time. But they will not speak with you immediately. They will send you their minions, beginning with the lowest ranks. It is important to treat all presenting alters with kindness, compassion and respect, as those in charge are watching to see whether they can trust you. Don't spend a lot of time mapping out the alter system; it is likely to be very complex, and those in charge would be glad to waste your time doing this as then you will not get to the significant information. And don't spend a lot of time getting to know "Little Susie," as there may turn out to be dozens or even hundreds of child alters who can soak up your attention without the client improving significantly. Help them make friends inside, and teach the host and internal helpers how to meet their needs, so that you don't have to do this yourself.

Stage 4: Showing Dominant Alters How They Have Been Deceived

Tell the system throughout your work that the group to whom the hierarchy is loyal has deceived them and hurt them. Then dialogue with them about how this has happened, asking them to ask other parts of the system to show them what has been done. The alters at the top have the power to make the others give them information, and they will be surprised, shocked, and saddened at the kind of information they get! They often think they have not been abused, sometimes because they believe they have different bodies. It is quite a shock to them to learn how they were created.

Recognize how difficult it is for alters who have been raised in such a group to leave it. It has been their community, it usually includes their family, and many of them have been rewarded well for their loyalty without being abused. Their entire support system is being abandoned! If they are from a ritually abusing group, it is also their religion. Some cult groups have a very strong belief in magik. It is an actual religion, and you are not going to just get rid of ingrained beliefs overnight. Satanism is just as powerful an upbringing as, for example, Catholicism. Satanic beliefs teach the individual that she is powerful, and in therapy she may feel she has lost all her power and become depressed. If someone has spent her entire upbringing learning that Satan or Lucifer will reward her for being "good" and punish her for being “bad” (disobedient), it will take quite a while to remove this conditioning. Many therapists ignore the religion and magik, but it cannot be ignored, any more than any other important aspect of the training. Leaving it out is like removing only part of a cancerous tumor; it will eventually grow back and spread its infection throughout the system.

Stage 5: Working Through Obedience and Loyalty Training Memories

Once you have the trust of the alters in charge of the system, you begin memory work systematically, starting with their memories of being trained in obedience and loyalty.

Example

One client I have been working with for a few months had been to two other therapists. She told me that she had a personality system divided into left and right sides, and headed on the left side (deliberately structured by her Satanist abusers) by several alters named “Satan,” a copy of her mother, and a High Priestess. Although the previous therapists believed in DID and in organized abuse, they tended to side with the host and the frightened “right side” alters against the left side. The host acquired considerable strength, and was able to prevent the left side alters from returning to the abusers, who lived far away. But the system was divided against itself and was not getting better. One previous therapist had feared the left side alters and eventually fired the client because she believed she had been poisoned by some ritual abuse survivor, so the client’s belief that therapists would reject her came true. The next therapist was a psychiatrist who used medication to stabilize self-harm incidents and depression but did not work with the personality system. When the child alters began flooding with abuse memories, she suggested the host listen to these memories, which would have made things worse.

This client was aware of the nature of her abuse, but did not know what to do except continue her internal conflict. I told her I wanted to work with the alters on the left side, since no one else had. I established that the client was currently safe, and I asked the system head (via the presenting alter) to hold off on reporting for some time, promising that they would not be harmed and the group would not know what they were disclosing. I began gradually to talk with the lowest-ranked ones, who were soldiers. They expressed their distrust of all therapists, and I sympathized with them, encouraged them to test me out, and told them they had been deceived about the nature of the group they worked for. When they doubted this, I asked them to ask other alters about the kind of things the group had done to them. They expressed concern that Satan’s eyes were always watching them; I asked if anyone else inside could show them the trickery involved in this, and they discovered that it was flashlights!

Gradually I moved up the hierarchy, as each layer became convinced that perhaps I could help them, so the next layer came to talk to me to tell me to stop interfering. I worked my way up to the Satans, who were all afraid of Satan 6. When I met Satan 6, he was a frightened pain holder who gave his pain to others who were disobedient; I let the other Satans know. Next I encountered the Mother, who also turned out to be a pain holder, and shared the memory of her pain with the Satans. Then came the High Priestess, who was boastful about her power. While she was talking to me she became increasingly drugged, and we discovered that another alter, the Druggist, was punishing her with drugs because she was talking. She was shocked at having been deceived into thinking she was the system head when another alter had control of her. We then worked through the memory of the Druggist's basic training. After this I took a holiday, and the system became afraid that I would leave them and/or tell the perpetrators. We processed the memory of an extreme punishment of child alters for telling a teacher that "stuff happened" at home. I ran into resistance, and discovered that rather than the high priestess I'd worked with being in charge of the personality system, there were nine layers, each headed by a high priestess. So I went directly to High Priestess 9, who had authority over all layers, and helped her see how she had been deceived. Once we had worked through her basic training memories she was able to convince the rest of the system to cooperate in working through the memories and getting free.

Stage 6: Working Through Symptom-producing Memories

This is a continuation of the memory work phase of therapy, with memories of training and abuse being processed systematically with the aid of the internal recorders in selecting the memories which jeopardize the client's safety or cause significant distress.

Memory Work That Works

Here's a summary of how I work with memories in a survivor of organized abuse: First, I do not work with flashbacks. A flashback is a repetitive loop which re-abuses the client rather than helping her. I prefer to use a carefully controlled memory reconstitution process. In my experience, flashbacks are partially remembered memories trying unsuccessfully to complete themselves, usually because one or more alters don't want to remember. I do not "chase flashbacks," but instead teach the client how to close them down and store the memories for future work. I ask the recorder alters to select the memories that are crucial to making the client safe and competent, and we go through them systematically.

I do not attempt to process any memory until and unless all alters involved in that memory are in agreement with the process and willing to go ahead. This is crucial. I've frequently had the experience of one alter holding back a little tiny portion of a memory, and the flashbacks increased. However, if all alters put in their parts, the memory is resolved, and becomes just "something that happened" that is part of knowledge rather than being continuously relived. With survivors of organized abuse, alters who have parts of the same training memory are often deliberately placed in different places in the system structure in order that they cannot work through that memory. The observer/recorder alters know how to find them, and usually have a record of which alters are in each memory. Recycler alters must also be included, to put in their parts; they have been deliberately instructed to hold these back so that memory work cannot destroy the effects of training. (In cases of spontaneous abuse, ongoing flashbacks are also often caused by some small dissociated part of the memory making it impossible to complete processing).

I titrate the memory. Begin by dissociating feelings, physical pain, drugs, and anything else which might be disturbing into an imaginary container. Then all involved alters (the host doesn't have to be there) "watch and listen to the video." Make sure the soundtrack is present; some organized abusers actually instruct alters to hide the soundtrack, and if it's hidden the memory won't be resolved. Find the alters who have the soundtrack if it's missing. Also make sure the memory starts at the beginning, in "normal" life, and goes to the end, again in "normal" life; don't start in the middle of trauma. And include the recovery period if there is severe physical damage.

After the client goes through the video, hopefully narrating as she goes, I have her repeat the process on fast-forward as many times as is necessary to add the feelings (physical and emotional) a bit at a time. When all feelings have been added, I instruct the client to put the memory into a container. I say: "Put in everything you saw, everything you heard, everything you tasted or smelled, everything you felt in any part of your body, and everything you felt in any part of your feelings." I say this very slowly, and sometimes elaborate on parts of it, depending on the memory, e.g., "all the sounds, all the words, all the screams, all the drugs, all the singing…"

At the end I have a symbolic cleansing from any remaining feelings from the memory (e.g., in a waterfall or a stream of light). During this process I invite any parts (alters) who no longer need to remain separate to enter the stream and allow it to wash away the barriers between them. Alters integrate naturally at this time.

At the end, I leave sufficient time for cognitive and emotional processing of the implications of the memory. A complete memory processing including this takes about two hours with most clients. If the client's appointment is too short for this, I will alternate memory work sessions with cognitive sessions.

Special Issues in Memory Processing

a) Incidental Training—Incidental training happens by accident. For instance in the middle of a training session, someone turns on a radio, or a car horn honks outside. This ends up integrated into the training session, but is often forgotten or left out while trying to break down a program, and the therapist can't figure out why things just aren't working. Incidental training is often not even in the room with a person. It is the white noise in the background that most people don't even notice, because they are too busy concentrating on what's happening in the room with them. Incidental training must also be included in the memory work.

b) Infant Memories A lot of the abuse in multi-generational groups or by mind control agencies starts in babyhood, when the first alters are deliberately split off. There will be baby alters inside the survivor who hold infant memories of this abuse. The memories will not be experienced as logical narratives, but as physical and emotional sensations. There will also be infant memories of neglect, spinning, and other unpleasant experiences, some of them deliberately induced, and some of them just random abuse which tends to happen in dysfunctional families. Parents in cult families are instructed how to hurt the child (as punishment for such behaviors as crying) without marking it, e.g., putting the child's hand over radiant heat, or burning internally with a tiny probe. They also have to gradually increase a girl baby's vaginal opening (and every baby's anus) with fingers and dildos. It is impossible for a survivor of this kind of early abuse to completely integrate without working through the infant memories.

By locating the infant alters, and having other alters assist them in letting their memories flow, infant memories can be worked through. A survivor and former trainer who worked through her infant memories wrote "Baby memories are iffy at best. Because they occur when you are at a place when life is still a complete mystery, it is best to just take what you see as real. When traveling back to baby years, don't try to understand, just experience, and let it go. These are the hardest to get at, but the easiest to let go of. You have no verbal way of explaining what you feel or go through. It is stupid to try to get the person to talk about what they felt or saw, because it is impossible to really verbalize the experience. Besides, it wastes a large amount of time trying to put it into words. Processing these memories is essential for total integration, but it is something that can be done very quickly if you just let the person do it without verbal interference. Baby memories phase in and out because babies phase in and out during the experience. They are not like a five-year-old who remembers hours of torture. Babies only take in small parts of memories. That's why trainers for babies use short quick things, rather than long drawn out things. What takes a five year old 24 hours to break only takes a baby a few minutes."

Stage 7: Teaching the Client to Work Through Her Own Memories

These survivors have experienced a horrendous amount of abuse, and if every abuse memory had to be worked through with the therapist, it would take forever. Memories of the same type can be processed in extended sessions with several memories at once. Memories which are not too complex or difficult can be processed by the client alone, once she has got the hang of it. Alters participating in the memory may have to regress, but other alters can monitor their progress and bring them out of the memory when it is completed, either by doing something internally or by performing some outward action such as ringing a bell. Or the survivor can set an alarm to startle them back to consciousness after a specific period of time. Of course, not all survivors will choose to work through all their memories and integrate. But if they choose not to, survivors of organized abuse may well be vulnerable to re-contact by a perpetrating group.

Stage 8: Developing a Non-Dissociative Lifestyle

This is the essence of post-integration therapy. It also occurs prior to integration, when the alters are becoming increasingly co-conscious. The client needs to live as a complex person in the world, experiencing ambivalence and making decisions by weighing all alternatives. Don't forget that survivors are people with lives outside the group that must also be dealt with. They have to hold jobs, or go home to abusive spouses, or find ways to feed their children. They need to learn skills to cope with everyday life and relationships, skills they may not have developed because of dissociation. This is a very challenging population. We need to understand the kind of training experiences they have been through and the way their personality systems work, and tailor work to their specific needs.

CHAPTER 18

Ritual Abuse Survivors: Diverse, Yet Similar

Jean M. Riseman

I'm a survivor of ritual abuse and early mind control experimentation. I'm also an unlikely activist: a shy, insecure woman raised to live my life politely and inconspicuously. This is both because girls raised in the 1940's and 1950's were supposed to grow up to live in men's shadows and because families that practice ritual abuse do not like to have attention directed toward them. However, I opened my mouth in outrage the day after my first flashback and I haven't shut it since.

Because of my activism, I must have had contact with well over a thousand survivors of ritual abuse over the past fifteen years. Sometimes it was a brief contact by e-mail or at a conference; sometimes it turned into a friendship that has lasted for years. My motivation wasn't to help people, although that was wonderful when it happened. I reached out to others to feel less crazy, to be among people who had seen what I had seen, felt what I felt, knew what I knew. For the first time in my life I felt like a human being, not some mutant alien from outer space. I belonged somewhere, and it was glorious.

Because of the number of survivors I have met and the range of different settings I have met them in, I feel I have a pretty good overview of what survivors have lived through and of their present-day lives. The people I have met are in no way a random sample of adults who have suffered ritual abuse. I have never met any of the large number of people who do not remember their abuse, remember their abuse but have not put a name to it, do not know how to contact others who have lived through ritual abuse, or are too frightened to reach out to others. I have met very, very few people who I suspected were still cult-active and none that would admit it. So I form my impressions only from those who are brave enough to face their pasts and resilient enough to name themselves survivors.

Most people, if they have even heard of ritual abuse, believe that they don't know anybody who has experienced it because it's so rare and exotic. Sometimes they truly don't. More often, they probably do, but they don't know it. Unfortunately ritual abuse is not really rare and exotic; it's just well hidden. My best guess is that perhaps 0.5% percent of the population of the United States and Canada have been ritually abused. I don't know about other countries and I can't back this up with documentation because people who ritually abuse children don't leave paper trails. If this figure seems outrageously high, remember that fifty years ago experts believed that incest occurred in only one or two out of a million families.

Demographics

Caryn StarDancer of Survivorship, a non-profit organization that supports ritual abuse survivors and their allies, did a survey asking people about the ideologies under which they had been abused (StarDancer, 1994) It yielded 506 responses. People reported being abused in every state in the United States, and in rural areas, small towns, and cities across the United States and Canada. There were also reports of abuse in Argentina, Austria, Brazil, Denmark, Ecuador, England, Germany, Guatemala, Iceland, Japan, Mexico, The Netherlands, Paraguay, Puerto Rico, Turkey, St. Kitts, and Scotland. The ideology most cited was satanism, followed by Christianity and paganism. This may be misleading, as satanism inverts both paganism and Christianity, and it was impossible to tell if people were describing satanism in more detail or were abused in a separate Christian or pagan cult. The next most cited was ritual abuse. Other ideologies reported were: government/military; Masonic; Nazi; neo-Nazi; White supremacist groups; Catholicism; Afro-Caribbean religions; and organized crime, including child prostitution and pornography. Since Survivorship's membership was predominantly American and Canadian, Asian, African, and Afro-Caribbean ideologies were probably under-represented. Ritual abuse, in one form or another, occurs everywhere.

So what do we ritual abuse survivors look like? Most striking, we are at least 80% female. Roughly equal numbers of boys and girls are born into ritually abusing families, but far more women identify as survivors who have remembered their upbringing and rejected it. This is probably due to an interplay of factors within the cults and within society as a whole. Boys are raised differently in cults and men hold the majority of positions of power. It would make sense that men might find it harder to leave. And women are more likely to seek mental health services or self-help groups than men, who find it harder to ask for help and to say that they are depressed or anxious.

Survivorship conducted a smaller survey (Riseman, 2004) comparing the brothers and sisters of survivors. Data was collected on 27 men and 48 women. It suggested that men born into cults are not dead, in prison, or in the armed forces.

On the contrary, they are more likely to be employed, more likely to be married, and no more likely than women to suffer from addictions. They are, however, far less likely to identify themselves as survivors. Whether this is because they are still cult active, whether they haven't remembered their abuse, or whether they know about it but keep it to themselves, we don't know.

The survivor community is also predominantly white. Some people assume that satanism is confined to people of European descent, but almost all the people of color I have met were abused under satanism. The very first survivor I met, three weeks after I realized what my background was, was black and came from a recently formed inter-racial branch of satanism. I've met people from Central America and Mexico whose parents were satanists and it appears that satanism was introduced into the Native American population through the boarding schools. My guess is that if survivors who are people of color weren't put off by the homogeneity of the survivor community we would not think of satanism as a White phenomenon.

As a rule, we appear to be middle class. We are well educated, and those with working class parents are usually upwardly mobile. Survivors tend to be highly intelligent; our I.Q. bell curve seems to be displaced upwards by about fifteen to twenty points. Some believe that the cults selectively breed for intelligence; others believe that only the highly intelligent survive their childhoods. I don't know what the reason is, but as a group we are bright and creative. Despite intelligence and talents, many, many survivors are impoverished due to the aftereffects of childhood torture and to present-day harassment. Many people are forced to apply for disability, especially in the early years of their recovery when they are flooded by flashbacks. Others continue to work, but have trouble keeping jobs, are under-employed, or employed part-time. It's very hard to hold down a good job if you never know when you are going to switch into a child alter or if the sight of your employer triggers images of your abuser. Those who are stalked by their perpetrators move often and lead lives of extraordinarily high stress, which also leads to under-employment Types of Abuse

Most ritual abuse is perpetrated in the name of some ideology, with the aim of making the child believe in and adhere to that ideology. As the Survivorship survey indicates, the most common ideology used in the United States and Canada is satanism. Children are abused in order to teach them to be "good little satanists" and loyal members of the group, as well as for the perverse pleasure of the adults. There are also cruel, inverted forms of Mormonism, Catholicism, other denominations of Christianity, Judaism, and various forms of paganism. Any religion can be subverted in this way. Afro-Caribbean religions sometimes use children (and adults) abusively in certain black magic rites, but they generally don't have a codified inverted religion (Kail, 2004). Non-religious ideologies that sometimes employ ritual abuse include White supremacy, some neo-Nazi groups, fraternal organizations, and subsets of government and military agencies. (Multiplicity and amnesia can be exploited and manipulated for the creation of spies, couriers, and people used unknowingly in a whole range of "black ops.") A few groups don't have any ideology except hedonism in the form of pedophilia and sadomasochism. They do many of the things that ideological groups do, but they seem to do it just for the sake of doing it or to make money from pornography, prostitution, and blackmail. There is a tremendous amount of money to be made in child pornography and prostitution, and this illegal market is growing, thanks to marketing on the Internet.

The question arises: do these groups really believe the ideology, or do they cynically use it to frighten and control the children? My feeling is that there is a spectrum, with people who believe deeply on one end and those who just go through the motions for their own benefit on the other. In either case, it has the same effect on the children, who do believe what they are told.Most ritual abuse survivors report being abused by their biological or adopted families and by groups that their families belong to. A smaller number were abused in daycare settings, boarding schools, hospitals, or by neighbors. Almost all the people I have met who were recruited into cults as teenagers subsequently recalled being abused as children. It's almost as if they were rebelling, but not straying too far from the beliefs that were instilled in them as children.

Details of the abuse vary from group to group, but general categories of abuse are extremely consistent across groups. Ritual abuse always involves severe (to the point of torture), repeated, systematic, physical abuse. In practically all cases it also involves child sexual abuse. It almost always occurs on particular dates that are important to the group and in a fixed, proscribed manner consistent with the group's ideology. Children are trained in developmentally appropriate ways to conform to group mores and they progress though this training in stages. Since children are expected to become abusing members of the groups when adults, the training focuses on harming others physically and sexually. This instills an unbearable burden of guilt in the children.

Almost all survivors report the torture and sacrifice of animals, either ritually or for training purposes. Often the children are allowed to have pets and to become close to them; they are then forced to watch their pet being sacrificed or made to kill the animal themselves. Often the blood of sacrifices is drunk or the flesh eaten raw. Many people report having witnessed or participated in the abortion of fetuses and the murder of babies, older children, and adults. The human bodies are treated as the animal sacrifices.

There is controversy over how often human sacrifices occur. My intuition tells me that sometimes children are deceived into believing a murder occurred when it did not. The impact on the child, of course, is the same, whether it was an actual or staged murder. Other times undocumented people are killed or the murder is hidden with a false death certificate. Satan's High Priest (Spencer, 1997) describes how this can take place.

Certain groups employ very sophisticated methods of torture using the latest technologies. As there is considerable overlap between groups, knowledge of these methods gets passed along. Electroshock is commonly used, as are interrogation methods developed to obtain information from prisoners of war. Classic methods include sleep deprivation, withholding food and water, confinement for long period of time in small, dark spaces, and the use of various drugs.

Survivors who report having been abused in government/military settings or used in medial experimentation describe the most extreme and bizarre methods of torture. It appears that at times the goal is to study the effects of cutting-edge technology on humans and that at other times the technology is used as a training/torture tool. Several decades ago, survivors were reporting the use of non-lethal weapons that the public is only now learning about. Some also report being used in ESP experiments (e.g., remote viewing), radiation experiments, and in a continuation of experiments performed in the Nazi concentration camps.

It is really chilling to hear similar stories from people who have never met and who came from different geographic areas, sometimes thousands of miles apart. I used to think that ritual abuse was conducted by isolated groups of deviants, but I can no longer sustain that wishful belief. It is also chilling in a different way to learn of two people who were abused by the same group as children, are separated, and who meet as adults and confirm each other's memories.

Effects of Ritual Abuse

The two most prominent results of ritual abuse are a profound, abiding sense of guilt and extremely disturbed self-image. Survivors have been brainwashed from a very early age to believe that they are evil to the core and that there is nothing they can do to change. They feel that what they have endured was their fault, and that they deserved it because they were innately bad. They feel responsible not only for what they were forced to do, but for what they witnessed and were not able to prevent. They feel omnipotent and totally powerless at the same time: omnipotent, because they were taught that all the horrible things that happened were their fault and powerless, because they were, in fact, unable to escape or stop the atrocities. They feel broken, defective, and different from others. They do not value, or even recognize, their own strength and talents and they have a great deal of trouble trusting themselves or others. Why should they? All their early experiences showed them that trust was totally misplaced.

Some children react by trying to be as compliant as possible and developing an acceptable social façade. These children grow up to be over-achievers, getting good marks in school and blending into society. Inside, they are bewildered and terrified of being found out. Others react by "acting out" and getting into constant trouble. At least their experience is congruent; they are out of control in the abusive setting and out of control in society. Neither group can articulate their feelings, describe what is happening to them, or elicit help.

With the depth of pain survivors carry inside, it is little wonder that addictions are common in this group. Many were given drugs or alcohol as part of the abuse. Many report extremely bizarre eating experiences within the abusive setting. Survivorship found that 68% of survey respondents suffered from eating disorders (Riseman, 2002). Addictions serve to create an effective distraction from the past as well as to temporarily dull the pain.

Severe childhood abuse sets people up for health problems later in life. The immune system seems especially sensitive to trauma early in life and physical injuries lead to arthritis and other long-term consequences. Chronic fatigue syndrome, fibromyalgia, allergies, and chemical sensitivity seem to be common among ritual abuse survivors, as well, of course, as depression and anxiety disorders. Most survivors, at some point in their adult lives (if not for all their lives), suffer the symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder, with flashbacks, intrusive thoughts, and hyper-reactivity.

Dissociation, the ability to separate parts of an experience and separate oneself from the experience, is universal. Dissociation is a natural, adaptive reaction to overwhelming stress, and allows one to survive at the time. When a child is forced to dissociate repeatedly, it becomes a dominant mental and emotional mechanism. Later on in life, any event, stressful or not, is experienced through the lens of dissociation.

Like dissociation, amnesia is practically universal among ritual abuse survivors. The horrendous experiences are repressed or tucked away in a suppressed alter and are no longer consciously available in everyday life. And like dissociation, amnesia generalizes to situations that are not life threatening. After a short period of time, for example, I can no longer remember if I paid my taxes or ate breakfast today, nor can I remember people I just met. The information is just gone; where, I do not know, but I do know it's inaccessible to me.

Ritually abusive groups cultivate dissociation and forgetting. Children are told, “This did not happen,” “This happened to somebody else, not you,” “That was a dream,” or “Remember to forget this.” What you can’t remember can’t be revealed, and the group’s secrecy is preserved. The stereotype is that all ritual abuse survivors are classic multiples, with Eve of Three Faces of Eve being the model. They supposedly have a small number of alternate personalities, or alters, who lead separate lives and who don’t know about each other. There is a host alter, usually a conservative law-abiding citizen, a more impulsive, often sexualized alter, and perhaps a couple of child alters. In reality, very few of us fit that stereotype.

Most survivors who consider themselves multiple have dozens or even hundreds of parts, some more fully formed than others. These parts are different ages, have different characteristics and functions, and some may be of different genders or sexual orientations. Some parts may even be animals or inanimate objects. They are organized into an internal society with its own rules of interaction. Often, there is an internal landscape, or several of them, which the alters inhabit. The internal organization differs markedly from person to person. I’ve never met two people who had exactly the same internal organization, although some features, such as meadows or certain geometric shapes, show up frequently.

Sometimes there are strong amnestic barriers that separate alters: for instance, two alters may know nothing whatsoever about each other, not even that the other one exists. Sometimes the amnestic barriers aren’t as strong, and alters have a vague sense of each other. Sometimes the barriers become stronger and weaker, or even disappear for a while. In this case, alters will know all about each other at one point in time and have no idea the other one exists at another time. You can see why the Three Faces of Eve model doesn’t always fit very well.

If there are no amnestic barriers at all between alters they are said to be co-conscious. There are often clear rules about what parts are allowed to be co-conscious under what conditions. I have three or four groups of parts who drive, for example. Each member of a group is very tuned into the other members, but only when busy driving. Otherwise they are separate and unaware. Each group is vaguely aware of the other groups but not in touch with them. And each group is aware of other parts of me that might be around when I’m driving, parts that daydream or listen to the radio.

In the driving example, alters are defined by the task they do in the every-day world. Alters can also be defined by a cult-assigned task, or by a particular emotion, or by a relationship to a person or institution. The memory of the abuse is often distributed among those alters who were formed or present when the abuse occurred. Amnesia for the abuse disappears if these alters become co-conscious with alters that are normally present. The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of the American Psychiatric Association, Fourth Edition, Text Revision (DSM-IV-TR, 2002) defines Dissociative Identity Disorder (DID) (300.14) as A. The presence of two or more distinct identities or personality states. B. At least two of these identities or personality states recurrently take control of the person's behavior. C. Inability to recall important personal information that is too extensive to be explained by ordinary forgetfulness" (p. 526–529). This definition is broad enough to include people with only two alters and those with thousands, commonly called polyfragmented multiples. Ritual abuse survivors who don't see themselves as multiple often say, "Oh, I am DDNOS (Dissociative Disorder Not Otherwise Specified)." Actually, they may fit better under the category of Dissociative Amnesia (300.12), which is defined as: "The predominant disturbance is one or more episodes of inability to recall important personal information, usually of a traumatic or stressful nature, that is too extensive to be explained by ordinary forgetfulness" (p. 5520-523). I've met a couple of people who thought they remembered all their abuse, but found that they had, indeed, forgotten whole segments of it. The only people I have met or heard of (and there were extremely few) who had continuous complete memory of their experiences came to ritual abuse as adults. It seems that it is just too horrendous for a child to hold in the mind.

The definition of DDNOS (300.15) starts off sounding like a variant of DID: "1. Clinical presentations similar to Dissociative Identity Disorder that fail to meet full criteria for this disorder. Examples include presentations in which a) there are not two or more distinct personality states, or b) amnesia for important personal information does not occur." It also includes "2. Derealization unaccompanied by depersonalization in adults. 3. States of dissociation that occur in individuals who have been subjected to periods of prolonged and intense coercive persuasion (e.g., brainwashing, thought reform, or indoctrination while captive). 4. Dissociative trance disorder: single or episodic disturbances in the state of consciousness, identity, or memory that are indigenous to particular locations and cultures (Possession states)" (DSM-IV, 2002, pp. 532-533). While these definitions apply to many survivors, they don't adequately describe the most salient features of our internal lives, the compartmentalization and fragmentation that severe trauma causes.

Why is there such diversity among internal systems? Nature and nurture, if you can call it nurture. Children inherit temperament and intelligence, and they also inherit the propensity to dissociate to various degrees. Some children who are raised without abuse are more present, more in-the-moment, while others are more day-dreamy and drifty. Chances are a child who innately dissociates easily will develop alters sooner while being abused and will develop more alters over-all. Children who are creative and imaginative may well create unusual alters and their alters may have a vividness and richness that alters of less imaginative children lack.

The alters that traumatized children spontaneously create are, of course, shaped by the culture they live in. An American child isn't going to create a Santa Claus-type alter with the Dutch name Sinter Klaus, for example. The model for the alter must come from the child's environment. If the child's environment includes satanism or Santeria, you would expect to find some alters modeled on figures or ideas that are prominent in those belief systems. Adult perpetrators also shape alters, more or less on purpose. They may call a child by different names in situations where they expect different types of behavior. "Princess," "Gypsy Rose," or "Evil Bitch" may be the names of alters with very specific roles to fulfill.

In the type of abuse that survivors generally call "mind control," the adults spend a great deal of time and energy in shaping alters and arranging them internally. The resulting systems can look like elaborate video games. Corydon Hammond described one such system based on the Kabala (1994), Hilgers and Monday (1994) described carousels, matrixes, and castles, and I've described geometric shapes (Riseman, 2002). Some survivors of mind control experimentation have several such complicated systems, layered one upon the other. They are designed to contain specially trained alters who can only be summoned by a special code known only to a few people.

Conclusion

There are so many unanswered questions about ritual abuse and ritual abuse survivors. Historical and social questions—How far back in time do these groups go? Which groups interacted with other groups and how did they influence them? How much cooperation, communication and networking is there between groups? How much competition? Psychological questions—Why do some people become multiple and others not? Where is repressed information held, if not in an alter? Why do some people remember and others don't? Why do some people turn their backs on their abusers, while others grow up to join them? What factors determine whether a survivor suicides?Recovery questions—What is the most effective way of dealing with complex programming? Are there general principles of therapy that apply across this population? How can a therapist encourage trust, often for the first time in a survivor's life? How can a survivor tell if he or she is in flashback or not?

These questions, and hundreds of others, beg to be asked and answered through research. I know from experience that ritual abuse survivors are generous with the information they have and eager to teach the world about their experiences. What is needed are investigators who are generous with their time and curiosity and organizations that are generous with financial and concrete support. There is much to be learned about the extremes of human resilience, creativity, courage, and kindness from survivors, as well as much about the extremes of human cruelty.

CHAPTER 19

Patterns in Mind-Control: A First Person Account

Trish Fotheringham

I was raised as a demonstration model for mind-control techniques designed to provide the latest, most marketable form of human slavery of the time. I do not know the identity of the group who “programmed” me but it clearly had a political agenda. From my birth in 1960, I was subjected to daily trainings and exploitations designed to create dissociated identities or alternate personalities (hereafter referred to as “alters”) that could be programmed according to the needs of the buyer(s). This programming was instilled through the use of mind-control techniques, including ritual abuse-torture, built layer upon layer to form specific patterns of behavior within an alter, resulting in alters that were meant to be perfectly controllable “slaves.”

As a demonstration model, I was trained to exhibit a multitude of personality profiles, any of which could be individually defined and selected for purchase and creation in others. The conflicting programs involved caused an increased need for adjustments and fine-tuning, with program deterioration and eventual breakdown inevitable, at which point I was outcast and discarded (essentially a “built-in expiry date”). It was this conflicting training that enabled me to eventually break the programming bonds and bypass the “failsafe” programs.

My alters were trained for a variety of uses. I was rented as a child sex slave for individual pedophiles and cults, as well as pedophile rings, orgies, rituals, child pornography and snuff films. Other uses included writing the abusers’ words, preaching their agendas, recruiting others, training other young children, triggering others to action, recording, reporting, stealing, spying, drug and arms trafficking, and other common criminal activities.

After an intensive seventeen-year healing journey, I’ve now come to recognize consistent patterns in the intricately planned and orchestrated trainings forced upon me, in the feelings, behaviors, thoughts and beliefs I was left with, and in those I see in others and throughout society. To explain these patterns, here is my true story of the “color-coded training” I received as a demonstration model during the years 1960 through 1979 in a mid-sized Canadian coastal community reputed to be a nice, quiet, clean, respectable, even conservative place to grow up.

My History

I grew up participating in two different secret cults: my father's ancient patriarchal clan which had a few brutal sexual "family traditions" and my mother's matriarchal "healing magic coven" which had some painful, twisted rituals. Each subjected me to ritual abuse and mind-control training from birth.

Through my paternal grandfather ("Clan Chieftain" and military supplies-man), Mom made a deal: social status and a secure cash flow in exchange for her secrecy and unquestioning cooperation in making me available for, and amenable to, a "secret military training program."[1] I was enrolled in individualized training as a demonstration model, with the resultant "social and financial benefits and opportunities." My sole purpose was to provide proof of the "military men's" viable, marketable training program, with controllable results and guaranteed secrecy and anonymity for clients.

In total, through these avenues, I personally experienced a dozen different types of programming and training "paths," evidencing effectiveness as well as options.

From infancy until age 18, "life lessons" occurred in places as diverse as my many family homes; friends' and relatives' homes; hospitals, medical and dental offices, theatres, service establishments, businesses, government buildings, and various military facilities; military transport trucks, clearings in forests and fields, caves, underground rooms, and tunnels. People involved, in one form or another, included relatives, neighbors and parents' co-workers; family friends, doctor, and dentist; local businessmen, police, hospital staff, government officials, and politicians. Most of these were/are apparently "upright citizens," often community leaders.

I believe I was chosen to be a demonstration model partly because my family had abilities and connections that aided in my training. My mother had keys to a small local live theatre, and could access it and its costumes and equipment when it was deserted. She was also a nurse at a local hospital where she could access the morgue, supplies, and medications. She was usually involved enough in my schools to have keys and access to them. My grandfather held rank with the local army militia and had keys to the armories, where he could access uniforms, equipment, vehicles, and weapons, as well as tunnels and prison cells, and was employed as a Department of National Defence supplies man at the local navy base, so he was able to order things that weren't readily accessible, as well as provide access to navy facilities and ships. My father was involved with civil defence and able to access their emergency supplies. All three of them had many connections to people in these areas, and were skilled at make-up, costuming, writing, organizing and directing. My father and grandfather often staged mock battles and disasters for legitimate training purposes, and both were skilled at building, mechanics, electrical work and special effects.

My mind-control programming included the use of: sensory/sleep/food deprivation; confusion, fear, pain, terror, guilt, shame, humiliation and belittlement; theatrics, trickery, illusion, lies and coercion; physical, emotional, verbal, sexual and spiritual abuse; forced actions against self/animals/others; double-bind situations; systematic behavior modification and hypnosis techniques; drugs, lights, sounds, smells, special effects, film projections, hidden cameras and microphones; sets, props, actors, costumes and make-up; role-play “characterizations” based on nursery rhymes, fairy tales, stories, books, movies and music; guns, electroshock, whips; shackles, chains and cages.

One important piece of technology my trainers used was a wooden chair which could rock, buck, rotate, and administer electric shocks. They always told me it was a “magic gateway chair” that allowed me to “ride the rainbow” to other places. They said the straps and helmet were to make sure all of me made the trip safely, and were for my protection while I travelled in faraway and strange realms.

This chair was used from about age 2, when they started creating “out of body” alters. At first, when I was placed in the chair it was used, with drugs, to gently vibrate and electrically stimulate me into feeling floaty. This familiarized me with it so I didn’t fear the mild electric shocks, interpreting them only as what happens while travelling. A fan often blew wind at me too, making it feel as if the chair was actually moving through space to somewhere else. For different alters they gave it different purposes: easily done by naming a different destination, and using props, sets, lighting and sounds or music to create specific “moods” and associations. The chair’s bucking and spinning was used to create internal tornados through little pulses and zaps added to the whole wild weather feeling. Over the years, the chair was used to vibrate me into an “open channel” state, and to “ride the rainbow,” which was mostly the sensation of traveling with really amazing lighting and special effects added. Later it was used more harshly for “repairs,” by making me near crazy and totally suggestible, and for punishments (“do what you’re told or we’ll have to zap some sense into you”) and then for the final events which locked down my “inside people” and inner world.

Because of the way memory works, dissociation was also a primary tool; intentional use of traumatic situations made it possible to selectively disconnect aspects of awareness or experience from my conscious mind, and to create dissociated identities. Various psychoactive drugs were used to induce or enhance each particular dissociative state and to create “altered realities” or “escapes” that made it possible for alters to cope with otherwise unbearable experiences.

At any time one, or more, of these dissociated aspects of my experience were able to be triggered (by a word, circumstance, or event resembling some significant aspect of the traumatic experience), causing them to rise to consciousness and interfere with, even entirely override, the actual moment when such a flashback occurred. My understanding is that traumatic memories are stored differently than “ordinary” memories, in a manner which allows them to remain available and accessible, clear and intact as if locked in a vacuum that prevents aging or disintegration of integrity. In my case individual memories come up as a sort of “experiential movie clip,” enabling me to recall and interpret the details of the mind-control patterns of even my preverbal experiences, since the emotional and physical “senses” remain accessible, with the “visuals and soundtrack” complete and whole in a manner which allows me to see, hear and feel what happened then, in the here and now, decades later.

Throughout much of my training, one man was often present. My handler, whom I called “Puffy,” was in my life from infancy. Usually loving and friendly, stroking and kissing me, he was like my daddy, lover, sweetheart, and master all at once. He played with me and treated me like his precious little princess. He took me walking in his beautiful gardens (like in the gospel song “In the Garden,” which says “he walks with me, and he talks with me, and he tells me I am his own”), swishing me about and scooping me up into his arms. He danced alone with me in his bedroom to Johnny Mathis tunes, crooning the words to me as if I was his lover. I stayed the night often enough at his estate home after various “events” that I believed I had my own bedroom, wardrobe, and music box and porcelain horse collections, and that his servants were my servants. I even “had my own horse” in his stables for when the two of us went riding.

Puffy often filmed our time together, teaching me to ignore the camera; most of my alters learned not to see that it was there, which was important in later trainings and exploitations.[2] It also created confusion initially in therapy, until I learned to “zoom out” to out-of-body alters for the full details of a given scenario; before that I misinterpreted many memories. For example, at first I believed memories of a series of satanic events meant my family were Satanists and that “I” had been married to Satan (red skin, horns, tail, and all), so I lumped all the memories of the rituals of my parents individual cult groups together under this one heading of Satanism. Later, through an out-of-body alter that saw the cameras, wires, crew and staged setting, I learned the satanic-themed situations had actually been a series of porn and snuff films involving an alter who was never out anywhere else, so naturally interpreted them as her real life. After this became clear, I was able to separate the filmed Satanic rituals from the forest rituals of Mom's coven and Dad's clan traditions. Only the "zoomed out" perspective enabled me to recognize and distinguish the truth in all this.

First Steps: Birth to 6 Years

Beginnings: Birth to 2 years:

As alters were deliberately created, they were all associated with particular colors, each color representing a "path" or type of training. Colors were "tempered" by their shades—lighter shades (those with white added) tended to involve "sensitive" feelings, while darker shades (those with black added) tended to have only the angry, violent or power-seeking types of feelings, if they had any at all. Each alter was dressed in the colors associated with their path: that is, I was dressed in these colors and that's partly how I knew who I was at any given moment. This continued right until adulthood, with additional associations added as I became older. Only after integration was I able to choose my clothing based on anything other than the colors necessary for whatever I would be doing or needing to feel; mostly this was unconscious until late in therapy.

As much as possible, the color-coding was also linked to the seven primary chakra "chi energy" centers of eastern traditions. For me as a demonstration model, this was adapted to suit the larger training plans. Traditional meanings were given twists to make the associations fit each alter's color training, resulting in each chakra's energy being unbalanced and chaotic: this made it easy to convince me of its dangerous power and the need for it to be controlled. My red root chakra was linked to power rituals as well as sex, while the orange spleen chakra's creativity was tied into internal security, alarms and warnings. Yellow and my center chakra's personal power were corrupted and made to feel particularly dangerous. My heart chakra and its green were linked to the values and words of my trainers and programming. Instead of being the throat chakra color of self-expression, blue became the color of "following orders from above," with the brow chakra color indigo as one of its shades. Purple became the color linked to my brow chakra and its insight and intellect. My crown chakra, the spirit "entry point" center, was linked to white instead of its usual violet. All of this was to tap into and take control of how my energy was used: even when they taught me to use these energies, it was twisted to suit their purposes and bound and barriered from my own.

My trainers generally used only enough trauma to accomplish their goals. Experiences became progressively more frequent and traumatic as I aged.

Carefully pre-planned experiential incidents used “smoke and mirrors” (deception and illusions, assisted by drugs) to make specific aspects of each piece of training stick with the correct alter identity in a predictable manner. The science of child development was used to make training incidents age and stage appropriate for maximum effectiveness and potency. My alters understood them as “life lessons.”

Birth to 6 months:

The first step in my color-coded training was to create the initial dissociative splits needed to form the foundation for the entire system of alters. During my first weeks of life, as much controllable dissociation as possible, as soon as possible, was established: from the first split moments after birth, training began building a different understanding of reality, with specific color-coded patterns for the role and character development for each alter and each path.

The very first intentional splits were created with trauma, including violent shaking, that choked off my birth cries while I heard my first words, “Don’t cry! Stop crying! Be Quiet!” repeated loudly and angrily. This was followed immediately with very tight and brutal swathing, accompanied by the loud, commanding words “Keep still! Don’t move! Stay still!” The words had no meaning for me at that point, but were important trigger phrases which were used thereafter to develop these alters and lock in crucial programming to obey, keep still, and keep silent.

Basic “negative” emotional states such as fear, helplessness, stifled anger, and loneliness, as well as “positive” ones such as pleasure, contentment and safety, were isolated into separate alters. Some of these splits initially involved trauma; all were developed by giving each alter experiences that locked them steadily deeper into “their” emotional state. Over time, some of these alters, and later certain other young alters, also came to be identified by different bodily positions such as curled up, bent over, twisted, or held rigid. Some of these splits were unknown to my abusers. Until late in therapy, these types of alters took and held their parts of my life: experiences were therefore often fragmented as they occurred. This meant that one alter could be “out” for an event, while one or more of these base alters “siphoned off” the feelings, emotional states, and/or pain that went with whatever was experienced, without truly being out in the body. Due to this, each alter’s piece of the memory had to be accessed and addressed before the whole experience could be considered reclaimed and healed.

Initial testing began shortly after my birth, to determine my natural inborn aptitudes and interests, and continued throughout my infancy and toddler years. Many separate training paths based on colors were then developed and “installed” over time, each built layer upon layer. Linked to skill sets, each “color path” forged emotional and/or spiritual beliefs and control mechanisms or “programs” to create base belief systems. Some “programs,” such as “obey,” “don’t tell,” “be loyal,” or “internal security/ alarms” were created at the beginning and reinforced frequently as I grew.

By about 6 months of age, the splits, testing and training that occurred within the first few weeks of my life had already built a substructure of experiences, beliefs, attitudes, and behaviors in my earliest alters. The defining and setting of initial plans continued as training began to include progressively more color links; progressively tying color to sounds then words, shapes then symbols, etc, linking them to alter-specific feelings and meanings to produce specific and predictable results in their behaviors, responses, and actions. (For example, by toddler age, this had led to my first red path (sexual) alter doing a “lap dance” when I was placed on a man’s lap, coyly and suggestively wiggling and giggling “just so.”) 6 months to 2 years:

Training focused on installing basic commands and triggers in the initial alters. These identities were called forth later, using the trigger phrases or inducing the feeling states I experienced the day of the initial split, and additional trainings and associations were administered to create the planned results for each alter. This kind of training is often called “programming” and essentially consists of training alter personalities through classical conditioning to instantly do whatever they have been taught to do in response to a command or a signal.

On the basis of the results of my ongoing tests and performances, each alter was given “life experiences” to increasingly lock in a separate, distinctive understanding and experience of reality unique to that alter. Intentional use of lights, colors, clothes and accessories, words, phrases, touch, smell, drugs, and quite specific color-coding methodically built the identifications and associations alters were forced to acquire, enabling my handler and trainers to create and develop each alter’s individual belief system and value structure, systematically shaping his or her conceptions and understanding of “how the world works,” “the rules of life,” and almost everything he or she thought, felt, said, or did.

Although they had no power, alters’ experiences included just the right amount of apparent personal empowerment to fool them into never knowing they were being manipulated. Believing the experience to be real was key!

Once enough alters existed and plans had been defined and set, serious training began, devised to seem simply part of normal everyday life to enhance my belief in it. Alters were called out into the body only for experiences that furthered their planned understanding of the world—so an alter being trained to follow a red path would only wear particular red clothing, be spoken to in particular ways, and have experiences in particular situations, with particular types of people. So little was left to chance that even the toys each alter was allowed were part of the plan.

My red path was primarily sex training, so everything had a sexual aspect for these alters: the way I was touched, spoken to, held, dressed; lots of stroking and inappropriate touching to make me familiar and comfortable with it; “sexy” music in the background; and lots of light-hearted play and laughter mixed in so it was all just fun. When there was pain, it was usually done with words, sounds and gentle touch that soothed, assuring me this was all for my own good, that it was preparing me for life. Hence, a complex, twisted sexuality was woven into my young red path alters’ understanding of love and relationships, along with a sense of play mixed with a resignation that knew some parts of life hurt and you just had to endure smilingly.

As testing continued to identify and factor in my natural skills and abilities, the specifics for each training path were implemented. Throughout infancy and toddler-hood, trauma was used mainly to reinforce basic commands (“don’t cry,” “be quiet,” “don’t tell,” “don’t move,” “be still,” “do as you’re told,” “obey,” etc.) and to institute parameters for the alters’ reality. If an alter “came out” when it wasn’t her time, or acted or spoke inappropriately, harshness resulted. Appropriateness was rewarded with praise and seemingly loving, encouraging treatment, while inappropriateness was met with pain and withdrawal of love and affection. (The exception was alters who were supposed to be disconnected from people. In the black path, mainly “mercenary soldier” training, “love” was never used, only comfort and desire for appropriateness, versus pain and thwarting of desire for inappropriate behaviour.) Steadily, as each alter had enough time “out” in the body, this all began to solidify. Each alter had his or her own unique way of being. Dissociative barriers kept them aware of only their own pieces of my overall life. And in turn, “I,” the primary person who handled everyday life at home and in the world, was not aware of these alternate identities or their pieces of “my” life. It seemed natural for life to be broken into chunks, with missing pieces here and there, so “lost time” went unnoticed. Since continuity was unknown, there was no sense of discontinuity. A way of life had been established and my brain’s way of coping with difficulties was “wired in”—simply create another alter!

Foundations: 2 to 6 years

By 2 years old:

Each of the initially created alters had a distinct identity with basic color-coded identifications and associations: his or her feelings, thoughts, behaviours, actions and beliefs had been linked to color-specific situations, places, sounds, words, phrases, gestures, shapes, and symbols.

Next, an “internal world” was created to house alters when they were not actively “out” in the body. In this world they always had the symbols and props required to ensure they remained programmed and controllable over the long-term. The creation of the inner world was done over time, using staged settings which were replicated in the inner world, to make the inner landscape, buildings, and items real and tangible. At first, only the most basic aspects of the world were installed, with specifics added later as needed.

Until this point, only the basic colors red, yellow, green, blue, black, white and brown were used. Now though, more hues were added and my inner world filled with colors linked to those found in the natural world around me.

My inner world sprang into existence as a luscious green magical fairy tale world with hills, valleys, a river, and an ever-present murmur of sound I came to call my “internal soundtrack,” at this point labelled “the whispering leaves.” This soundtrack consisted of the words, phrases, songs, rhymes, chants and ditties that formed the guidance system or instructional backdrop of my life—“Be a good girl,” “Do what you’re told,” “Skip to my Lou my darling,” etc.

Next, a core system was placed in the center of the inner world, as a root or anchor, a guidance system, and an overseer system, all in one. For me, this was a “Tree of Life,” with branches for the general color-coded path, and colored leaves for holding the specific memory and training links. Training thereafter was linked and built upon this tree.

The rest of the inner world was easily installed. Some of it was done outdoors; some in staged settings. Green was grass, trees and “whispering leaves.” Blue was water, the sky, air, and wind, “the power and voice” of the whispering leaves and tornados. Yellow was the sun, a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, pixie dust, a golden cup, and a “magic golden ball” of my externalized “dangerous true power.” Brown was dirt, trees, “brownies and dwarves,” dustballs and whirlwinds that whisked things away out of sight. White was fluffy pillows and clouds, angels, and “heaven,” the home of the gods and goddesses (who were simulated by actors). Grey was fog, smoke, confusion and illusion. Rainbows were multi-colored magic paths to other “worlds” (some staged externally, some sections of the inner world where alters of other paths lived), unifying control mechanisms that pulled all the colors together. Black was being alone, dark, silent, cold, scary, dirty, tough, mean and nasty.

“Weather phenomena” got into the inner world the same way everything else did, simply by me being told they were there—like all children this age I naturally believed whatever I was told. Tornadoes, dustballs and whirlwinds were made with fans blowing wind at and around me when I was in “the magic chair”; at first I was taught to “control” them, then later to “be” them. Rainbows were created in the air around and under me in the chair, I think by means of light shining through sprays of water. The unifying control aspect of them was they could be used to call forth all the alters the colors represented, all at the same time. (Strobe or flashing lights were used for this later.) I was taught that the rainbow could link the world with the chair to whatever world I was going to (none of which I seem to have understood was inside me), with one end in each place, and the end that was not the chair end "moveable" so that it could be "set" to the destination.

My "tree of life" was then further defined as having nine branches (what I came to call "color paths"), each with its own particular color of leaf. These nine kinds of leaves—red, green, yellow, white, pink, purple, multi-colored, brown, and orange—were everywhere as I toddled about outdoors in the autumn, so leaves on branches were easy foundational reference points to plant inside my mind.

Next, the programmers created nine foundational "virtues" alters who were assigned their own branches on the tree and given a leaf of their color to keep with them at all times as they lived (in the inner world) on or near their branches. From then on, since I had so many color paths/branches/leaves, my training was broader and more varied and conflicting than most people's would be.

By about 3 years of age:

Once the inner world and tree of life were solidly established and each of the foundational alters had his or her own branch and leaf to keep track of their specific training, the nine branches of the tree were assigned a combination of attributes (called "virtues") that best enhanced each color's training path. (These attributes were based on actual virtues, such as "kindness," "obedience," "loyalty," "honesty," "strength," "wisdom," "purity," "cleanliness," "order," "truth," and "justice." Each virtue was given its own twisted meaning, and some, like loyalty and obedience, were trained into all paths. Nearly all alters were taught to be "good," but what that meant was tailored to their training path.) I had to become skilled at connecting image and sensation records of lessons and trainings to the correct branches and leaves, a skill that later grew into a somewhat photographic memory.

The "virtues" attributes were developed through fun play activities with props, in costumes with accessories (these later acted as control mechanisms—i.e. a black purse or belt ensured aspects of security training were part of the scenario, gold jewelry meant a degree of authority for the alter wearing it, silver items created a spiritual connection, and metals and gemstones further defined complex role parameters), sometimes on staged sets, but also in my home and other real places, with the specifics of each color-coded branch of training being linked with particular items, obstacles, warnings, links and guideposts for alters, most of which were given internal representations that served as training/programming storage, reminders and trigger mechanisms. Sometimes these were simply objects; at other times they were imbued with "life" enough to become alters without actual personalities. For example, I had an "eyeball in a glass ball" that was the famous "All-Seeing Eye," always watching and recording me. Brown dustballs and whirlwinds ("magical dwarves and brownies in disguise") came to "whisk things away" when a secret appeared in danger of being exposed, and a "wise" blue tornado whirled "safe words" to mind as distractions. A golden cup, that originally was held to "open a channeling state," eventually became an alter that was "an open channel." All these things were produced in the external world and reproduced in the inner world.

For my red path alters, the "virtues" attributes started as me "being" Little Red Riding Hood, the "good little girl in red," in danger and watching out for the "big bad wolf," protecting herself by being clever and coy while pretending everything was fine and normal. Playtime was a fun game, naked with my handler Puffy being all "scary and mean" and saying "I'm the big bad wolf—keep me happy or I'll eat you" with sexualized gestures, actions, stroking, rubbing, mixed with lots of bouncing, tickling, poking, laughs, and hugs. All my alter had to do was lick, kiss, wiggle and rub "in the ways that made the wolf growl or purr with pleasure" and she was "safe" and the winner of the game too! Then she knew for sure she was a "good girl."

These red path alters' sex-focused "virtue" of "good little girl" was expanded over the years to include "good little hostess" and "proper little lady," along a path leading to madam-like responsibilities. Their experiences were designed to establish a comfort zone pattern of sex and sexual interactions as a necessary part of life, with built-in, skilled use of words, phrases, actions, body language and emotional response patterns to suggest, encourage, and enhance the sexual experience for the "client," with power and security only felt by the alter when playing out familiar sexual roles.

Conversely, my dark blue and black path alters were tough soldiers (and a mean witch). They had to be forceful, calculating, manipulative, nasty, hurtful, uncaring, and "don't let anything stop (them)." Like a vicious, cruel version of normal boyish roughhousing, play for them involved much violence; sneaking up and scaring people, tackling, kicking, hitting, nasty words, insults, and putdowns. Their experiences established, for them only, a comfort zone pattern of following orders and "thinking on their feet," with "doing a good job," frustration, anger, aggressiveness, violence and destructiveness as the only ways to feel powerful.

My pink path alters were princesses or fairies: play had them naïve, innocent and believing they were "in charge, powerful and entitled to be treated royally," as evidenced by much bowing and apparent subservience by Puffy and his servants, and my trainers (who these alters thought were “private tutors”). Pink alters held fairy tale “all is good” beliefs and knew only good, happy feelings, (unless they weren’t getting their way and had a temper tantrum, whereupon they had “all privileges removed until (they) could behave like proper ladies.”) They went to fabulous high-class parties; were pampered, carried, “swished and flown about”; they knew daydreaming, lightheartedness, and their wants and desires coming true magically. Similar to red path trainings, as I grew, pink alters were taught the skills required of “ladies of high-standing”—how to dress, walk, talk, organize parties, be a hostess, etc.

The white path was my main communication and word path; these alters learned to live in the outsider, observer point of view, and to interpret and make note of people’s needs as shown in not only their words, but also their gestures and body language. At about age two, a “cloud” alter was split off to “see, feel and be inside the clouds,” far away from my body and unaffected by the cares of the harsh world. Not long after, a “bird’s-eye view overseer” was created to “watch everything” from an out-of-body perspective that saw “the bigger picture.” Over time, through various alters, the entire white path learned to “hear the voice of the gods,” “channel,” “be an open vessel,” and “let the visions guide,” through training done with tiny speakers attached to my ears when I was drugged, so that “I” heard (and believed) the “voice of the gods” as it gave me words that sparked visions (created externally with film and holograph projections until I “learned” to have them in my mind.) The approach of fun play “dress up” activities incorporating the stereotyped reference points found in nursery rhymes, songs, storybooks, TV, movies, and elsewhere in the real world, subconsciously reinforced the programming, repeatedly and over the long-term, in my daily life outside of the formal training, making it all the more believable for each individual alter, solidifying my dissociation even more.

Each alter continued to receive experiential training to develop and enhance his or her color-coded ”virtues,” personality traits and characteristic response and behavior patterns, along with the pertinent skill sets, vocabulary, etc. that went along with them. Character attributes were identified, practiced and instilled as “the way of people and the world.” Unbeknownst to alters, costumes, props, actors, sets, etc. and increasingly detailed role-play and scripts were used to imbed the characterizations of this “school of life,” instilling the exploitative “life lessons” by the osmosis that occurs naturally for a child. Structured around my age and developmental level, each new layer of these “lessons” was added and interwoven as I was able to understand or do new things—at first simple, basic and easy, then steadily becoming more and more complicated, detailed and demanding.

During this same age and stage, training began to move out into new venues. At 2 ½ years, my red and pink path alters' training had me in "an elite group" with other girls and boys, a class called "manners training" (at an official local government residence) where we were taught "how to behave appropriately" in high society—etiquette and manners which included such "necessary skills" as how to do "lap dances," how to ballroom dance while ensuring your face is provocatively buried in your partners crotch in a way not clearly evident to any but the dance partner, and how to use the tongue in a French kiss.

"Puffy" was an important part of the manners training and their "reward" dinner parties, at which we children were treated as pets. Dressed in "grown up gowns and tuxedos," partnered men with girls and boys with ladies, we participated in fabulous dinners followed by ballroom dancing. These events included some big fat "military leaders" (who I also knew in other settings along with Puffy) as well as members of the "circle of 12+ 1," the group with whom Puffy performed rituals.

Between the ages of 3 and 5 years:

As any child ages, she spends more time in the broader world outside home and with other people. Similarly, practice of what my alters had learned was incorporated into less and less controlled situations. As my inner and outer worlds expanded, increasing use of actors, special effects, drugs and hypnosis in my training made alter personality parameters easier to embed, while enabling me to acquire skills in the process, much as in normal life, with each alter's knowledge and practice accruing over time. For my red path alters, sex with "clients" began, first with my handler or trainer in the room, then with him outside the door, then downstairs, etc., with the alter expected to be more amenable and skilled with each level attained, in new and varying situations.

In conjunction with this broadening world, the safety and well-being of self and others increasingly factored in as a training tool, with punishments and discipline becoming progressively more traumatic and harder to avoid. More and more, the programming-enhanced need to "get it right or suffer the consequences" became each alter's driving force—he or she must perform, behave, act, think, say, "be" as expected, or suffer extremely in one way or another. Even playful learning now also involved a degree of trying to stay safe and well, making it necessary for alters to do everything possible to maintain the beliefs and behaviors they had been given. Anything else (questions or disobedience) might result in something bad happening to them, or to things, animals, or people about whom the alter cared. This helped shape each alter's interests, desires and motivations while making them even more malleable.

Written symbols and words also came into critical focus at this age, in the real world and in trainings, as well as in the training storage and trigger mechanisms used. The inner world was filling up. Where colors, shapes and symbols had been used with branches and leaves, now books with words replaced picture books, while road warning and direction signs (e.g., a STOP sign) and more were added to the symbolic internal items, and to the associations and links being forged by the carefully planned and executed experiences. Words were significant in my training (due to my aptitude-tested abilities and resulting training paths) and these were the initial building blocks used to teach me to read and write fluently at a very young age. Words were labels that made programs easy to store and access, especially as I grew older.

The foundational leaf color orange was linked to internal alarms if the security of the programming was breached. It involved pattern and word recognition and the reporting and recording of information and experiences, both internally and externally. From earliest lessons, orange connected the “controller,” “storyteller” and “reporter” alters to key belief system trigger phrases like “Get the story right,” “Don’t miss anything,” “Note every detail,” and “They’re always watching.” Orange programs, like the first sign of the fall season, warned “the fall is coming” (meaning “nearing a fall,” “watch my step,” “be careful” what I said or did), inducing a state of ever-present hyper-alertness caused by terror over what would happen if a mistake was made.

This requirement of accuracy and attention to detail was also part of the white “word path” training. At first using pictures, then words, by 5 years of age, a little “scribe”/”scholar in training” alter had learned to make point-form lists for the “military leaders” at their planning meetings (they believed the silencing programs were infallible at this point and found me entertaining in this role), tracking group needs, who agreed with what, decisions made, etc. Another photographic memory building block, this progressed to detailed note-taking, then speech writing, and ultimately coalesced, by age 10, into alters who believed themselves to be an oracle and a preacher channeling the words of the gods, and rousing and rallying the crowds (or “people will suffer in these times of great change”). By age 7, I had read all the Nancy Drew and Hardy Boys mystery stories, at 8 was reading Perry Mason murder mysteries, and before 10, a huge, previously installed Inner World library held “ancient books and scrolls” that were the records of all “I” had listed, noted, read and learned. (To this day, I still have a “scrolling marquee across the front of my brain,” with my every thought plus the words I am hearing printed out in text.) Names however (and other words that could be used to identify characteristics or otherwise implicate my trainers, handlers or clients) were different. To protect against disclosure, every memory of such was unfailingly and automatically shunted away to the secret place in my mind (eventually entire special “code access only” storage areas in my inner world) that only the trainers and handlers knew about. For this purpose, from initial creation, all known alters were taught not to notice or be aware of (and seemingly not remember) such details. This was easily accomplished with simple, reality-denying statements (“don’t be silly, that’s not true, no-one like that, or named that, was here, you made it all up, stop lying”), which, when applied immediately and consistently, invalidated and denied the alters’ truth while creating and enforcing whatever false reality was needed. If this was insufficient, a hard slap across the face or some other quick, painful or shocking action would usually ensure that “what is forgotten remains forgotten.”

Around 4 to 5 years of age:

This was an age when many splits were induced to form a broader range of alter emotional/belief system states, (i.e., “I’m rotten to the core,” “I just want to curl up and die”), the crippling, crazy-making foundations of later “conformity measures” for controlling alter behavior patterns. Some of these splits were intentional. Others were accidental, occurring spontaneously when too much trauma came too close together, sometimes causing a number of splits during one incident. Since (as I have been told) mind-control programmers are usually trained to recognize the moment a split occurs (by a few very specific physical indications such as a shift in body posture or a particular sound that infants are reputed to make at that moment), most accidental splits were recognized and made use of, though an undetected split did occur now and then. As an example, in my “real life” childhood I was in and out of the hospital with severe asthma. The medical tests and treatments I underwent were often very painful and/or traumatic, so over the years I ended up with an entire group (“The Isolation Ward Kids”) of undetected alter splits, each of them a secret, taking over for me in repeated medical situations.

Around the age of 6:

Each (known) alter’s programming integrity was tested. This was accomplished without the alters’ awareness, by testing for level of skill acquisition. My red path alters, for example, were left completely alone with a client from start to finish, including taking his/her money, believing the test to be for their sex skills and overall “value,” while, among other things, tests were really of my overall trustworthiness (would I talk/tell secrets, try to run/escape?).

My dark blue and black path “soldier” alters were tested for their ability to be cold, calculating and cruel as needed, and to “follow orders no matter what.” At age 5, the death and dissection of a kitten was proof of the black soldier alter being able to “stomach the job,” and at 6, a test proving “family loyalty” forced a choice for the dark blue alter between letting my little brother get hurt or letting our pet rabbit suffer and die. Among other things, along with the actual intent, any capitulation in such double-bind situations left me with crippling, soul-deadening shame, guilt, powerlessness and helplessness, especially in the presence of people with authority or “good, decent people.”

After the tests had been made and satisfactory programming integrity confirmed, the inner world was then sealed, trapping foundational “virtues” alters (but not the other alters, who mainly received the actual training) inside with their programmed realities, behaviours, etc. This “seal” or “cap” built internal dissociative barriers that among other things, made alters, despite living there when not out in the body, completely unable to distinguish the inner world from the outer. They were left with only their personal belief systems, personality traits and skills, and the “safe, acceptable, allowed” memories of their portions of my life. (This remained the status quo until “I” discovered the existence of the alters and inner world at the age of 31.) This ensured that the sealed in alters stayed stuck at an age and stage of development that believed in fairy tales and magic, and lacked the ability to distinguish between fact and fantasy. As the seal was done, “re-activation coding”[3] was incorporated so that, if necessary at a later time, my trainers could open the seal, make necessary changes and additions to my inner world and what it held, then reseal it afterwards.

Middle Steps: 6 to 12 Years

Fact or Fancy? Learn & Practice: 6–9 years:

By 6 to 7 years old:

After the “seal” was solidly in place for all alters (in October 1966, just after I entered 1st grade in primary school), the main focus of my training shifted to role responsibility and a steady acquisition of knowledge and skill. Building upon the locked-in basic feelings, thoughts and responses of the foundational trainings, this was a time of intense and hard-driving learning and practice, often trauma-based, always with a baseline of fear that I must “prove (my) worth” or be “too much trouble” and “suffer the consequences.” Terror and despair became my constant companions, keeping me in a hyper-vigilant “fight or flight” mode all the time, even during sleep.

Adding to my unconscious terror, red alters began to be used in a series of pornographic and snuff films with satanic ritual themes, created in conjunction with actual local satanic cults and pedophile groups. These alters, like all alters used in various porn and/or snuff films over the years, believed the experiences to be completely real—one alter honestly believed she was being groomed to be “The Bride of Satan” and was quite proud of it! Most of these films were a side-line of my handler, and often involved some or all of his own “ritual circle group”—referred to as “the circle of 12 + 1,” because 12 would form the circle and 1 “power tool” (me—there may have been others too, but not when I was there) would be in the middle. My inclusion in a few of these types of films was also due to one or both of my parents “renting me out” to various groups. In my experience, these types of organized crime groups and their members interact and assist each other in their different pursuits.

Another area of hard-driven training, from age five to nine or ten, occurred when Puffy took me to “military” planning sessions I call Out of Time Rallies, since I was told they took place “outside of time” and that the only way to get to them was by way of the “magic gateway chair.” These were mainly where the white scribe alter was developed and trained, taking notes for the “fat old military leaders” while also serving as a sexual entertainment tool for their concurrent orgies. (These men seem to have included sex in most things they did!) It was at these sessions that I learned details of the “great leader’s plans” and the eventual planned role for my white path of “rallying the people,” which greatly added to my underlying terror.

At other times, in another terror-creating aspect of my “secret life” that took place from toddlerhood to age 12, Puffy was sometimes among these same men, on a huge, glamorous offshore yacht that was used for child sex slave trafficking, among other things. When I was little, pink and/or red alters were mostly just passed around for lap dances and other sexual abuses, or made to dance and otherwise entertain, all while being treated and spoken to like a little princess who was precious and loved. Sometimes my young dark blue and black soldier alters were forced to “do battle” here with other young boys in soldier training, while the men placed bets to see which of us “had what it takes to succeed.” As I grew older, pink and red alters were also groomed here for “hostess,” “respected lady,” and other linked roles in high society. At some point, it became part of the red alters’ jobs to help break down, then train as sex slaves those other child victims who were my age or younger. This use of me continued until I was twelve.

My grandfather was often the one who took me there, when he made his deliveries of “newly acquired trainees,” who were usually missing or unregistered children of all races and ages, who had been transported from other places in the country and were being readied for shipping and sale in other countries. I remember being in the boat with these children when grandpa was handing them over, helping them climb the ladder up the side of the yacht. At other times I was already on the yacht, lined up beside Puffy awaiting grandpa’s shipment, with all the men in their dark blue military uniforms with their fancy insignia lined up beside and across, in one of those two-sided formal greeting rows, and grandpa (in the same uniform) saluting as he handed over the latest shipment, with the formal military words of report, delivery and handing over of authority, and even me saluting back. I was in a formal gown for those times, to indicate that the children were being handed over to me for training. This pomp and ceremony made me believe it was legitimate and above board, and made the other children (who were drugged, starved, beaten, confused and terrified) believe it too, giving me clear authority over them as they were led, dragged or pushed through to their "quarters" and assigned "bunks."

The physiological and chemical overload from all the events occurring outside of my conscious awareness produced severe asthma by this age of 6, ulcers by 11, and by my teens emphysema and cervical cancer. Long hospital stays became part of my life and were simply incorporated into my training—lessons and abuse could take place there as easily as anywhere else, and sometimes it was quite convenient, providing credibility, and equipment for experiments and training.

By this age, my inner world had many boxes, filled with the paper records (drawings, symbols, lists, printed and written words, phrases and story-like descriptive reports) that had been in full use for years. Things were getting messy and starting to become uncontainable.

One day, I "went to pieces": when Dad opened a suitcase and pulled out the dummy he used for teaching CPR and mouth-to-mouth resuscitation, I thought it was a real lady and my mind snapped—I "short-circuited," screaming aloud as my vision fragmented and blurred, shifting in and out of focus. Suddenly nothing made sense, I couldn't breathe. I lost my balance and fell to the living room floor, crying, shaking, kicking, screaming. Thoughts of "help me" and "what's happening to me?" spun in my mind, mixed with "I want to die" and "I'm crazy," while Dad, confused, yelled at Mom "what's happening to her?" Mom had obviously been warned of the possibility of something like this happening. She ignored Dad, grabbed the suitcase, stuffed me into it, and snapped it closed. Hyperventilating, my head spinning, and nearly unconscious, I heard Dad questioning her as she loaded us in the car and raced us to the nearby military base where I was turned over for "adjustments and fine-tuning" and immediately sedated into calm submission.

My dark blue-clad "tough girl" and "soldier" alters were then "repaired" in the brown wooden electric chair with silver ("spiritual stuff") and black ("internal security") attachments. Programs to "keep the pieces separate" were installed in them and other "internal alarms/security" alters of the black, dark blue and orange paths, using alterations to already existing security mechanisms, whirlwinds and tornadoes, as well as hallucinogenic drugs, pulsing and flashing strobe lights, and carefully administered zaps of electroshock. This process split off an alter in a permanent state of craziness, who was later used in “conformity measures” programming. No opportunity was missed to make a lesson out of my life experiences.

At 8 years of age:

Unbeknownst to my handler and trainers, a record keeper alter split off and got stuck at age eight, due to an overload of righteous outrage and hate from witnessing and recording too much hateful, horrific wrongness and injustice. Most of the “boxes of records” were kept by this alter and hidden in my inner tunnels. Luckily, “files in folders” had recently been introduced and instituted as the main storage system of my inner world, so this absence amazingly went unnoted, and the records remained pure and intact until this alter was discovered in my late 30’s. As a result of this particular split, a significant piece of my natural activist/defender voice escaped later “adjustments and fine-tuning,” and was never caught in the “shutdown and discard” programming which happened later. Instead, I was left with a burning desire to right wrongs, stop injustices, and generally “fight for the underdog” by bringing about positive change and transformation.

Training incorporated more and more nasty, painful, sickening aspects. Alters were taught ways of distracting themselves when it was “awful or yucky”: counting or chanting/repeating a word or phrase silently, squeezing something tightly, or “getting lost in the music.” Reel-to-reel tapes joined the record playing stereo system, Polaroid camera, film projector, and other recording and reporting devices that had already accrued in my inner world. The music had the side effect of providing endless inspiration (it was the late 60’s), even though this helpful escape mechanism was also used to create new trigger phrases and reinforce programming. It worked well with the previously installed “inner soundtrack,” and was maintained by the only green path alters I had: a “green tree man” elf character whose job was to ensure that the correct, programmed rhymes, chants, songs or music for each situation were continually playing in my mind, guiding and shaping my feelings and responses on a sub-verbal level; and a combination Peter Pan/Pied Piper alter, hiding and playing the flute up in the trees in the inner forest. The aftereffects of this system still make me highly sensitive to the atmosphere and mood/emotional state that music creates.

Life is a Stage: Adjustments & Fine Tuning: 9 to 12 Years

9 to 12 years:

This period was about me taking my place on “the stage of life,” (also a place in my inner world) out in the world of pre-teen peer pressure and media influence. Staged and scripted scenarios presented in the external world, sometimes on the stage of a small theater, were instantly credible and completely believable to alters. As my interest in them naturally grew, popular fashions, teen idols, and hit parade music became powerful tools in the shaping of my now numerous alters. Many new storage and trigger mechanisms had to be created in my inner world too: clothes, purses, high-heeled shoes, make-up, and other feminine accessories for the red and pink alters; promotion-declaring insignias and more powerful weapons (such as a rifle) for the dark blue and black alters’ cache; and much more, since, for proper program cohesion and function, each alter and each path had to have their own “inner world stuff.”

By 9 years:

I had reached a point of overall, soul-level inability to cope with the grim existence that was my life: now, no amount of dissociation was sufficient to make it bearable. From the time I was tiny, anything that comforted or empowered me was always taken away or somehow tainted, so I could not or would not be able to draw upon it in my times of need. When I showed an affinity for nature and animals, I was taught, and believed, that “my allergies” made them dangerous for me to be near, touch or have these comforts. Everything I inherently excelled at and/or delighted in, such as helping, sharing, communicating, entertaining, or educating, was exploited. Unconsciously trapped in hopeless panic and terror, and unable to express myself so I could be heard and saved, my soul, needing to take action to make things better, started producing uncontrollable “freakouts”: times when I “short circuited” and appeared to be a “crazy wild thing,” crying, raging, shouting and screaming, causing damage, scaring and distressing those around me while injuring myself or working myself into an asthma attack.

During one of these incidents, I told secrets to hospital staff. This was followed by a lesson in the local psychiatric hospital, where there was a conveniently empty ward. My trainers gave me what I call “crazy talk” programming, with the messages: “Don’t tell or you’ll be locked up and lose your rights,” “You can’t escape,” and “You can run but you can’t hide.” I was shackled to a bed and locked in a padded room until a “staff member” whom I thought was my ally left my shackle unlocked and the door open. A rebellious alter took the staged chance, ran, and thought she had escaped, only to be captured and have the resulting punishment lessons shatter all hope. After that, a “sick but always cheerful and smiling" alter came to maintain the necessary "program and path-approved" behaviors during my increasingly frequent hospitalizations, regardless of the condition I was in, the trauma I experienced, or the drugs I was given. This weak, fragile alter wore a light blue dressing gown and in the inner world was trapped in a dark blue, silver and black wheelchair, reminiscent of "the magic chair." After this incident, I was also given the label "hyperactive" (today it would be Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder) and put on four adult doses per day of the drug Librium (the Ritalin of those times) to "keep me from getting too wound up" so I would be more manageable.

By about age 10:

File rooms in my inner world housed file cabinets filled with folders of training and programming experiences. A fastidious grey file-keeper alter, able to order and reference files but not understand what was in them, was created to keep the existence of the entire collection hidden, and each alter's knowledge and skills away from the other alters. This intentional hiddenness made healing difficult in later years: even with the file-keeper helping, finding and accessing memories and information took patience, intuition and determination, with much time and effort required to understand, interpret, and weave a way through each unique piece of programming. Utmost caution had to be used, since "fail-safes, booby-traps, and time bombs" had been installed as security measures.

"Fail-safes" are what I call the various "self-destruct," "booby-trap," and "time-bomb" programs. They were put in from the start of my training, and became more detailed, involved and tailored to me and my alters as time went by. They included instructions to never tell, keep silent, whisk knowledge or memories away, keep the pieces separate, or go crazy, and later to destroy my own credibility, sabotage myself, attempt suicide, or engage in addictions to cope or to belong, as well as the internal systems that reported infractions so punishments or repairs could be done. They were the programs that made me crash or be flooded with unbearable feelings, that locked away certain memories, or that made a memory or programmed belief impossible to escape from. Like a spider-web, they were linked, woven together to intersect, support, and back each other up. This was done by using the same phrases, such as "too much trouble," over and over, woven into many different trainings so that each particular trigger phrase could set a cascade of programs into effect, all linked and doing their own number on me. When I was older and being shut down, they were intended to be crippling mentally, emotionally, and physically (and I believe spiritually too), and the effects of the programs were designed to spiral, getting worse when they should get better. Affirmations that work well with the average person, for example, could make things far worse and actually trigger increased problems for me because of these kinds of programs.

One significant type of fail-safe programming involved “trip wires,” which could trigger actual physical responses, such as an arm jerking, or pain in the chest that felt like a heart attack. These began as part of two separate aspects of my training; “flying” (for fairies, witch, and genie alters—done in a harness of the sort used in circus/gymnastics training), and being a “puppet on a string” (mostly to prove I was not in control of my own body). Both had me “encased in” wires and/or string (hidden from sight so the alters didn’t know they were there) in a way that enabled my trainers to control my movements from a distance, and making it all “magical powers.” Over time, these wires were used to form a network of control points throughout my body, each of which had specific “fail-safe” body responses linked to it; telling a secret produced the feeling of being choked for example, or ignoring an internal warning about a fall could make a knee buckle to make me truly fall and thereby enforce the validity of the warning.

“Self-destructs,” mostly done after this age of 10, were triggered if I messed with my training (with or without a therapist), or became aware of memories I was not supposed to know. They could cause a “trip wire” physical response, and/or trigger a flood of feelings, without the content, from emotionally traumatic memories such as the death of a loved one, being outcast by “the gods,” or being told I was worthless, had failed, belonged in hell, or that no one could love me or save me. They offered relief from these unbearable feelings and physical sensations through distracting and potentially lethal activities, such as suicide attempts and other self-harming activities. “Time bombs” were programs that had situation or time-specific triggers built into them—for example, a set time or date to perform an assigned task, or to have self-destruct programs kick in even though I wasn’t in contact with my trainers.

Crucial testing was also done at this age, to determine any need for adjustments and fine-tuning, and to look for evidence of any programming disintegration that would indicate my expiry date was nearing. Apparently unexpectedly, during the extreme test situations, when I was a child only 10 and 11 years old, evidence of deterioration (my soul fighting back) sprang up everywhere.

My white path “rallying and preaching” training was intended for me to speak the “words of the gods” at public events, and directed at making me believe I was helping the “great leader” and his followers save the world. In 1971, my split off activist alter had gathered, abstracted, and honed this training enough to take action in the real world when I was in an institution for sick children. The activist alter saw things that needed to change in the children’s hospital, rallied other children to the cause, and organized a protest march. By the end of my four-month stay, new policies allowed residents to choose their own seats and companions and even converse during meals in the dining room, and to decorate their lounge and recreation rooms as they pleased. My part in this had dire consequences for me though, since it evidenced to my handler and trainers that my programming was deteriorating, forcing them to speed up their plans for their final uses of me before my shutdown.

Shortly thereafter, I found myself in a cage, on a stage in a large military mess tent, displaying the various “slave trainings” to rows of seated men in dark blue military dress uniforms. Their hooting, jeering, laughter and catcalls enraged my rebel and activist alters as I was “switched” by my handler from alter to alter to show the various trainings—from submissive sex slave to tough soldier to haughty princess, to coy, provocative little girl, to dominatrix, to oracle, to elf chanting “programming rhymes” and more—in rapid succession. Most of these alters were shocked and confused to find themselves in a cage, let alone triggered to display their various “personality/training profiles.” Different music and lighting were used for different alters, and their names and trigger phrases were called out on a loudspeaker by Puffy. Sometimes he gave me a quick zap through the cage bars under my feet, or a flick of a whip or a poke with a stick—whatever helped trigger the behavior being displayed. He and my trainers thought in the long-term, and were more focused on showing what could be created than what was already available: buyers were told they could order training tailor-made for their purposes, in addition to already trained children.

Before this incident, most demonstrations occurred in small gatherings in the places I was abused in (most often on the offshore yacht) and displayed only a couple of types of trainings specific to what the buyers wanted, so did not put me through such trauma in the process. This time, more drugged up than ever before, with a new combination of drugs, in pain and unbearably confused by the rapid succession of switches to alters with conflicting trainings, beliefs and feelings, something in my mind snapped. I started screaming and swearing at the men from inside the cage, spitting, rattling and slamming myself against the bars. The resulting series of punishments for this incident produced a number of splits, including an alter that lived in a cage.

At 11 years old:

Together with increasingly poor test results, the above incidents had proved irrevocably that I was uncontrollable. “Adjustments and fine-tuning” suddenly and drastically changed to what I call “shutdown” and “discard” programming. Lessons shifted to mainly drugged, brutally painful and confusing “nightmares come to life,” intended to severely and permanently cripple or destroy my credibility, my ability to function coherently and consistently, and my sanity and physical body if necessary.

Soon after the caged demonstration, white alters who were the “voice and words of the gods” (the scholar/writer, oracle, and preacher) were “outcast from the realm of the gods,” through deliberately engineered “failed tests” of their skills followed by terrifying, shaming and humiliating derision and belittlement about their inability to fulfill their “responsibility to the gods and the people” mixed with accusations of “putting people and loved ones in danger” through stupid, careless, selfish choices and actions. While I was under the influence of mind-altering drugs that distorted perception and sensation, initial “shutdown” scenarios (done with hypnosis and early holographic projections/movies on a staged set with actors) involved masses of people rioting and being injured or killed because of my failures.

Then, strapped in the by now familiar “magic gateway chair,” these white alters “rode the rainbow” to “the realm of the gods,” where they were told (and shown using holographic projections in smoke-filled air) that they were “no longer of value and had become too much trouble,” whereupon they were “cast out” and tossed into a simulated hell where they were told they belonged. These experiences transferred into the inner world, leaving one alter trapped in “purgatory,” on the “outskirts of heaven,” in smoky clouds of grey fog, hiding from the gods to avoid being sent back to hell.

Meanwhile, alters of other color paths were being set up for their own shutdown scenarios. One night in my handler’s luxurious bedroom, I “overheard” a conversation about plans for my handler’s upcoming monthly ceremonial circle, a ritual in which I was to send a “psychic arrow” to kill a man in another city who had become “too much trouble.” Again, this was more than I could take at a soul-level. Red path alters with “dominatrix” (bondage and sadmasochistic) training, influenced by my matriarchal cult background (in which women were dominant and men subservient) and inspired at age six by Nancy Sinatra’s mid-60’s song “These Boots Are Made For Walking,” decided this was the time to take matters into their own hands and take control of their own lives—they were not going to “damn my own soul for some stupid man’s sake.”

Immediate dire action seemed the only recourse: with heart-pounding terror, these alters managed to carefully plan and painstakingly execute traitorous actions against my handler and his circle, by putting poison into the ceremonial drink, which it was my job to mix. After these near deadly actions were discovered (thankfully before they did any harm) the red “powerful, accomplished, respected” lady and hostess alters were stripped of power in a several-days-long nightmare time that began with being stripped naked, kicked and beaten in the center of the “circle of 12 + 1.” Undeniable evidence of my drop in status to outright slave came when I was shackled and chained, then forced to participate in the very crime my actions had been intended to save me from, after which I was “left to rot” in the cold, dark, hungry isolation of a cage in the basement of my handler’s estate house. Eventually a different colored alter was called forth and removed from this place, thus ensuring that in the inner world the red alters remained beaten and caged, damned, sent to hell or otherwise imprisoned in their piece of this nightmare, until rediscovered 3 decades later.

For the next piece of this shutdown/discard program series, a three-year-old white alter was called forth by my handler’s “housekeeper” woman while being freed from the cage in the dark. Confused and nearly fetal with pain, hunger and exhaustion, the “filthy little thing” was roughly shoved in a scalding hot bath, and scrubbed clean with a hard brush, while being angrily lectured on the “terrible sins against the master,” told to “pray to God for forgiveness” and that she (I) was “too much trouble, the master should get rid of me before she ruined everything.” Not remembering anything of the cage or what came before this brutal treatment, the alter didn’t know what sins had been committed. After briskly toweling and quickly dressing me in a little girl’s white dress, ankle socks and patent leather shoes, then yanking a brush through my long, still wet and knotted hair, the housekeeper created further mind-boggling confusion. While tying white ribbons in my tight pigtails, she suddenly spoke tenderly, stroked my face gently, said how sad it all was and she’d miss me, what a sweet little thing I was, then, with a kiss on the cheek, a warm hug and kindly little swat on the bottom, sent me scurrying upstairs to the master, shaking her head and intoning “too bad you’re so much trouble.”

The alter innocently skipped upstairs to the familiar large, heavily brocaded, dimly lit bedroom, taking her usual place in the center of the tight circle with my handler (“the master”) and the 11 other circle members. Immediately, one painful, shock-inducing kick in the stomach began a long, torturous “punishment and purification ceremony” that successively called forth 2, 3, 4, and 5 year old alters for beatings (to “get the evil out”) and sexual abuse (to “anoint” and “plant good seeds” to “save” me). This incident ended with the little white alter called forth again to be choked into silence and unconsciousness as the new role parameters were reiterated. Another split happened and another alter was left trapped, locked in a debilitating, paralyzing moment in time, until therapy brought freedom decades later.

Also at age 11:

Similarly, after using re-activation codes to open the seal, my trainers individually called forth three of the original foundational “virtues” alters (red, green, and yellow) and “encased them in webs,” with the aid of paralyzing drugs and the systematic torture of carving fine spider-web-like lines all over my body then painting them red and/or black: when the paint dried and shriveled, the lines looked and felt like burning traps that constricted. Then these alters were “thrown into the (inner) tunnels” (by throwing them into actual tunnels) and “left to rot,” quite effectively silencing them by locking them into the immobilizing, excruciatingly painful restricted roles that were all they were thereafter to be allowed. Other alters were later taken out of the tunnels, dressed, and returned to real life.

Last Steps: 12 to 18 Years

Coming of Age. Discarded & Dropping Out: 12–15 years:

When I was 12 years old:

Restructuring of my inner world was required to accommodate these and other changes to alter characters and role parameters. New programs and accompanying trigger and storage mechanisms were installed, including “self-destructs,” “booby-traps,” “time-bombs” and other “fail-safes.” Among these were implanted alters, who were visible to others in my inner world, but not really alters in the true sense, in that they were undeveloped so had no life histories. They were mainly “props,” like the castle and the forest, to make my inner world look the way my trainers wanted it to look, though they were able to watch and report “infractions” so that further controls could be implemented or “fail-safe programs” activated when necessary.

White path alters had by this point been told they were “too stupid to make the grade” and “too selfish to be trusted.” “The gods decreed” they had lost their rights: “speaking, writing or maintaining records of the words and truths of the gods,” or otherwise “accessing or using the power of the gods” would harm someone, maybe me, maybe some unknown number of others. Judged “too clumsy and lacking in grace and beauty to be of value” and “stripped of all power, authority and respect,” red path alters were no longer “proper ladies”: any attendance at the high-class parties, “gatherings” or “ceremonies” was solely as a slave at the mercy of my master(s).

The inner dream castle (originally created when I was about 3 years old for pink and red alters to live in “royally” as fairies, princesses, and “mistresses of fine residence and standards”) underwent significant changes during this time. The scholar/writer alter was sealed in his library tower with all of the white path scrolls and other records: to ensure only “allowed knowledge” was able to be known or expressed, a detached, emotionless grey “business writer” alter was split off and installed in a room at the foot of the tower as a gatekeeper.

The shutdown of my pink path brought a new tower to the castle to imprison a princess alter modeled on fairy tale Rapunzel, sealed in alone to “await a prince to save her.” This programming scenario began with the princess alter waking up, as usual, to breakfast in “my” bed brought in by “my” servants. Puffy suddenly burst into the room, yelling and screaming at me about my “betrayal,” throwing my breakfast to the floor, yanking me out of bed, and throwing me around as he ranted. This alter didn’t understand or know what he was talking about. Crying in hysterical terror and confusion at this unfamiliar treatment, I cringed, asking repeatedly what I had done wrong and what he meant, and saying “I’m sorry” over and over, even though I didn’t know what I was sorry for. He trashed the bed’s canopy and yanked all of my beautiful gowns out of the closet, throwing them in a heap on the floor. He dumped all my jewelry on top, smashing my music boxes and porcelain horse and doll collections in with the mess, all the while screaming that I had betrayed him and had no right to anything ever again. Then he called in his housekeeper and told her to burn it all.

Next I was dragged to the tower room and locked in with only a hair brush, as he told me I could stay there and rot for all he cared—maybe some other prince would come and save me, but he didn’t want anything to do with me ever again. He said I was worse than garbage, and all sorts of awful stuff, while I kept crying “but I love you, I would never do anything to hurt you” in confusion and despair. The new “Rapunzel” alter created during this trauma was left there. Then the seal procedure was done, truly locking this part of me away until I was in my 30’s. Puffy didn’t know he had created a new alter; he thought he had sealed away the original princess alter. During the time I was actually imprisoned there (forever for the alter) food was slipped in on a tray through a little flap at the bottom of the door. “I” thought I was going to die there.

All of this helped redefine alter characters and roles. Using the original “sealed in” foundational “color-coded virtues” alters and their previously assigned attributes as entry points, further shutdown and discard programs were installed according to those alters’ ages and developmental stages. Layered and interwoven as always, each incident built upon previous ones, with training now redefining each color group while forging new links to the media stereotypes best-suited to the “adjusted reality” (belief systems, behaviors, mannerisms, attire, etc.), shaping the alters’ thoughts, feelings, words and actions along new life paths as societal outcasts: rebels, partiers, dropouts, sex and substance addicts, criminals and the mentally ill. Where my training had been based on following “good” paths (such as “good girl” or “good soldier,” as defined by the “virtues” attributes), now I was sentenced to only “bad” paths. Tough alters learned they belonged on the streets. Red path alters became only a “woman in a red dress”: loose and easy, a slave to sex and/or a “sex slave” to be dominated—sinful, adulterous or a prostitute.

Each color path was thereafter taught that their only avenue to feeling “good” or “powerful” was that of being “bad,” so being stupid, scary, tough, weak, crazy, a hippie, rebel, partier, or dropout became good, necessary, desirable. Alters were trained to embrace “wild times” filled with sex, drugs, alcohol, criminal activities and/or weird, “flaky” practices. These despicable forced actions (including violence and sexual victimization or predation of the sorts I had been subjected to) sickened me at a soul-level, resulting in deep guilt, shame, self-disgust, belief in my “badness,” and an unwillingness to know myself or even think about or remember the awful things I had done that would prove how bad I was.

The mind-control and torture scenarios and tactics became more devastating and were usually at least potentially, and often actually, life-threatening.

When I was still only twelve years old, the dark blue and black path soldier shutdown involved a series of incidents in which, while drugged with LSD, I had to endure a “final survival skills exam” in a forested section of a local military shooting range/training ground. The staged event brought “failure,” beatings and interrogation as a “prisoner of the enemy,” then escape when I used self-defense training against other “soldiers” (children like me!). Then I was captured, given the label “traitor,” and forced to undergo more interrogation with a shocking gang rape. This reduced my cold, tough, mostly male alters to “a stupid, whimpering, useless little girl” on the floor. Then, almost worse humiliation: the elite black soldier alter was demoted to “guardsman/gatekeeper.” This meant that in the inner world he was seated at the door to the new inner bunkers that housed undeveloped “fat old men” leader alters. (Hastily implanted with hypnotic suggestion and generic looking photographs/visual images, they were based on the “fat military leaders” of my trainings, thus ensuring that if memories leaked they would be attributed to these implants rather than the actual men involved.) The black soldier alter had only the simple assignment to “maintain the status quo and await new mission orders, or recall and reactivation.” “Sealed in” concussed, feeling confused, sick, stupid, soiled, tainted, worthless and hopeless, this alter and the others connected to him were later called forth and easily convinced to “drown their sorrows like any soldier would under the circumstances”: drunkenness became “wise.”

This series of incidents also involved my trainers adding barracks to the military base in my inner world and moving “military-related files” there. Unknown to them, my file-keeper alter decided to keep his own separate files from that point onward. The trainers went on to implant a “24-man Rear Guard” (more hastily suggested, mostly undeveloped alters, based on the “monkey guardsmen” in the Wizard of Oz and labeled “the Princess’s Guard”—mainly they just marched about in my head and sang “Ho, ee, oh, ho, oh”), install a new “re-activation code,” then “seal” it all with a new “cap”—a brown-uniformed “captain” alter, implanted and shallowly developed as a “good, kind, decent and loyal gatekeeper.” He was also given the title “brown leader,” placing him in charge of the brown “whisk away” and other “cover-up” security measures.

About this same time, changes were made to the tasks of a little alter named Pat, who had been created when I was 2 ½, then developed and trained with single-minded purpose: to keep “my dangerous true power” (understood by her to be a ball of yellow power wrapped in black to keep it contained, but really just a black bowling ball that she rolled on the ground) away from all alters unless properly accessed by my trainers and handler (or my mother for her healing magic coven). Now, her task shifted to rolling patterns with her ball on a large checkerboard-like square on the ground. She had to memorize specific patterns for specific aspects of a given situation, defined by the sounds, setting, people, clothing, props, behaviours, words, etc, in the staged scenario, each of which was color- and path-connected through other alters and somehow linked to her by way of the process of practice and memorization, aided by the green alter’s rhymes. Each square was linked to a specific category of these determinants, with each corner and side used to define them; examples include a square for lighting, noises/sounds, people present, body positions, clothing, etc. At first, she was given directions as she rolled her ball to the positions for each simple pattern “dark, noisy, men in suits, sitting” for example. As time passed, a patch of color was added to each square and she was taught more complex patterns and interpretations that could be applied to life in general in the real world. Thereafter Pat “rolled the patterns” continuously on the checkerboard in the inner world.

Meanwhile, as Pat mastered rolling the patterns she was taught, alterations were being made to an old crone “controller” alter and her control board, both of which were originally created when I was about 4 years old as part of the internal control and trigger systems for, among other things, my green alters and “inner soundtrack,” and later the “trip wires” and other “fail-safe’s.” Now, Controller’s job expanded to include interpreting the patterns and their connected colors and activating the correct alters in response. Her training was done using wrinkled, skin-colored gloves on my hands, a silver “Star Trek” look-alike control board with various colors of toggle switches, and experience watching another child (who this alter was told was Pat) roll the patterns through a window overlooking the checkerboard. I never had any image of the controller alter except the hands, the control board, and the window she looked out to see the patterns.

All of this was to give my personality system a new structure: a combination of four alters were to be simultaneously present in my consciousness at all times, though only one could actually be “out” at any given time. This would ensure two things: that I always appeared “normal” (not multiple) to the world; and that only the appropriate skills and knowledge base were accessible in any given situation. To accomplish this, Pat first had to see and hear where I was and what was happening, then instantly roll the patterns (inside my head) to convey the specifics of the situation. These patterns were then interpreted by the controller alter, who flipped the right combination of switches to bring the correct alters to “just below the surface” where they could then take their turns “out” as the situation warranted.

This process continued to relay the necessary information, now also adjusted to fit the new parameters of alter roles, for green alters to know which songs, rhymes, etc. to run in my head as instructions to the alters who were thus called forth. Alters were always very situation-specific for me; too much going on at once, or an unfamiliar situation could leave me too confused to function or communicate coherently. With this complex interplay always at work, it became worse. Pat and the controller never slept unless the body did, and I believe the controller (along with a few others, most particularly a time-keeper alter and one accidental self-protector alter) was actually only partially asleep, staying ever-ready to ensure “our” safety and well-being. It felt as if the controller alter and the control board/mechanisms, as well as the time-keeper alter, were part of my brain functions, the same way the inner soundtrack still is, even now after integration. The closest I can come to explaining how she did her task is to say that she mumbled to herself as she did the switches, telling herself (and the rest of us) what she was doing.

How did I undo all this and what followed over the next few years? My inner world was active in ways my trainers hadn’t anticipated. In the late 1990’s, a group of alters remembered enough of what had happened to plan and execute a version of the reactivation sequence and codes. Internally, they “rode the rainbow” to the inner military base and “opened the gate.” With this “invasion,” it was discovered that none of the military alters had any loyalty to my trainers: they simply “followed orders for their own good” or because they were “good soldiers.” All were convinced to “follow new orders,” as long as the “correct codes” were given. The existence of these codes is what enabled my alters to access the necessary memories for healing to occur. The result of this inner journey (still unfolding another decade later) immediately included a “truckload of information” containing all of the “sealed in military records, files and file cabinets,” and the addition of the military alters to my inner healing co-operative.

Within weeks, the next series of discard programs, “breathe smoke or die,” began training the asthmatic, wheel-chair bound light blue alter (the primary one who was around when I was hospitalized) into an addiction to cigarettes, and a by-product belief in her own stupidity for engaging in such a habit. These incidents took place in a local hospital. In late July 1973, just before I entered junior high school, no-one noticed the oxygen tanks for my oxygen tent in the isolation ward were different from the usual ones. No one noticed they held smoke (dry ice and ?), even when my “pure breathing space” filled with thick grey clouds and my coughing, gasping and breathing distress immediately worsened, then degenerated completely until I lost consciousness. Over a period of days, no one other than those involved noticed the grey smoke, or the switch to real oxygen when they needed to revive me (done by a nurse who worked with my trainers.) No one heard the commanding voice offering the “choice” to “breathe smoke or die,” or noticed what was happening to me, repeatedly and with the same results each time. No one asked any questions either, even when my left lung collapsed. Though time to heal was finally permitted then, over the next year, this same procedure was repeated every few weeks or so, until I literally learned, at 13, to “breathe smoke or die”: it was less life-threatening to breathe the smoke than to be continually put through such suffering.

When I was 13, 14 and 15:

In high school, popularity and peer pressure became driving forces in my life: the normal teenage need to belong afforded a strong motivating factor in discard trainings at this stage. To create a teen alter to “fit in” with the training-approved peer groups, the pink “good fairy” alter and the white (“cloud” and “voice of the gods”) alters were traumatized together, forcing a merger and creating a new “bewitching, barefoot, tarot card reading, hippie/airhead/flake with absolute, absurd belief in magic and the healing arts.” This “everyday life” personality was modeled after the character “Samantha” in one particular episode of TV’s “Bewitched.”

Planned addictive patterns of smoking and drinking settled into place. Staged scenarios (using newly available theatrical and scientific special effects) continued adding new discard programming, while familiarizing alters with their “bad” roles before they were allowed out in the “real world.” Drugged with hallucinogens, seated in “the chair” under many-colored strobe lights, participating in acted-out scenarios involving older teens in training (some “discards” like me, others merely as “actors”) costumed as “the in crowd from my school,” I was taught that the way to belong was to “smoke, drink, skip classes, have sex, party, be wild, drop out and rebel.” Popular teen idols and movie and TV characters of the time showed this to be true. New belief systems were instilled quickly and easily. Over time, I was given further “rebel training” to enjoy hitchhiking, street-car racing and other dangerous activities, and to seek out gang members, drug dealers and other criminals for the “best deals” and the “most loyal, trustworthy friends to hang out with.”

Other training during this same period incorporated altering my feelings and perceptions through massive use of hallucinogenic drugs, mixed with large quantities of strong alcohol and extreme physical disorientation and duress. For example, one event I call “the idiot spin” had me very drunk, strapped in a device, and spun with great force, round about, upside down, left, right, and round and round again, as well as being suspended upside down for extended periods. Different alters were successively called forth during this spin and assaulted with many-colored flashing lights, painfully loud crashing, shattering sounds and music, and soul-wrenching accusations of the worst things they could imagine, until they vomited and/or passed out. The purpose of this spin was to tie all the colors together into a knot—a highly effective control mechanism state of sick craziness that could later instantly drop me to my knees or “send me over the edge.”

At 15:

Having robbed me of the honor roll status I maintained from first grade through to the end of my first year in junior high school, discard training had reduced me to failing grades two years later in senior high. The next step was complete removal of all normal teenage life. Using the excuse that I “missed too many classes due to illness” my parents and school principal arranged for me to drop out and take correspondence classes, with mandatory attendance at school events to ensure invitations from “ordinary peers” to connect me with the wild life I had been assigned. Now I stayed up most of the night, sometimes just reading or drinking with Dad (as I had been doing since the earliest discard trainings at 13), more frequently being trained or exploited by my handler or others. Based on earlier tests by my trainers, it was expected that I would not be able to maintain correspondence courses without the external motivation of teacher and classmates, so this was simply a step towards the end of further education for me. It also made me more accessible for discard programming situations, allowing plenty of time to instill new life habits and routines to further limit me. One example is the proven quite acceptable habit of hitchhiking to find parties, booze, drugs and sex: now it occurred daily, starting in the morning when I headed out to visit other dropouts.

For the spring and summer, I was given a furnished apartment and (despite my own babysitting income) my parents continued to provide me with a steady cash flow “for booze, food, parties, and other necessities of life.” I was encouraged to “just enjoy myself and invite lots of friends for parties and sleepovers”; life became endless diversions and wild adventures termed “a good way to prevent depression and introspection.” This setup afforded time and space for my abusers to create and develop a branch of the purple path for the first time since the “virtues” had been sealed away, blending the purple pick-pocketing and shoplifting skills (“swoop and grab” trainings of a little 3-year-old “genie on a magic flying carpet” alter), the “sex, manners and feminine wiles” of red, and the dark blue “tough girl/soldier” trainings to produce a magenta alter: bold, flirty, Mae West and Cher-styled “undercover spy,” “keyholder and gatekeeper to the secrets of power.” Thereafter, she kept track of my activities and those of others I was involved with, reported them to my trainers and handler, helped to ensure what was locked and sealed away inside stayed there, and also provided “access” for later re-activation and re-coding.

During this time, in conjunction with the creation of the magenta alter, a series of programs that I call “reframes” was done, as part of the whole redefinition of alter roles. Similar to the shutdowns when I was 12, these programs involved a series of separate incidents that locked away some alters and provided new role parameters for others. They were broken up and locked away in what I refer to as “time bubbles”: disconnected, fragmented, puzzling and distressing chunks of time that both seemed to disappear, and at the same time to hang around and haunt me with horrific, terrifying confusion, mini-flashbacks and nightmares.

Such time-bubbles had occurred since I was young, becoming worse after each new series of shutdown programming sessions, contributing to my belief in the trainings and in my “craziness.” All experiences encapsulated in time-bubbles incorporated the use of hypnosis, and whichever drugs, tools, equipment and methods were deemed best suited for the purpose of the incident and the alters involved. All were of extended duration and an extremely traumatic or worldview-shattering nature for the alters. Sometimes there were time-bubbles within time-bubbles, each holding a different alter’s part of the event. Or an alter’s time “out” might be so confusing for them that they were unable to recognize where one event ended and another months or years later began, so the whole lot would be lumped into one time-bubble.

Furthering the confusion, some of the shutdowns when I was pre-pubescent and many of these “reframes” and subsequent lockdown programs included “erasing” what had actually happened and building new, fake “normal, ordinary, everyday” types of memories in their place. Although unknown alters usually retained their own memories after these incidents, it still seriously hampered my healing, and makes it impossible for me to be absolutely sure of the exact order of these types of programs. For the purpose of this writing therefore, the order these types of events unfold is that which best conveys the patterns in how significant things were accomplished and the beliefs and behaviors that resulted.

The “reframe” series of programs started with the “eldest” red alter being assigned the role of “gatekeeper” for all the alters who had anything to do with sexual trainings, exploitation or rituals, most particularly the red alters and those who had split off to hold the darkest, most painful, traumatic aspects of these experiences, many of whom were part of a group called the “Dark Shadows.”

Next, a rapid “roll call” was done in a manner that brought all alters close to the surface but left none actually in control, with each alter or group being given new orders to either stay or “be banished forever to a far away realm where they could never harm anyone again.” Banished alters were then called forth, individually and in groups, and traumatized in ways that fit their programming, making them believe they were dangerous and/or failures, similar to the way it had been done in the early shutdowns. My body was then placed in the “magic gateway chair” and they were made to “ride the rainbow to distant realms” (actually various inner world places), “never to be seen or heard from again.”

Then, the live-theatre-style stage in my inner world was “renovated” and alters who had been told to stay were assigned “dressing rooms in the wings left and right of backstage,” where they were to “play out their roles on the stage of life.” The room of the reframed red “gatekeeper” alter was given a trapdoor, providing controlled access to the alters “submerged” in her, with “fail-safes” setup so that these alters’ memories (the craziest, darkest, most confusing, terrifying and crippling) would surface first and even I would find them unbelievable. (Sixteen years later, the stage and “stage of life” alters were the first to be discovered in therapy and come out to be part of the healing on a conscious level—luckily some of them were able to make sense of all this!) Color-codings and role definitions were pared, narrowed and reframed to simple, clearly identifiable stereotypes. The magenta “keyholder, gatekeeper, Mae West” alter was left in charge as “the actress on stage” that the “characters come through.”

After that, the dark blue “tough girl” alter was called forth and humiliatingly turned into a “tough biker dyke chick,” partly through a staged “seductive rape” incident by a female police officer on a police car in a closed-off section of a forested park, with male officers (some of whom I knew to be actual policemen) cheering her on and shouting obscenities about my “loving it with a woman” at me from the sidelines. This alter was defined as someone who “acted rather like Mae West, the bold, outrageous tough woman of an earlier time,” establishing the magenta alter as a sub-alter within her.

This combination of “personality and skills” made me behave like and appear to be just another wild, naughty, sexually acting-out teenager, allowing me to act like any of the “stage of life” alters when their type of behavior was required, without revealing any of my history or the existence of the rest of my personality system. To make this work efficiently and safely, the new system of four alters was implemented; the “bewitching teen to fit in” white alter, “gate-keeping” red alter, dark blue “tough biker dyke chick,” and magenta “undercover spy” were the primary alters, with the sick light blue alter the main “allowable” other. Pat’s patterns and the controller alter’s interpretations and options incorporated these changes that supposedly limited my system to these few alters.

Over the next few weeks, each of the “stage of life” alters was individually called forth and given a false “memory shell,” so that if they ever told tales, shared secrets or otherwise broke the silence, what they said initially would be false, or fragmented and confused, thereby discrediting any of the truth that might manage to surface. These “memory shells” provided a false common background of life experiences that naturally progressed to my programmed lifestyle and beliefs—those of the shutdowns, outcasts, and later, disables and lockdowns—making everything feel and appear to have been by my choice or resulting from my true nature. The memory shells were created by showing each alter bits and pieces of “memory” that had been photographed, filmed, or otherwise recorded on a “brain imaging screen,” spliced together with new clips of staged scenes with characters alters were told were them. (Further details on how this was done are included in the section when I am 18 years old, during the “brain wipe.”) Because of these shells, it took years of therapy before I came near to understanding how all the pieces fit together in the puzzling bigger picture of my life.

In September, living again with my parents (after “proving I was a failure” at correspondence classes), I was enrolled in a high school across town, with the explanation “the others are all full.” This meant I had to bus downtown and transfer at the corner where my new drug dealing buddies, dropouts, and other street people hung out. Discard programs made this situation impossible to resist, so I rarely made it to classes, and if I did, it was under the influence of drugs. A few weeks later, when I failed a math test (the one grade I had been allowed to maintain, since it did not afford opportunities for me to tell secrets) I was finally convinced that “I really am stupid” and did “belong on the streets,” so I dropped out of high school for the last time “by my own choice.”

Moving Out. Disabled and Locked Down: 16 to 18 Years

At 16 years:

Shortly after my sixteenth birthday, I was once again in the ceremonial circle, this time as a “conduit” in a ritual intended to “claim power” for Puffy’s latest project. At the crucial moment, soul-sickened by the state of my life and desperately hoping to end her servitude, a rebellious alter slipped out through the red gate-keeping alter who was “out,” and cursed the circle members, “damning (them) all to hell with the full power I now hold.” As one, they let out a huge, horrified gasp as their belief systems turned against them: the ritual was ended abruptly, and most fled in evident distress. Although she was never provided such an opportunity again, and punishment was a beating by Puffy (with her own chains) that didn’t end until he choked her into unconsciousness, I was deemed truly dangerous and satisfyingly, the deferential (though sarcastically used) title “madam sorcerer” was bestowed and a shadow of fear remained in his and my trainer’s eyes and behavior.

In retrospect, it is evident that “putting me in my place” (as was said often) was the agenda—and my place was to be one of life’s losers, a high school dropout whose sole aim in life was to party. My asthma attacks became more frequent, as did attacks of hysteria. I ran away from home at every opportunity, only to be tracked down by my mother and berated, belittled and shamed with trigger phrases wherever I was found, in front of whoever was there.

At home, my family continued to follow discard training instructions: for example, behavior such as noisy sex in my bedroom elicited no intervention or comment. At one point, I met a man while hitchhiking; after we had sex in his fancy car he drove me home, came to the door, introduced himself and told Mom he wanted to marry me. For weeks, even though he was a stranger, Mom advised me to “marry the nice man, after all, you’ll never be able to look after yourself.” My new lifestyle left me with only damaged or discard-trained friends and little in common with the peers I had previously chosen. I hated myself, my family and my life without understanding why. I was primed for the next steps in the disabling of my life.

A party at home (with new colored strobe lights and booze supplied by my parents for everyone this time) ended with new “you’re crazy” programming involving “the guys with the straitjackets” being called to come and take me away (like the song “They’re coming to take me away, ha ha, ho ho, hee hee”), utterly humiliating me in front of all my friends. A mix-up occurred however, and actual paramedics showed up instead of actors. The intended lessons went unfinished, but I was left with a fear of expressing my true self and being labeled crazy for it, especially by friends or those with the power to lock me up.

In July 1977, my perceptions of “the Navy” went from “just old guys” to “my buddies who take me for motorcycle rides to get them pot, then take me to their ship, buy me beer, and let me hang out with them." This affiliation with "the guys" was a discard "bad path" building block for my dark blue soldier and "tough biker dyke" alters, one which has left me to this day quite comfortable "hanging out with the boys" as "one of the guys." Still, by the time Elvis Presley died, I had been set up to move out into a "straight trade" living arrangement with one of those navy guys—the magenta and red alters traded sex for food, shelter, cigarettes and tokes, with freedom to have sex with others as long as I was there for him when he was in port. Two weeks later red alters were willingly pimped out to "nice men in hotels."

These things, among others mentioned, especially in my teens, were set up by people conveniently brought into my life through other people I knew that were connected with my trainers. Someone I trusted would introduce me to someone else connected to whatever my training called for. A trusted girlfriend, for example, who was part of my party/rebel discard training introduced me to the navy guy I moved in with, and another trusted girlfriend from the earliest "smoke to belong" training set up the pimping me out when the navy guy was at sea and I needed money for food and my medications and inhaler.

At 17:

Two months after I moved in, a discard-trained girlfriend took my place with the navy guy. This friend, the navy guy, my mother and others told me I was lucky living on the streets wasn't my only available option: my best plan was to get into the government's social services system, accept the label "handicapped" and move in with grandma. My sick, weak light blue alter in particular believed I had no other choice, so agreed to this plan. From then on, I was deemed "permanently disabled."

Over the next few months, training incidents lessened, largely due to my involvement with, then engagement to, a former navy guy (not the one I had lived with). This seemed to be taking me down an acceptable, discard-approved life path, but by late spring, I lived alone (while grandma was traveling), leaving me time for introspection that unwittingly fed into the final series of lockdown programs.

Unknown to my trainers, my "bigger picture" white alter and a "metaphysical healing magic" turquoise alter had been increasingly slipping through the white "teen to fit in" alter and the sick light blue alter, surfacing often. Under their influence, my self-awareness expanded. I saw myself and my life with new clarity. My conscious thoughts took new directions. Despite "plenty of friends and good times," I was depressed and suicidal yet again, living a life I knew at a soul-level to be wrong and bad for me. I had been trying to quit smoking and using drugs for years and did far too many dangerous things. As my suicide attempts increased in frequency and severity, and my activities became increasingly dangerous, the turquoise alter “pulled together with healing magic” the red alters’ rebellious determination to do things our own way, and various other alters and their useful programs, to create a new, self-imposed mission: finding out what I had to learn and do to fix myself. These alters thereafter searched, asked questions, and perpetually sought answers and whatever help they could find.

During that spring, these same alters got me into a job training placement. This “inappropriate action” led to a discard-trained cousin convincing red alters to be her husband’s mistress, and a wild summer filled with one setup party situation after another, copious amounts of drugs/alcohol, and indiscriminate sex with loggers, bikers and members of the coast guard, most of whom were also drug dealers. We often went to midnight showings of such “soft porn” movies as “Flesh Gordon” and “Rocky Horror Picture Show,” all of which triggered nightmares and mini-flashbacks, while also reinforcing these “bad path trainings.”

Lockdowns and Final Seal at 18

In August 1978, my conscience made me break up with my fiancé, since I had been cheating on him for months. This left me feeling as if I was completely “falling over the edge.” Wondering if perhaps I was crazy and fearing “them coming to take me away,” the help-seeking alters obtained a referral from my doctor to “the best psychiatrist in town.” Presenting myself in skimpy, sexually provocative clothing, I was silenced (unintentionally) when the psychiatrist told me “There’s nothing wrong with you, you are not crazy. Go away and stop wasting everybody’s time.”

Meanwhile, my handler and his colleague (whom I had known as “The Colonel” from about age 4 and believe was in charge of my actual training) had a two-year-old dilemma that had reached critical proportions: using me outside the “official” training program had helped turn me into a “continual trouble-maker and potential time-bomb.” The two of them told many alters that they had to “shut (me) up once and for all” or they would “pay the price” and “suffer the consequences,” and that if they couldn’t shut me up, they “might as well slit (their) own throats.” (Fortunately for me in the long-term, they were so frustrated with me by this point that they often lost their temper and spewed out information, to me or to each other, that they probably didn’t intend me to hear.) So, instead of layering more programs into a failed system, over a period of about nine months, a “brain wipe” was done to erase what had been installed and my memories were “rebuilt,” then the alters who were allowed to remain were “locked down” and a “final seal” was done. (I think now that this last series was really just intended to confuse me/my alter system so badly that I would be too much of a mess to ever be credible, let alone a threat.) My self-initiated visit to the psychiatrist provided the perfect opportunity to begin this process. Leaving his office in a state of despair and desperation, reeling in shock, I was hitchhiking home. Getting into a van that stopped, I sensed danger, but too late. The man in the back grabbed me, pulling me into the van. I felt a prick in my arm. The door slammed, the van began moving and my head started to spin. The men demanded to know what I had seen the psychiatrist for, ordering me to "Report now!" Then, groggy and confused from the drug they had injected, I was delivered to The Colonel at the local mental health facility in a staged scenario that made me believe he was a psychiatrist. He barked "It's about time. What's your problem?" Totally confused, I hysterically burst into tears and told him I thought I was crazy and needed help. He gave me a pill to calm me as I spilled the details he asked for.

Minutes later, the main dark blue soldier alter was called forth and convinced he was a traitor. As a good, loyal soldier, he was unable to bear this: such betrayal meant he was a failure, dangerous to all he believed in and valued. He was told, and agreed, that the only option was to "take one for the team" and have his brain wiped clean with a "new medical procedure"; at least then he would retain his rank and be provided for. He was "officially relieved of his duties" and "released on the condition he report as ordered" for the "appointment" that had been "booked" for the "brain wipe procedure" (for more than two months later, at a time when I would be of legal age, precluding any need for parental consent and any questions about "seeking help on my own"). After that, I was switched back to the hysterical, help-seeking alters, given another pill to calm me, and told to come back when I was "really ready to be helped." The dark blue "tough biker dyke chick" was called forth to be the one who returned to my "real life," and was left near unconscious on a nearby grassy knell, believing she had just "partied too hearty" yet again.

This became the pattern of the last and biggest parts of my shutdown training, the "brain wipe" and "joint lock" time-bubbles. During these "time-bubbles," one alter would attend a pre-set meeting with The Colonel in whatever role he was disguised to portray for that piece of the programming, then various alters would be called forth and given their specific training, with the "tough biker dyke chick" being brought "out" at the end and left somewhere in the real world, confused, not sure how she had got there, and generally attributing it to "another drunken blackout."

Some of these events started in the "therapy" office used by the "psychiatrist" Colonel for my Saturday appointments at the mental health facility, and then moved to what I have since learned was a storage room for audio-visual equipment. These hospital premises were used on a day when the areas I was in were mostly deserted. The "psychiatrist" said it was so we could take as long as we needed and not be disturbed. Other events began in the Colonel's office at the nearby military facility (also mostly deserted when I was there). The magenta "spy" alter attended her regular "report and debrief" meetings, then we moved to other areas, usually the room with "the chair." (Long before this, noting she never remembered leaving, she assumed it was due to pushing away the distasteful memories of the often violent "sex games" the Colonel made her play every time she was with him.) The initial piece of the "brain wipe" took place shortly after my 18th birthday when the dark blue soldier alter appeared at the mental health facility on schedule, "officially signed his life away" at the front desk and proceeded to the "correct unit." After taking off his "civilian clothes," he lay still on the stretcher, cheerfully asking questions to hide his shame and fear while an I.V. was started in his forearm and the "proper chemicals to create the necessary reactions in the brain" were administered. Once the heart monitor and other "state of the art equipment" (simple audio-visual equipment!) on the table beside the bed were readied and the electrodes were all attached "strategically in key positions" on his head, torso and extremities, "Sergeant Tough" was told what would happen during the procedure while he floated in drugged calmness. When he opened his eyes, the "brain-imaging screen" beside him really did appear to display his "thoughts and memories." His life did play backwards on the screen when the "rewind" started. After he saw them "put his brain functions on hold" with the "pause" button, he surrendered all wariness and caution, and began helpfully pointing out "important bits that shouldn't be missed" as he was regressed in age and his memories were "erased in reverse order, all the way back to the womb." When he learned he was "really only a stupid little girl," he disappeared.

This "magic of modern technology" was accomplished using drugged hypnosis combined with photographs and films of similar looking soldiers dressed in the same kind of dark blue uniform he wore, progressing by successive steps—showing the age he was supposed to be for that part—through to younger cadets, then little boys that turned out to be little girls. Throughout this process, the same technique was being used on my other alters, by way of "pausing" the soldier alter and calling forth pertinent alters (by name and/or by a phrase that would catch any unknown ones, such as "the little bitch who poisons") at each successive age. All of my experiences known to the mind controllers were included, to the degree necessary for each alter or group to believe it real: the amount of "time out in the body" and their "age and stage" determined the shape and form of the "memories" they were regressed through. Some required only a little bit of imagery, others needed quite a lot. Of course, many mistakes were made, so the "brain wipe" was not as successful as planned.

In this process my trainers also used what I call “backward language.” It was a way of speaking used in some double-bind situations, and in the regression part of programming that “erased and rewrote” alters’ life experiences. It communicated my “false life” that was being erased and the new “real life” being installed, while informing my file-keeper alter of which file to pull for whatever was to be done. Its phrasing helped in my healing to distinguish what had actually happened to me versus the fake life that was created in installments over the years. Examples include: “You were never or never did…,” and “You did not receive… training,” which really meant I had and was now supposed to forget it forever.

When the brain wipe regression had all of me/us “in the womb,” a rapid “roll call” was done, then everyone was “paused.” While the alters were still “paused,” I was taken to the nearby, real world military base in the back of a military transport truck and placed in a dark room. The red “gatekeeper/madam sorcerer” alter (who believed she was a woman in her late 30’s) was called forth, “sentenced to eternal damnation as punishment for her misuse of power and authority” (among them the “traitorous actions” at 10 that led to her being stripped of power, and the cursing of the circle at 16) and sent to a very real seeming, hot, smoky “hell.” There, accompanied by the “screams and moans of her victims and the souls she had damned,” her “sins were replayed eternally” in the flames and air around her.

Next, the black soldier alter who had been left to “guard the leaders” was “discovered sleeping on the job” in his seat at the door in my inner world. Awakened into the body as he was “called to attention” with a brutal shaking, he was physically “taken away for questioning” in the familiar interrogation room, then dragged down the hall to a prisoner’s cell, beaten to unconsciousness and left “to await his fate.”

After that, I was returned unconscious to the hospital unit I had been in earlier, via the same transport truck, driver and guards. Alters necessary for my handler’s and trainers’ uses and my daily life were “re-grown” with images, scenes and real memories from my “normal, ordinary, everyday life.” End of time bubble.

The next bubble started at the military base when the magenta alter reported for debriefing. A number of significant changes and additions were made to my inner world, mostly through hypnotic suggestion. “The trained skills group” was turned off: these robot-like alters were merely repositories of trained skills that would kick in when required (such as martial arts or ritual chants), a common storage for skills which certain alters could access but which weren’t allowed to be held in the alters’ actual memories.

The brown uniformed “rear guardsmen” were called forth, turned into “real men” (instead of monkey-men), issued identities consisting of first names, ages, sexual preferences, and one self-defense move each, then assigned shifts to cover the full 24 hours of each day—three 8-hour shifts with 8 men per shift. Their task became guarding/protecting the inner world by ensuring military alters behaved how, and remained where, they were supposed to. Although they could trigger internal warnings and "fail-safes," they mostly used distractions, like seeking out perverse sex or getting drunk in the real world, or else terrorizing or raping alters internally.

The inner military compound was then "permanently locked down." "Electric fencing" was installed to barricade access to the black, brown and orange-linked military base, security, and alarm systems area, ensuring "only men in uniform get through the gate" and "women and children stay where they belong, safe on the other side in rainbow land." One of the "rear guardsmen" was declared a "wiring expert," promoted to "black elite soldier" status, and assigned the secret task of maintaining the fence and all other electrical, mechanical, and "new technology" mechanisms.

Further drugs were administered. The control board and control room were upgraded, primarily to ensure that all security measures, fail-safes, trip-wires, self-destructs, etc. were functioning properly and that the ones to come would meld correctly with them. Pat and her patterns had "disappeared" during the regression, but the controller alter was "re-grown" (with new fake memories) and issued completely new instructions for interpreting the control mechanisms and activating the correct alter patterns. Then, along with the file room and timekeeping room, (and the self-created isolation ward), the entire upper floor of the control tower (atop a hill on the "safe side" of the fence) was "hidden from view in the middle of a garden surrounded by prickly thorn bushes."

New access and re-activation codes were installed, under the code name "Red Green SOS Plan," and the captain ("cap") alter was given new orders and set up as sentry at the front gate of the inner military base. Finally, a "protective bubble" was installed "around the whole world" as a "forever seal." End of time-bubble.

The "joint lock" started in March 1979, with the final seal in place by late May, the month I would have graduated from high school had I not been forced to drop out. This final lockdown and seal was also a series of programs over a period of time. It mainly involved the tough biker chick alter (and all of the alters within her), the red gatekeeper/madam alter who had been "damned to eternal hell," and the black soldier alter who had been "awaiting his fate."

First though, all alters (oddly even those who had previously been made to disappear) had to sign contracts agreeing to whatever they understood needed to be "locked away forever." Mostly during "therapy" with "the psychiatrist," each known alter or group was traumatized according to their training and beliefs, until they "realized" they must sign, creating a large time-bubble with many small bubbles in it. This particular programming was done partly due to the help-seeking alters getting me into high-school upgrading classes, where activist alters used the white scribe/writer alter and the grey “business writer” alter to craft outspoken, activist-style essays. Because of this, it was the two writer alters who were called forth to start each session and required to “remain present” throughout, with the white alter’s hand used by everyone as they signed. The file-keeper alter also had to be “present” throughout this and other such events. The final two contracts were part of both writer alters being given programming to “only write when stoned” (on marijuana joints), ensuring they “never harmed anyone with their words.” After the last contract was signed, the last file cabinet was moved to my inner military base and the file-keeper was told his job was finished, all he had to do now was “maintain the few simple files” that remained.

The “joint lock” and “final seal” time-bubbles started with the magenta alter reporting to the Colonel’s military base office. After unusually vicious sex and many shots of rye during her debrief, she was taken to a “telephone booth-like” room and told it was time to “test her reflexes.” Adjacent to the room with “the chair,” this room was like a theatre sound and light booth, an x-ray technician’s booth, and a police interrogation room all combined. The window was one of those two-way things that could appear as a mirror or a window in each room, enabling my trainers to view me without my seeing them or to project whatever images they needed to make alters believe the scenario they were playing out. The control panel provided the necessary mechanisms for a variety of “special effects” which were used in many of my trainings over the years. She/I was instructed to hit the colored lights on the “pattern board” when they flashed. As they flashed faster and faster, triggering “idiot spin” craziness and nausea among other things, a rapid roll call brought most alters near to the surface. She became increasingly confused and disoriented, feeling as if she was being pressed against from behind. The glass door closed. The small room became hot. The Colonel kept yelling at her to keep up, to prove she still had “what it takes.” Eventually the heat, the confusing near to the surface presence of all the other alters, and the alcohol she had consumed made her pass out, dropping to the floor.

The next two pieces were very similar. Throughout both, Puffy’s voice did a continual rapid roll call, keeping everyone near the surface in a way that prevented the usual “siphoning off” of bodily pain and emotions into hidden alters, and whatever drug I was given while unconscious made it feel as if every word soaked in through my skin, making these incidents more excruciating and confusing than any others before.

The red alter was called forth first into my now naked body, awakening in the place she perceived as the “flickering red flames of hell.” Enraged at her captivity, berated and harassed by the Colonel, a man she hated, she was offered a deal: she could sell her soul, be sealed and bound to a life or death vow of silence, and be given a fresh start, a new life, with the agreement to partner with the man they had chosen for her, for all eternity, in secret, and be limited to a "basic ordinary life with only the knowledge every woman needs (how to be sexy for your man, run a household, etc)." She didn't want to deal with the Colonel, but after he slapped her around and raped her, she was more amenable—anything was better than a life spent in hell, subject to this hated man. She agreed, and he knocked her unconscious.

The black soldier was also called forth naked, from the cell where he'd been "awaiting his fate." He too came out enraged, hating the man who was in charge of his life. As he was verbally and physically "dressed down" yet again for his "failures and laziness," he was also offered a deal—he could win back some degree of honor, respect and authority simply by agreeing to forever keep the silence and ensure no secrets ever escaped, partnered with a woman that would help him accomplish this. Refusing the deal, he too was convinced with a rape, one that had this tough soldier alter screaming in agony and willing to agree with anything to prevent this man ever sodomizing him again. As he cried out his agreement, the Colonel groaned his pleasure while choking him unconscious. Yet more drugs were injected, this time hallucinogens.

With both these alters readied, the dark blue "biker dyke chick" was next, coming to naked on the floor of the glass booth, with different colored lights flashing and the drone of the rapid roll call and snatches of different music in the distance. Seeing the Colonel as she struggled to her feet in an agonized daze, she screamed in outrage, "You raped me again, didn't you, you bastard!" He laughed and began insulting and haranguing her. The door of the room closed and it got so hot she could hardly breathe as she/I banged on the glass walls in rage, terror and confusion. Something disgustingly stinky started oozing up between the wooden floorboards as he told her how filthy she was, that she was garbage that belonged on the streets with the rats. Needles of pain assaulted her body (pinpoint jets of high-pressure water.) The walls started closing in slowly. She felt as if people were pressing against her from behind her, taking all her air, nearly suffocating her. Hysteria took over. When the Colonel told her she was so filthy they had to chip it away to find the real her underneath, and she heard, felt and saw pieces of something falling to the floor, she thought it was actually pieces of her. She kept beating at the glass walls, screaming in rage and begging for help at the same time.

He told her what a small, insignificant nothing she was. She could see herself in a mirror, trapped between something red on one side and something black on the other, could see herself getting smaller and thinner as he spoke, proving he was right. The walls pushed closer, squishing her and her long internal lineup of alters, trapping them all between the red and black. As her image disappeared, she was given a strong zap of the little electrode which must have been taped behind and just below her left ear. She sank to the floor, banging her head and knocking herself unconscious.

When consciousness returned after the squishing, “I” was in the familiar “chair” again. The red and black alters had been called forth into the body at the same time. My experience was that “we” could “each” see “both of us” at the same time—the “soldier” in black on the left and the “lady” in red on the right, each in their usual attire. They were separate and distinct people that could be seen right there in the mirror in front of me—there was even a very thin person in between them, proving they were different people. There was a steady hypnotic pulsing sound as the Colonel introduced the two alters to each other. He paced and ranted, addressing them from first one side, then the other, making their heads whip back and forth as he reiterated their crimes and sins and slapped them across the face now and then. As each alter spoke or was spoken to, a sharp pinpoint of light flashed on their side and my temple on the other side received a zap. Anger, pain, total confusion and a desire to have this nightmare end was all they felt by the time he eventually spelled out the terms of the deal they had agreed to. Finally, released from the chair, each on their “proper side,” they were given a key for their side of the fence, which they used as ordered to “simultaneously lock it forever.” Then they were made to “smoke a joint over the fence” to “seal the deal” making them partners and locking them into their “assignments”—keep the lid on things at all costs! After that, told to sit so they could “toast the agreement,” they were seated back in “the chair.”

Later in therapy, when seeing through other alters, including “out-of-body” ones, I learned how much of this and other “tricks” were done. In this case, I was dressed on one side as the soldier and the other side as the madam sorcerer. In the chair, mirrors were around and in front of me so that each could see the “whole” of the other, and projections added to the effect (as did the drugs, electroshock zaps, pulsing sound, flashing lights, and the beaten, exhausted state of my body.) The mirror in front of me was a distance away, and had an elongated image of the “biker dyke chick” projected on it somehow (which she could see from the inside of my mind where she was trapped, leading her to believe she was trapped between these two alters, the red and black she had seen just before losing consciousness).

At some point the image on the middle mirror in front of me changed to that of a wooden fence like the one in the Wizard of Oz. When they were ordered to do so, the two alters stood up, each on their own side of the fence and walked to the gate as instructed—more mirrors and projections. The locking of the gate and passing of the joint over the fence are mysteries I do not have the answer to—all I can say is both alters used their keys, and passed the joint to the other, though I do remember the soldier being annoyed that he had to “use the wrong hand” to do it. Maybe someone was behind the mirror, maybe it was just me using both of my hands, maybe there was a time lag that I didn’t perceive or remember. I suspect that a combination of the images, and hypnotic suggestion in the steady stream of directions, insults, and other comments coming from the Colonel, mixed with the alters’ desire to have the whole business over and done with made them see whatever was needed to accomplish this.

As soon as the red and black alters were strapped back in the chair, they were zapped and the dark blue “biker dyke chick” was called out again. Too disoriented to really understand what was happening, she was subjected to the same pulses, zaps, and flashes of light (and Puffy’s voice still doing the roll call in the background), along with another voice coming at her, telling her she was neither a man, nor a woman, but something in between. The voice said she could hang out with the guys, women or even children, but she didn’t really belong anywhere and no one would ever love her. She was nobody, nothing, stuck in the middle of nowhere with nothing better to do with her life than party it away, drinking and doing drugs wherever she went. It said that the only way she’d ever be able to make the pain, loneliness, and confusion stop was to have a drink or smoke a joint.

Then the voice said there was something of value she could do, one way to have a partner—she could be “married to the gate!” The voice made this sound wonderful and desirable, something really important that would make her happy and be a “good deed” in the process. (Despite her earlier training, or maybe because of it, she still inherently wanted to “do good”). It didn’t take much to convince her. She was released from “the chair” and with help, managed to stagger over to the gate in the fence. (She thought she must be very drunk.) She was given a “master key” in the form of a ring for her finger, and words were spoken “binding her forever to the gate.” Then she was provided a motorcycle in the inner world and told she was “guardian of the gate,” and that her task was to ride the back roads and keep watch over both sides of the gate. Except for parts that were the same as with the red and black alters, I believe this incident was largely hypnotic suggestion. Pretty much as soon as she was given her motorcycle, she just crumpled to the floor unconscious.

After sufficient time for my body to recover, the control mechanisms were drastically adjusted and the controller was again given new instructions. Then I was taken to the mental health facility. The “brain imaging screen” was used to update the “memory shells” of the magenta, red, black, dark blue, and controller alters, to incorporate this last series of programs.

Finally, I was “set free to live my life as I choose,” left “passed out” on the grass near the hospital in the middle of the night.

This was the last I saw of Puffy and the Colonel. I never encountered either of them after the final lock and seal was done, although they continued to have me watched and triggered by others when they felt it was needed. Calculated caution, along with terror of being locked up or trapped back in their control, has helped me get to the point I am at now, integrated and able to write this paper. When a watcher visited me during the years of my recovery, I made sure to appear as dysfunctional as I had been programmed to be, and they would go away satisfied that the shutdown programming had worked. I am still watched and occasional attempts are made to trigger me, but I really am free to live my own life now, the life my heart and soul choose, not the one they designed for me. Patterns can crumble.

Notes

[1] I say “military” because they wore Canadian military uniforms and used military bases, vehicles and equipment. I do not know if they acted on behalf of the Canadian military. I do know they were wealthy, influential people who were members of an organized crime ring with a professed goal of creating the world envisioned by their “Great Leader.” When I attended their leaders’ meetings as a note-taker and sexual slave, there were both North American and Asian leaders present. They referred to themselves as covering the Pacific region and mentioned several branches of their group who were each “in charge of” a different area of the world, just as I have been told is done in the game Risk.

[2] Once I crawled, I was punished harshly for touching the cameras/wires, then when I talked, I wasn’t allowed to mention them in anyway or even to look at them. I often got kicked in the butt or slapped across the face until I learned these things.

[3] Re-activation codes were words, symbols, and actions which alters had been trained to remember and respond to by following instructions they had been given. It was not enough for me to remember the codes; a person outside myself had to say the words, show me the symbols, and make the correct actions (after I told them what to say and do) for the instructions to work.

CHAPTER 20

Case Studies of Ritual Abuse Survivors: From Abuse to Activism

Jeanne Adams

Healing from ritualistic abuse is a long and arduous journey. The beginning of the journey is often overwhelming, both emotionally and physically, making it necessary for survivors to pull from inside reserves and focus only on their needs to survive and overcome. Further along in their healing journeys, many survivors make an interesting transition and discover a need to reach out to others who have suffered in ways similar to theirs. They find strength in working together, advocating for social reform and for each other.

The following case studies represent five self-identified, female survivors of ritualistic abuse. They have each done considerable healing work and are now involved in activism on behalf of other ritual abuse survivors. This activism work includes assisting in professional training through Mr. Light & Associates, Inc.,[1] and coordinating survivor workshops, peer support groups and various projects through the Utah Ritual Abuse Committee.[2] These case studies examine six areas: history, cult dynamics, forensic issues, clinical treatment, current life status and values. The information was obtained through oral interviews. Participants were advised to use pseudonyms. Some of them preferred to use their real names.

Niid La'i is an activist for abuse survivors, a writer and student, currently a bachelor's candidate working on her degree in Social Work. She is fifty-two years old. She grew up in Arizona, the daughter of a civil engineer and a homemaker. Her father worked for the Corps of Engineers. While her family was actively Catholic, they were also involved in a sub-group that inverted Catholic beliefs and brutalized Catholic rituals. Niid La'i has recalled a perverted Catechism that portrayed Jesus as a rapist with children abused on church altars. This particular sub-group followed her father's family with his parents and numerous brothers involved. Niid La'i's mother was pulled into the group by her marriage and remained a more passive participant. When Niid La'i attended parochial school, she also found herself subjected to abusive rituals at the school. She has noted clandestine involvement of the Knights of Columbus and Order of the Rose. Her abuse was never acknowledged in her childhood.

As a young adult, Niid La'i lived with depression and anxiety. During this time, she was being subjected to continued ritualistic abuse through her extended family and taken to locations outside of Arizona for laboratory experimentation. At age thirty-seven, after several months of physical illness, she began to recover memories of abuse. She then went into therapy for depression and required psychiatric hospitalization four times. During these hospitalizations, she was also diagnosed with panic attacks and misdiagnosed with Bipolar Disorder and psychosis. During therapy, she wrote a letter to her parents regarding her abuse and they broke off any further contact with her. Over the next two years, medical complaints found her in the hospital eighteen times. Gradually her health has improved.

The traumatic memories of her ritual abuse did not surface until she had been in therapy for five years. At age forty-two, Niid La'i was diagnosed with Poly-Fragmented Dissociative Identity Disorder. She began "losing" therapy sessions when alters came forward unknown to her. Niid La'i describes her dissociative system as having seven separate worlds guarded by a gatekeeper. Each world has a name: the porcelain world, the box world, the maze world, the shard world, the red world, the dark world, and the black world. There are several personalities on each world. Personalities present themselves in fragmented layers, as if they were created to take minute pieces of one abusive event. She states, "One time someone asked me how many personalities I have. To explain how many I felt there were, I described being in a room up to my knees in confetti." Each piece of confetti represented "one and two minute" alters created to take on a mere fraction of her abuse. Today she is continuing abreaction work so that the trauma that created so many fragments can be resolved.

Niid La'i describes herself as "Mormon Eclectic." As an adult, she has accepted Mormonism as her base faith, but she is also searching for truth in alternatives. She has a special interest in Shamanism as part of her Native American heritage. Niid La'i feels that she has survived and remembered because she was somehow chosen to break the chain of abuse in her family.[3] She has recalled an abusive induction ceremony when she was fifteen years-old where she adamantly refused their decree of initiation. She holds her beliefs and the spiritual experiences she has been given as sacred. She feels committed to doing all she can to help people, particularly adults who were once so horrifically abused.

Deborah has worked as a professional woman all of her adult life. She is currently fifty-nine years old and works as a Public Policy Strategist, the project lead on a major public policy initiative. As a child, she grew up in a middle class environment, the daughter of a housewife and an oil company sales manager. Her abuse took place primarily in Indiana, when she was between the ages of five and nine years old. The cult group involved approximately thirty people, sometimes more. Although clergy was represented, including an Episcopal priest, the group appeared to be organized throughout several towns and family lineages rather than through the infiltration of a specific church or organization.

Children were used in ritual ceremonies. These rituals were very eucharistically oriented, meaning they had to drink the blood and often eat the body parts of both the humans and animals that had been sacrificed. Some rituals took place in a church. Most of the ceremonies, however, did not take place in any churches but were held in the woods, in clubs or other meeting rooms, or cult members' farms or basements, depending on what was being done. The children were also used in child prostitution and pornography.

Deborah's abuse never came to the attention of authorities. Scientists, physicians, some of whom were family physicians as well as close family friends, clergy and other professionals were involved in the cult group. Injuries were explained away as accidents and medical needs met by those physicians. She was used in a child sex ring run by a cult-involved clergy, explaining her life-long hostility towards both medical professionals and clergy. Deborah did not confide her abuse to anyone.

Deborah has been able to trace involvement in cult activities through three generations of her family on her mother's side. She considers her mother a captive adult, a parent trapped in cult behaviors due both to dissociation and threats to the life of her daughter. As far as Deborah knows, her mother was never conscious of their involvement. Deborah's own memories did not surface until after her mother's death five years ago.

Deborah is a respected professional in the fields of healthcare management and public policy. At age thirty, she got sober and has remained so for twenty-nine years. Prior to her memory retrieval she developed chronic fatigue which began healing upon release of memories. Drawing on strategies she learned in alcoholism recovery, and coupled with a strong support system of friends, co-workers and husband, Deborah has done most of her healing without the help of a therapist. Prior to her memory download she was in Jungian analysis and her analyst kept saying, "Something is coming up soon." Shortly after the memories came forward, failing health forced her analyst's retirement.

When asked why she felt she had survived and remembered her abuse, Deborah cites several factors. By "day" both parents reinforced her intelligence, humor and independence. She has always seen life as a "whole." She sees her inside system as a whole with a dissociated inner child who holds the programmed messages of abuse involving church and child sex rings. She believes that people are “hard wired” to heal and holds sacred the undamaged core within all human beings from which the healing light emanates and transforms, regardless of circumstances.

Marilyn is sixty-five years old and considering retirement. She is currently a licensed professional counselor and registered nurse. Her abuse took place in three segments lasting over thirty years of her life. As a child, Marilyn was involved in a day church/night church scenario where opposing beliefs were taught, the more benevolent and socially accepted beliefs during the day, and the darker and abusive ceremonies held during the night. In the daytime, Marilyn was raised as a Mormon. In the nighttime, Mormon beliefs became satanistic as they were inverted and abusively inflicted upon the children. Both daytime and nighttime gatherings were held in the same buildings. Night church represented a portion of the daytime congregation with twenty to thirty people participating. As Marilyn has stated, “Both used similar terms for rituals and ordinances, but they were different, as different as night and day. Both talked about God and Satan—I served both masters and was torn between good and evil.”

Marilyn spent most of her childhood in Utah. She has traced her family’s involvement generationally with both parents involved and rituals having taken place in her grandfather’s barn. Her father was a colonel in the army and a Certified Public Accountant. Her mother once served as an executive secretary to the Utah governor. She has recalled a paganistic ceremony held in the southern Utah dessert where approximately one-hundred people attended bringing in representatives from other states. Between the ages of eight and fifteen years old, Marilyn was also subjected to abusive laboratory experimentation in military settings, particularly in Veteran’s Administration Hospitals. As an adult, she was taken back to these settings several times for further experimentation and programming.

Marilyn began having migraine headaches when she was still a child. She also incurred numerous injuries, all of which were perceived as childhood accidents. Her childhood abuse was never acknowledged. At age twenty-four, she had a major depressive episode with psychotic features. Many diagnoses of anxiety and Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) followed. Her own awareness of her DID and severe childhood trauma did not come until she was in her fifties. By that time, Marilyn had been hospitalized twelve times, the longest time for three months. She had spent a lifetime dealing with depression, anxiety, migraines, ulcers, Gastroesophageal Reflux Disease, Irritable Bowel Syndrome, fibromyalgia and asthma.

Today Marilyn works fulltime and participates in volunteer activities. While she still deals with some chronic illness, she recently took all of her grandchildren on a camping outing, a testament to her endurance and stamina. She has remained within the bounds of her daytime religion, but struggles to stay there. She believes that she survived and remembered because “God wanted me to.” She holds her relationship with God as sacred, along with her relationships with her children. She reveres nature, collects rocks and has developed a unique and irreplaceable sense of humor.

Bailey is a 55-year-old woman who runs a small non-profit organization. She spent her childhood in California. Her father was an attorney and her mother worked sporadically as a nurse. Both parents were alcoholic. Bailey’s father controlled his family through fear and sexualized violence. He also involved his young daughter in a child sex ring. When she was nine years old, Bailey’s father began taking her to clandestine meetings where twenty to thirty people would gather to perform abusive rituals on their own children. The group was patriarchal with its hierarchy including a Council of twelve High Priests. Masonic Temples were used for some of the ceremonies. Instructors taught the children to hate the concept of a loving God. They spoke of blonde haired, blue-eyed Aryans and felt that other races were inferior.

Bailey was a sickly child. Her parents told others that she was frail, clumsy and accident-prone. To further hide the abuse injuries and infections, Bailey’s mother would bring home drugs from the hospital where she worked. Shortly before Bailey turned twelve years old, she began bleeding from a spontaneous abortion and her mother took her to a county clinic. It was late at night and the doctor on duty became quite angry when he recognized the pregnancy. Although questioned by the doctor and nurse, Bailey remained silent regarding her abusers. She was taken home to recuperate and no action was taken on her behalf. A suicide attempt a few months later also concluded with no intervention or follow-up from hospital staff or authorities.

Bailey began getting painful headaches as a teenager. By age eighteen, she was diagnosed with depression. That same year, she managed to move away from home and distance herself from her destructive family. Unfortunately, the cycles of depression continued and her headaches grew into uncontrollable migraines. Bailey became a super-achiever, addicted to work and responsibility. Anxiety attacks ensued. By her early forties, Bailey became almost totally incapacitated due to unrelenting migraine attacks. At age forty-six, traumatic memories came flooding to the surface. As Bailey dealt with the emotions from the repressed traumatic events, her physical health greatly improved.

Bailey has always recognized the alcoholic dysfunction of her family of origin, but the abuse, from incest to ritual, remained hidden until the release of the repressed traumatic memories. It has taken her a while to accept a diagnosis of DID, first considering herself as dissociative and suffering from PTSD. She describes herself as having a component system, the same person at different ages, particularly the division of an unaware daytime child and the nighttime child who evolved to take on and hide the abuse. She had dealt with over one-hundred traumatic memories when she finally stepped into therapy. She remained in therapy for three years. Although she is still DID, she has made significant progress bringing her parts closer together. She no longer has migraine headaches. She states that she did not know how heavy the depression weighed on her until it lifted. Now it is gone.

Along with the traumatic memories, Bailey has recalled a number of spiritual experiences that occurred when she was a child. She has remembered standing in a brilliant light, feeling greatly loved and being told that she would survive and someday help other children. She believes that is why she has survived and remembered. She cherishes her relationship with her husband who is very dear to her. She holds sacred her present day family, friendships, and the loving presence she found in that sparkling light so many years ago.

Thunder is a thirty-eight year-old professional woman who works as a social worker. She was raised in a very rural area in the Midwest, born into a generational family that mixed religion with Satanism. Her mother's side was Primitive Baptist; the kind that believed in holding rattlesnakes and if it's God's will, the person gets bitten. Her father's side of the family were long-standing believers of the Night. She states, "In the nights, I was exposed to the demons and on Sunday they told me I was possessed and going to hell. To be honest, both were abusive and off the wall."

Facing abuse both at home and in the cult group, Thunder began disclosing the abuse when she was in the first grade. When told, her teacher responded, "Your parents wouldn't do that." After a third grade teacher gave her a similar response, she stopped disclosing. She went to school with bruises and broken bones that were explained away as childhood accidents. By age twelve, she had hypertension and a bleeding problem that required numerous surgeries. As a sophomore in high school, she attempted suicide and was hospitalized.

In college, she began her life-long quest to separate herself from her family. She developed the ability to find good people to help her, disclosing to them only the level of abuse she thought they could handle. After being diagnosed with depression, Borderline Personality Disorder and as schizo-affective, she was more accurately diagnosed with DID at age twenty-three. She describes her alter system as having twelve alters at a long table, half standing in the light and the other half, standing in the dark. Additional alters have been identified later in her healing.

Unlike other survivors who have managed to break away from their perpetrators, Thunder continues to fight that battle to this day. Police reports from various locations document the harassment, but none of those agencies have been able to stop it. While her inside healing is progressing, the strain of continual outside danger is taking a toll on her physical health. She is truly fighting for her life.

When asked why she felt she had survived and remembered, Thunder responded that hers was a “very old soul” who had chosen to come into this battle so that the line of dark power would collapse. She said that at age five she had been placed on an altar where cult leaders had debated whether or not to kill her, because even then “there was too much light in her.” She holds her friendships and animals sacred, as she does her life, because she has fought so hard to keep it.

Thunder would tell others that ritual abuse is real. She is angry at a system—doctors, preachers, and teachers—that does not protect its children. As a child, she had no where to run or hide. People who were supposed to help her, did not. She is grateful that a handful of people knew she was worth salvaging and that they planted a belief of hope inside her.

Interesting conclusions can be drawn from the case studies of these five survivors of ritualistic abuse. Their childhood accounts depict events of physical, sexual and ritualistic abuse. The abuse was familial, each of them was brought into the organized abuse through one or more family members. For most of these women, generations of their families can be tied to their ritualistic abuse. The abusive groups appear to have been organized through family lines, towns and the infiltration into churches and benevolent organizations. Functioning in secret, these sub-groups inverted the beliefs of a greater Christian-oriented culture making them seen as satanistic. Whether they truly valued Satanic beliefs or simply used inverted values to sanction the abuse they inflicted is unknown. In all five cases, belief substantiated the severe trauma exacted in ritualized settings, enabling perpetrating adults to control the lives of their children and other captive adults.

Forensic issues did not come into play for these women. None of these cases came to the attention of authorities who were willing to step forward and report their suspicions. Medical personnel appear to have been on the front lines examining injuries, diagnosing infections and assisting in abortions. These professionals either accepted alternative explanations, chose not to report when abuse was suspected or were themselves participants in the abuse. Later when these survivors were adults, they saw physicians for chronic physical ailments and no correlation was perceived between unremitting illness and the now dissociated childhood trauma. These cases finally came into the mental health system when the adult survivors requested assistance for varied complaints.

Therapy has played a significant role in the healing of most of these women. Unfortunately several of these survivors spent years in ineffective therapy due to misdiagnoses. Other co-existing conditions, such as depression and anxiety, were properly diagnosed and treated only to return again and again until the underlying Dissociative Disorders were finally recognized and addressed. While these survivors have found clinical treatment to be valuable, they have interspersed traditional therapy with diverse alternative treatments created by the survivor community itself. Today most of these women would still consider themselves dissociative and in the process of recovery, yet at the same time, they are highly functional, consciously aware of their abusive pasts and determined to break the chain of their generational dysfunction.

A common theme runs through the contemporary spirituality of these women survivors of ritualistic abuse. They all believe that they survived their abuse so that they could some day heal and assist others. They all speak in terms of light and darkness and of the choices they have made to embrace the light. Most of them have recalled vivid experiences when they made that determination, some of them on altars and others in a spiritual realm. While their current religious faiths vary, the things they hold sacred are much the same: relationships with present-day family and friends, nature and life itself. They are models of endurance and resiliency, examples that can give hope to other ritual abuse survivors who are still struggling to heal and break free.

[3] While discussing reasons why she felt she had survived and remembered, Niid La'i fondly referred to a quote by Carlfred Broderick, a professor of Sociology, who described the "valiant spirits" of some children being born into abusive situations. He stated, "My experience in various church callings and in my profession as a family therapist has convinced me that God actively intervenes in some destructive lineages, assigning a valiant spirit to break the chain of destructiveness in such families. Although these children may suffer innocently as victims of violence, neglect, and exploitation, through the grace of God some find the strength to 'metabolize' the poison within themselves, refusing to pass it on to future generations. Before them were generations of destructive pain; after them the line flows clear and pure. Their children and children's children will call them blessed." Broderick, C., (1986). I Have a Question. ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Thanks and appreciation to the Conference organizing group: Natasha Roffe, Briony Mason, Elizabeth London, and Orit Badouk Epstein, for the skill, passion, and generosity they brought to producing this pioneering conference. It was a remarkable experience to work in the context of so much warmth, courage, and solidarity, never undermined by the traumatic nature of the material we were working on together.

A very special thank you needs to go to Valerie Sinason and the Clinic for Dissociative Studies, who jointly hosted the conference. Without Valerie, no psychotherapy conference on this subject would ever have been held.

Many thanks to the Executive of The Bowlby Centre, who had the integrity and political strength to back a conference on this issue and to associate the Centre's name publicly with the treatment of ritual abuse survivors.

Our heartfelt thanks also go to Oliver Rathbone for his willingness to publish a book which is not only ground-breaking, but also controversial, and for his continuing commitment to giving a voice to writers in the fields of attachment and trauma.

Last, and most importantly, we would like to acknowledge the survivors of ritual abuse and mind control who have refused to be silenced and whose capacity to fight back in the face of extreme torture teaches every one of us what we need to understand about the human spirit—that love is stronger than hate. We dedicate this book to them.

ABOUT THE EDITORS AND CONTRIBUTORS

Anonymous is a survivor of organized ritual abuse, torture, and mind control, and a writer, campaigner, international speaker, and trainer specializing in psychosis and trauma.

Orit Badouk Epstein is an attachment-based psychoanalytic psychotherapist and supervisor who trained at The Bowlby Centre, London where she is a member of the executive committee. She runs a private practice in North London and is one of the trustees of the Paracelsus Trust at the Clinic for Dissociative Studies. Orit has an interest in, and experience of, working with clients who have suffered from extensive trauma and abuse, including ritual abuse, sexual abuse, violence, and emotional abuse. Orit has published articles in the Attachment Journal and is on the editorial board of the ESTD news letter. She is committed to campaigns to counteract the denial and disbelief around Ritual Abuse. Email: orit_badouk@hotmail.com

Ellen Lacter has been a clinical psychologist in California, USA for the past twenty-three years, and has specialized in the treatment of dissociative disorders and ritual abuse and mind control trauma in both children and adults for the past twelve years. She has a number of published chapters in edited books on the subject of ritual abuse and mind control. She is programme co-ordinator for the Play Therapy Certificate Program at University of California San Diego-Extension. She is also an activist on behalf of victims of ritual abuse and mind control, and maintains a website to educate the public and mental health community on these subjects: http://www.endritualabuse.org/

Sue Richardson is a member of The Bowlby Centre with over thirty years' experience in the helping professions. Her personal and professional attachment networks are in the northeast of England, from where she provides training, consultation, and supervision for those working with complex trauma and dissociation. Sue is a member of the European Society for Trauma and Dissociation (ESTD) and the International Society for the Study of Dissociation (ISSTD), and a founder member of their UK networks. She belongs to the training faculty of ISSTD and is the Training Co-ordinator for ESTD UK. She is the co-editor and co-author of two books and a number of published papers concerning child abuse trauma, attachment, and dissociation. suerichardson1@compuserve.com

Joseph Schwartz is a training therapist and supervisor at the Bowlby Centre. His books include Cassandra's Daughter: A History of Psychoanalysis in Europe and America (Penguin & Karnac). He is the author of numerous papers on clinical practice, the history of psychoanalysis, and the role of genetics in mental distress. josephschwartz@btinternet.com

Valerie Sinason is a poet, writer, child and adult psychoanalytic psychotherapist, and adult psychoanalyst. She is Director of the Clinic for Dissociative Studies, Honorary Consultant Psychotherapist for Cape Town Child Guidance Clinic, and President of the Institute for Psychotherapy and Disability. She has been a Consultant at the Tavistock and Portman Clinics until 1998, when she left to start the Clinic for Dissociative Studies. She has also been a Consultant Research Psychotherapist at St George's Hospital Medical School. She specializes in trauma, disability, abuse, and dissociation. In 1994, she published Treating Survivors of Satanist Abuse (Routledge) as a result of a Department of Health funded clinical piece of research carried out at the Portman Clinic. Her most recent book, Attachment, Trauma and Multiplicity (Routledge), is coming out in a revised edition next year. vsinason@aol.com

Rachel Wingfield Schwartz is a UKCP Registered Psychotherapist and was the Chair of the Bowlby Centre 2002–2009 (formerly Centre for Attachment-based Psychoanalytic Psychotherapy), where she is also a training supervisor and teacher. Rachel has a wide range of clinical experience in a variety of settings, including schools and prisons, and specializes in working with survivors of trauma and abuse, including sexual abuse, rape, domestic violence, war, state terror, and ritual and cult abuse. Rachel has been working with ritual abuse survivors since 1993 and is passionately committed to ending the disbelief and silence surrounding this issue. Rachel is also a psychotherapist with the Clinic for Dissociative Studies. rachelwingfield@btinternet.com

Introduction

Joseph Schwartz

Twenty years ago I first heard Valerie Sinason describe her work with victims of ritual abuse. The cost to her was enormous. She could scarcely believe any of things she was told, the tortures and the horrifying involvement of trusted pillars of the community—doctors, lawyers, police. It was Rosemary's Baby in spades. Valerie was terrified.

I did know from Valerie's work with mental handicap the kinds of abuse that can be perpetuated by those in power over the vulnerable, including the continuous reports of abuse perpetrated in old age homes, in the Catholic Church, and in the cellars of madmen like Josef Fritzl. But ritual abuse seemed a step too far.

I felt myself rebelling at the words satanic abuse. What? In this day and age people believe in Satan? Surely not. But, actually, horrifying as it was, I had little trouble seeing ritual abuse more simply as organized abuse. After all, in the USA, people organize themselves into lynching parties, the kind of terror that had never been far away during my time in Mississippi. I was further helped by one survivor saying, "Satanic abuse, Schmatanic abuse. What is going on here is torture."

Abu Ghraib, the Maze Prison in Northern Ireland, the School of the Americas in Fort Benning, Georgia, where Latin American police forces are trained in the techniques of torture: we are surrounded by examples of torture. Dr Sheila Cassidy testified eloquently to the torture she endured at the hands of Chilean police during the coup against Allende (Cassidy, 1977). Bobby Sands starved himself to death in protest at torture at the Maze Prison in Northern Ireland. John Schlapobursky has turned his torture at the hands of the South African police into lifelong work with trauma survivors here in London.

The images of torture at Abu Ghraib prison by the US army will stay etched in our minds for many years (see The Abu Ghraib Prison Photos, Google Images). So why shouldn't rogue elements in our communities, often, indeed, pillars of our communities, organize themselves into rings to do with children what they please, including torture and mind control to prevent the torture from being disclosed?

In the present case of the torture of children, where are the techniques learnt that are so necessary to keep the victims silenced? The CIA's MKUltra documents (thousands of papers and articles on which are listed on Google and can be found at Declassified MK-Ultra Project Documents) on mind control are discussed by Ellen Lacter in her fine chapter. The question asked by MKUltra experimenters was: "Can we get control of an individual to the point where he will do our bidding against his will and even against such fundamental laws of nature as self-preservation?" (MKULTRA, 1952). The experiments are hair-raising. You can see a fictional representation of the techniques used in the last of the Bourne films, The Bourne Ultimatum. Director Paul Greengrass has done his homework to show the use of torture (waterboarding) to create manipulatable, altered self-states. Remember, fiction tells us stories that are valuable and true. We do have non-fiction sources to back this up. Ellen Lacter, in this volume, documents the gory details of torture-based mind control.

We are fully aware that ritual abuse is an extremely controversial subject with a particularly aggressive and vociferous opposition. The crude, sadistic satires in Private Eye (Anon, 2010) are the least of it. The substance of the attacks on the reality of organized abuse and torture of children always reduce to that old chestnut—it is unscientific. "Give us proof," say the naysayers. "How is this different from reports of alien abduction?" say the clever-clever wags of Private Eye.

Indeed. How is it different? In the case of alien abduction, we are asked to believe that visitors to this planet from outer space have kidnapped someone, taken them away, and brought them back. It is not believable. In the case of ritual abuse, we are asked to believe that people can organize themselves into groups for the purpose of torturing children. There would seem to be a significant difference here in what we are asked to believe.

But we are dealing with belief systems. Belief systems resist change, sometimes vociferously and aggressively. Consider, for example, Holocaust deniers. This extreme form of anti-Semitism believes that the Holocaust is a Jewish propaganda coup. ". . . historians have a blindness when it comes to the Holocaust because like Tay-Sachs disease it is a Jewish disease which causes blindness" (Irving, 1986).

What is the belief system behind the aggressive vociferous denials of ritual abuse torture? I believe that this is a refusal/incapacity to see/entertain just how brutal our social system has been and is. Check out the nineteenth-century images of child labour (Google Images: Child labour, nineteenth-century Britain). Until recently, our culture has always brutalized its children (DeMause, 1995). But in my experience, no amount of evidence can defeat a belief system. No matter what evidence is offered, there will always be vociferous and aggressive denial of the reality of ritual abuse torture or, as history of psychoanalysis shows, the reality of childhood sexual abuse, full stop. The case of Holocaust deniers is just one extreme example of aggressive denial.

Readers picking up this book will want to evaluate the evidence for themselves. In this effort they may well be deterred by the argument that the evidence is not objective or, in the argument's more abusive form, the evidence is unscientific.

What does "unscientific" really mean?

When evidence is labelled "unscientific", it means it is not to be trusted. And vice versa. To be scientific means to be trusted, as in the advertising trope, "It is a scientific fact that . . ." What is the adjective "scientific" doing in there? What, really, after all, is a "scientific" fact? A fact is a fact. Or, as my father used to say, "Facts are stubborn things." (And, mind you, facts are socially constructed by human labour (Fleck, 1979).)

Psychoanalysis has suffered the accusation of being "unscientific" from its very beginnings (Schwartz, 1999). In recent years, the Berkeley literary critic Frederick Crews has renewed the assault on the talking cure in verbose, unreadable articles in the New York Review of Books (Crews, 1990), inevitably concluding, because nothing else really persuades, that psychoanalysis fails because it is unscientific. The chorus was joined by philosopher of science, Adolf Grunbaum (1985), who played both ends against the middle: to the philosophers he professed specialist knowledge of psychoanalysis; to the psychoanalysts he professed specialist knowledge of science, particularly physics. Neither was true (Schwartz, 1995a,b, 1996a,b, 2000).

The problem that mental health clinicians always face is that we deal with human subjectivity in a culture that is deeply invested in denying the importance of human subjectivity. Freud's great invention of the analytic hour allows us to explore, with our clients, their inner worlds. Can such a subjective instrument be trusted? Not by very many. It is so dangerously close to women's intuition. So-called objectivity is the name of the game in our culture. Nevertheless, 100 years of clinical practice have shown psychoanalysis and psychotherapy not only to be effective, but to yield real understandings of the dynamics of human relationships, particularly the reality of transference–countertransference re-enactments now reformulated by our neuroscientists as right brain to right brain communication (Schore, 1999).

I think there is danger that the politics of ritual abuse and mind control, particularly the involvement of our State apparatus in its development and practice, can deflect us from proper concern with survivors. This book is a report from a powerful, moving conference where, for the first time, a safe enough space had been created for survivors and therapists to come together to discuss the pain and difficulties of recovering from the torture of ritual abuse and mind control. This book is a tribute to those victims who have had the courage to come forward and tell us what they have had to survive. It has taken courage because we, as potential witnesses, can become hostile and rejecting in hearing about crimes of this nature. Each case is a mini-Holocaust of torture. Like the Nazis, the perpetrators of these crimes are enemies of the human race. All of us who are hearing about what has happened for the first time need to listen. Ritual abuse and mind control is happening. This volume lets survivors and therapists speak for themselves.

CHAPTER ONE

What has changed in twenty years?

Valerie Sinason

This subject is not easy. Indeed, this is a historic conference. It is an act of disobedience, of speaking out, of political, personal, and clinical ethics and advocacy. It comes from a crucial link between the Bowlby Centre, the Clinic for Dissociative Studies, and the Paracelsus Trust, which I started to aid clinic clients at the instigation of Pearl King, one of its benefactors. Now it is its own separate entity, which has the benefit of Pat Frankish as Chair, and Kate White, Orit Badouk Epstein, Deborah Briggs, Richard and Xenia Bowlby, Michael Curtis, and Brett Kahr as trustees. All agreed that this conference had an important educational aim.

It is the seminal work of John Bowlby and the relational approach to trauma that has offered the best way forward for many of us, together with a willingness to stand up and be counted. Indeed, just as John Bowlby recognized and acknowledged dissociative identity disorder (DID) and separation anxieties, his son, Sir Richard Bowlby, has continued to hold the torch, supporting unpopular and outcast areas of society and the mind.

Rachel Wingfield Schwartz and I were involved together with survivors who had been ritually abused over twenty years ago. It is also important that the Clinic for Dissociative Studies speaks up about this, as we have been very clear that the aetiology for DID that we witness in the consulting room comes largely, in our practice, from ritual organized crime.

For some people, some known and others invisible, coming to this conference has been an act of unbelievable heroism, of telling, of witnessing, of knowing. There will have been punishments for coming, for listening, for speaking. Some have not come, feeling that by staying away they have saved particular speakers and friends from being hurt. Others have come to stand between their protectors and the cult.

Last night, like many people here, I received e-mails and phone calls from different countries imploring me not to speak, as I would be killed. It was survivors who wrote, for whom the cruellest manipulation of attachment needs is exactly this: abusing someone's capacity for love and concern.

It is perhaps the cruellest lie and trick to make a child or vulnerable adult feel that expressing care for someone else could lead to his or her death.

Survivors in the audience have shown so clearly, and with great protection for us, the listeners, something of what they have gone through—the dilemmas and choices given to Trish and Ellen sharply showed the techniques of how this was done in the flower game. (There are many other programmes with flower games, too. No system in any survivor is identical.)

No wonder the so-called "easy" choices of the ordinary non-abuse world are so unbearable. What dress shall I buy? Which food shall I buy? Any choice is linked with danger and death. Everything comes from tests, and all tests are lethal.

So, what is different over twenty years? I will start with what is the same.

What has not changed in twenty years

The law: duress and ritual crime

I have the permission of a brave survivor, a professional called Lisa, to state this. Lisa went to the police to speak of all the crimes she had been forced to commit from earliest childhood to her late thirties, as well as all the crimes of which she had been the victim. The litany was familiar to all of us in this work (Hale & Sinason, 1994). Murder, fake murder, necrophilia, bestiality, abortion, cannibalism, oral, anal, and vaginal abuse, drinking blood, semen, and urine, eating faeces and non-food substances, drugs, pornography, and so on. If every survivor spoke out, then slowly the awareness might spread of what people were forced to do.

The Detective Inspector she bravely spoke to was very sympathetic and said the judge and jury would make some remission of sentence, he was sure, but as there was no plea bargaining in this country, and no law on duress, she could face a custodial sentence of some twelve years.

Until we join together to ask for a law on duress, many survivors will be left with an unbearable and unfair guilt their abusers have projected into them, aided and abetted by a non-understanding legal system.

Also, we have do not have ritual crime as a separate category of criminal offence. This means that accounts of spiders, snakes, masks, and unusual costumes do not count as evidence, unlike in Idaho, in the USA. Making children and adults eat non-food substances is also not a crime, so checking a stomach for insects, etc., would not be done.

Reality remains the problem

Outside of the "Adam" case (the poor Nigerian child whose mutilated body was found in the Thames), the subject is still not bearable. The "Adam" case was somehow bearable for racist reasons: he was a black child from "over there", not one of "ours". However, the use of white British middle-class and upper-class women, men, and children is still invisible.

The cruel treatment of the Baby Ps and Victoria Climbies who carry on living and do not obtain the peace of dying is just as intolerable to face as it ever was.

The pool of practitioners has not enlarged adequately. However, we have been a rather stable group, and thank heavens for Dr Joan Coleman, still working as hard as ever in her seventh decade. Joan Coleman provided me with a sanity check when I had my first British case over twenty years ago, and I will never forget entering her warm, containing RAINS meeting and knowing I could say what I had been told and would be believed.

Indeed, the experience mental health practitioners go through when describing this work to sceptical colleagues provides us with a shadow of what survivors feel.

Yes, there are more referrals, and more people are aware of ritual abuse, but we remain an amnesic alter-personality representing unwanted reality! While DID at least has a neuroscientific "cachet" to sweeten the pill of reality, attitudes to ritual abuse, especially within our particular British culture, do not change.

MPs, journalists, and police cannot take this much further, as they fear for their popularity. Here was the difference between a former British DCI, Chris Healey, at a past RAINS conference and Colonel Kobus Jonker, who, at that time, had formed the Occult Squad in South Africa. While DCI Chris Healey warned that British police were not prepared to hear this, and someone from the CID should be asked for, with the preface that this was a difficult subject, Kobus instantly put up slides of ritual mutilation and pointed to evidence and its meaning.

Obedience, hierarchy, and professionals fearing for their jobs

One client angrily commented, when I spoke of democracy vs. her cult loyalty, that nearly all the professionals she had met had just blindly obeyed their seniors whatever their true thoughts about appropriate treatment or action.

She was, of course, right. When faced with a senior practitioner who is sceptical, the most highly skilled people give up their brain!

So what is different?

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, almost everyone we saw said he or she was a survivor of Satanist abuse. Satanism, like Pagan and other belief systems, is totally legal now, and we have the first serving Satanist naval officers as well as Pagan police officers. Only a small number of members of any particular religion actively abuse. However, later referrals included Luciferians, those from Paganism, Wicca, Voodoo, Black Witchcraft, Black Dianetics, Gnostic Luciferianism, Illuminati, Military Mind Control, MK Ultra, and Bluebird. Gradually, too, we saw victims of abuse within mainstream religions, abuse by mullahs, priests, vicars, and rabbis. Of even more concern were those whose systems can include all of this: a devoted Catholic alter, an abusing Satanist one, a Celtic one, a Kabbala one, an Egyptian one . . . None would want to know each other. The innate phobia between them is then enlarged by their opposing belief systems.

The change through a personal journey: publish and be saved

Without a new social paradigm, the change that happens is more the personal journey of the survivor and the therapist. There is evidence of the social change that has happened by the number of survivors present here today. And once survivors do all the talking and writing, we will truly have the paradigm shift that happened once the Women's Movement took on domestic abuse and child abuse.

It was, therefore, very good to hear from the Conference that ninety-year-old Betty's memoirs were shortly going to be published, and that Wanda Marriker's book, Morning Come Quickly, had appeared in the USA. Art therapist Ami Woods here works with a well-known artist, or, rather, group of artists in one body who happen to have DID, called Kim Noble, and we also have the cross-stitch work by Jane James.

So publish and be saved

Randy Noblitt, Pamela Perskin Noblitt (Noblitt & Perskin Noblitt, 2008), Ellen Lacter, Alison Miller, Jean Riseman, and Carole Rutz, all from the USA, help us.

In the meantime, the clinician's moral and personal journey is a crucial one. It took me a year to talk about ritual abuse, and when I handed the manuscript of Treating Survivors of Satanist Abuse to Edwina Welham at Routledge, I slept properly and no longer feared being killed, as I had done. I also felt enormous gratitude to my agent, Sara Menguc, for being willing to handle such a topic when she had hoped for me to write a book on family problems that affected everyone, based on my Guardian column!

If it took me a year to talk about ritual abuse because initially I felt silenced, it took me ten years to talk about mind control. It was thanks to colleagues Adah Sachs and Graeme Galton, who asked me to write about an incident that had haunted me for their book (Sachs & Galton, 2008), which led me through. I had been terrified of moving from ritual abuse to writing about mind control, but their gentle pressure released me. Ten years . . .

Art and creativity aid us all in this work, so I will end with a poem I wrote about it.

Treating Satanist abuse survivors

In the garden a green breath rises and rises
I am sitting by the window
On the table your fax sends murder down the line

In the hospital a woman asks for drugs
A child is dying through her mouth
Neither of them can speak

In the morgue the dead child is calling for her mother
As we write the scars on her head close like red zips

In the wood dead dog hairs grow flesh
Whimper, then howl for a kennel

We put these things together
Together we find a voice.

Appendix: Calendar abuse—the significance of ritual dates. Prepared for the Bowlby Centre and Clinic for Dissociative Studies Conference on Ritual Abuse, 23–24 September 2009 by Valerie Sinason with David Leevers

Introduction

"The fault, dear Brutus, lies in ourselves, not our stars"

(Shakespeare)

As our human species crossed the known continents, we took with us our awareness of day and night, light and dark, sky and earth, sea, river, rain, floods, monsoons, mountains, thunder and lightning, wind. We took with us our awareness of other living creatures, birds, fish, animals, and insects. Looking up at the skies, we drew the constellations of stars and ascribed particular meanings to sun and moon. Like frightened children trying to turn dots on a night-time wall into a friendly shape, we have needed to ascribe meaning and myth to planets and stars.

This is not to deny the possibility of many kinds of meanings that are currently beyond our skills and comprehension, but to point to the psychological need to defend against such huge unknowns.

Faced with mortality, time, and the Cosmos, we needed belief systems to sustain us; some were harsh, to mirror the social or geographical environment, others offered hope and love. The movement of peoples across the earth, dispersals and dispossessions, the growth of art and writing, led to an import and export of deities. Winning a war truly did mean gods and goddesses were on the side of the victors, and vanquished peoples took up the deities of the victors.

History is the voice of the winner. However, the vanquished can be heard in other ways. In the history of religious dates across the world we can see the old vanquished gods and goddesses peeping through the days that earlier were theirs but which were later transposed to their victorious descendants. We cannot even be sure that our earliest recorded history is the earliest. Where did the Sumerian deities come from?

However, what is repressed can break through. For example, the 25th of December, ascribed to the birth of Jesus, is the birthday of the Sun and, therefore, the most obvious date for Tammuz, the reincarnation of the Sun God. Tammuz was a Babylonian and Sumerian god, and the tenth month of the Hebrew Calendar is named for him.

Yule, the Winter Solstice on the 21st December, was moved by the Roman Catholic Church to the 25th of December, which was also the Roman Saturnalia festival, a time for drinking and feasting. Druids at this period saw the mistletoe as representing sexuality, and mistletoe, as with other ancient "props" was absorbed also. The same processes, as you will see, affect other key dates in the seasonal calendar.

The Edict of Milan

Although our multicultural British society means that we are meeting those who have been hurt through a variety of belief systems, the majority still have links with the Judeo-Christian heritage. Indeed, Christianity is currently still the world's largest religion. As a result of this, there is one major historical event that I consider crucial to consider.

For a belief system to gain a huge following it requires to be linked with a national identity. It was the conversion of Emperor Constantine of Rome that was to transform the chances of Christianity, which had previously been the religion of a persecuted minority. Constantine had declared that he would convert to the High God of Christianity if he won a particular battle, which he did. A year later he offered an edict that was remarkable in its tolerance. In 313 AD he announced "that it was proper that the Christians and all others should have liberty to follow that mode of religion which to each of them appeared best". He considered Rome would benefit from the prayers of all its different citizens and belief systems. No religion was illegal.

However, just a few years later, non-Christian belief systems lost their imperial support and funding, and the oppressor's former religion was now the victim, and finally designated the "pagan". Despite the current recognition of many of the belief systems that exist, the most ancient, that pre-date the major religions, have continued to be demonized or disavowed. Such rigid exclusion can be as damaging as complacent inclusion (witness the current religious trauma in Ireland) in making it easier for abusive practices to flourish.

Finally, ritual and ceremony are powerful processes and events that can enrich our lives and aid us at moments of greatest vulnerability or happiness: for example, births, deaths, and marriages. They are an intrinsic part of human existence and attachment. The focus of this text is concerned only with the tragedy that occurs where ritual and ceremony is used abusively.

How to use this

When children and adults made their brave way to speaking of abuse within religious or cult systems in the 1980s, they showed, through their verbal and non-verbal responses, that certain dates held enormous terror for them. Some, living with a supportive friend or partner, were able to disclose something about these dates. Many others had been taught for years, under the greatest threats of torture and punishment, to be silent. It soon emerged in treatment that they could face only too readily the threats to themselves. However, worst of all, their own loving capacity to attach was being abused. Those who terrified them were threatening to hurt anyone they disclosed to.

"Are you sure you are all right?" was the most common question asked of any therapist, counsellor, or friend after a disclosure.

After further years of work, survivors were able to let us know that there were some areas of terror where, if we named the unnameable, they would be free to express more. In a project on ritual abuse based at the Tavistock and Portman NHS Clinics in the early 1990s, Dr Robert Hale and myself found the majority of people who came to us were in particular states of terror on the 31st of October. By looking into the history and meanings of that date, we were able to provide some small easing of the pain being carried.

While the Internet is filled with details of all kinds of occult practices and all kinds of calendars, there is no substitute for a relationship in which a little trust might dare slowly to develop. Just as no two children in the same family have had exactly the same parents, no two children or adults hurt within any particular religion or cult experience it in exactly the same way.

To our amazement, some people can move forward without flashbacks into a new life of light and love, while others continue to be hurt anew with each ritual date. Some people carry post trauma responses to a few dates in the year, while for others, their whole life consists of being a slave to the calendar, with no respite, and with therapy as the only witness.

Where someone has been profoundly hurt in the context of a belief system, they can find all belief systems frightening and triggering and this calendar will carry a major health warning. For others, who have managed to have a secure attachment to a belief or a person, it can be of interest to see how key basic themes of human predicaments appear and reappear in different belief systems.

In other words, there is nothing prescriptive in this calendar. It is not a manual. It is not an exhaustive list of triggering times. Nothing can be a shortcut away from the painful shared task of bearing witness. However, I have a hope that it might help some understand why "calendar abuse" is one of the most lethal kinds of abuse (Sinason, 1994).

When I began working with survivors of ritual abuse, I found that their abuse was often linked to the Christian concept of Satan. Since then I and other therapists at the Clinic for Dissociative Studies, the Bowlby Centre, and elsewhere, have worked with survivors of abuse within the world's greatest mainstream religions, let alone sects and cults. Unerringly, we found that men and women from all over the UK, who did not know each other, were all falling ill, or being attacked, or suffering flashbacks on the same dates.

They show us, yet again, how our human hopes to understand the great unknown are beset with all the cruelties and unworked-through trauma of our species as well as the hope for something better.

Survivors of ritual abuse of any kind come from all social classes, all religious backgrounds, all racial groups, all ages, and all levels of education. While dissociative defences can allow some to continue with an apparently normal life with their pain invisible except to those who know them, others are profoundly visible, with the toll of flashbacks and problems with regulation of mood.

While there are survivors who come forward and write accounts of what has happened in their life in order to help others, many of these are, understandably, anonymous. There are also survivor-professionals who write from their professional context and need the freedom to not have to disclose their lived experience. While the climate continues to be unsafe, although more understanding than twenty years ago, there is more impetus for therapists and others to speak the unwanted message to the rest of society.

This is especially true when the subject is about belief. Speaking about hurt within a religious context can evoke fears of being seen as illiberal and intolerant. There is also the deep fear of threats coming from fundamentalists of all belief systems, let alone members of groups who hurt others.

I consider it helpful to make clear that I am not talking about any religion per se, only the human representation of it. I am particularly talking about attachment patterns. Those with a secure attachment to their religion (as to their family, nationality, place of work) are able to speak confidently about the positives and negatives of their experiences. It is those with a disorganized attachment who will fight to the death for the honour of a maltreating parent, deity, or religious representatives. As one wise religious leader told me, "It is a sin of pride to think you have to fight for God's honour—you are implying He does not have the power to stand up for Himself."

Towards a definition of spiritual abuse

> Spiritual abuse is the enforcement of a position of power, leadership or attachment in which total unquestioning obedience in thought, word or action is demanded of a child, adolescent or adult under threat of punishment in this life and in an afterlife for themselves, their families, helpers or others.
>
> In this abuse, there is no room for the individual to be allowed their own relationship with the divine as the abusers claim they are the only link. [Sinason & Aduale, "Safeguarding London's Children" Conference, June 2008]

Towards a definition of ritual abuse

> A significant amount of all abuse involves ritualistic behaviour, such as a specific date, time, position and repeated sequence of actions. Ritual Abuse, however, is the involvement of children, who cannot give consent, in physical, psychological, emotional, sexual and spiritual abuse which claim to relate the abuse to beliefs and settings of a religious, magical or supernatural kind. Total unquestioning obedience in thought, word or action is demanded of such a child, adolescent or adult under threat of punishment in this life and in an afterlife for themselves, their families, helpers or others. [Sinason & Aduale, "Safeguarding London's Children" Conference, 2008]

Ritual as defence against fear of mortality

> "Who turns and stands there lingering—> that's how we live always > saying goodbye"
> [Rainer Maria Rilke, 8th elegy, p. 153]

Freud considered that there were four unbearable factors for our species:

- we are not the masters of the universe,
- we are descended from apes,
- we are not masters of our unconscious,
- and we are not immortal.

Copernicus and Galileo discovered that the earth was not the centre of the universe. This rocked the Western Church. Our second most impossible subject is that of our own ancestry. We descend from other animals. Our longing to see our births and lives as having special meaning over and beyond that of other living beings can stir up the need to invest extra significance in our position among other animals and other species. This may not have been such a problem to pre-Judeo-Christian culture, where there were animal, bird, and location Gods.

A third wound is that we are not masters of our unconscious and can be taken unawares in all kinds of ways by our own internal processes.

The fourth, and perhaps most important, difficulty lies in coming to terms with our own mortality. Time, mortality, and the cosmos are key areas that both thrill and terrify us. Religions and other belief systems try to offer us ways of making sense of the meaning of our existence and our place in the universe.

Where there is secure attachment, towards family, friends, or belief system, there is a greater capacity to be protected from the persuasion of abusive religions and cults and to benefit and be enriched by loving ones. Where there is insecure attachment, or, especially, a disorganized attachment, there is greater need or vulnerability to shape a universe where everything is accounted for and ordered as either the master or as the slave.

In trying to make sense of changes of seasons, day turning into night, thunder and lightning, volcanoes, tidal waves, the position of the planets, the nightly death of the sun and monthly coming of the moon, it is not surprising that almost every belief system struggles to find a reason for birth and death, sacrifice and hope, and that the meaning of "sacrifice" becomes literal, not just symbolic. Fear of sexuality, body fluids, what comes out of a woman's body, a wish to control procreation and primitive responses to the newborn baby become transformed into rules and punishments. Attachment needs are denied by turning them into rigid and hurtful rituals, rather than transforming creative ones. Guilt about surviving when others die leads to the need for more blood sacrifice, which slowly, in safer countries, transforms into symbolic sacrifice.

It is not, therefore, surprising that responses to particular dates can be frightening to survivors of abuse by mainstream, minor, and fringe religions, as well as to survivors of cult abuse, which are often the abusive leftovers from earlier primitive mainstream religions.

Sadly, beyond all this, we know through Milgram's obedience experiments that even the more securely attached individuals, when faced with the group power of unreason and cruelty, give in to living and behaving in a barbarous way.

Time and calendars and repetition compulsion

September, the time for starting school in the UK and the northern hemisphere. Autumn days. Many adults can remember on such days the excitement of a new pencil-case, exercise books, covering a text book, excitement as well as anxiety at starting school. Others who were bullied and terrorized in school remember the season with dread. Our memories are evoked by dates and seasons. Sometimes "calendar abuse" hurts more than other abuse because just a time or day of the week can trigger flashbacks and horrific memories without another human being even needing to be there.

From earliest human experience, the seasons have made a huge impact on our psyches as well as night and day, sun, moon, stars, wind, rain, thunder, and lightning. To deal with the impossibility of time, all human cultures have needed to create a calendar that links our species with deities. Where there is a deity standing for love, these dates can bring joy and celebration. Where the deities are gods or goddesses of punishment or hatred, the dates can bring pain and terror. Sometimes a date can be a mixture. Most belief systems include ideas of the death of a god and rebirth, sky gods and underground gods, twins and murder/sacrifice linked to the seasons, the stars and planets, and the sun and moon, the transience of the individual vs. the permanence of the heavens.

Our established religions, in their early days, were highly intelligent in trying to woo public interest by keeping alive seasonal dates already linked to older religions but giving them another name! So, looking into the meaning of dates that can be triggering provides a multicultural theological and historical lesson in cultural archaeology.

It is very hard to consider that a date that has precious meaning, whether spiritually or emotionally, to one individual, can mean such abject terror for another. We need to try to preserve our own pleasure in certain dates while understanding the pain they can cause others.

In addition to the key universal yearly dates, such as the new moons, full moons, solstices, equinoxes, etc., different cults and religious groups also have other dates that are special. Personal birthdays, family birthdays, deaths, and wedding anniversaries are included. Even the clinician's, partner's, or friend's birthday are significant. Should a personal date fall on a ritual/religious date, there is even greater impact. Should a personal or religious date fall at a weekend then there is even more time dedicated to it.

Many belief systems also have an attraction to numerology—the magic meaning of numbers. Humans have found different ways of counting to try to control time and the uncertainty of life and have ascribed different religious and mystical values to the existence of certain numbers. This means that, in addition to key festival times, other dates have particular numerical meaning, including the survivor's age on their birthday. There are 650,000 references to numerology on the Internet, and interest in birth signs and horoscopes is part of this.

Numbers are also linked to different ages of development which have religious meaning in different belief systems: for example, baptism, barmitzvah, marriage to Christ or Satan.

A birthday that also falls on an occult date (which is planned in some generational families by inducing birth) therefore has a double meaning, and if it also falls on a Friday, Saturday, or Sunday in a given year it has even greater impact.

Calendars, years, and months

The current occult calendar consists of four periods of thirteen weeks each. Thirteen is the number that signifies rebellion in the Judeo-Christian tradition as there were thirteen at the Last Supper. We can now see why Friday the 13th is seen as so doubly unlucky. Should Friday 13th also be a full moon or another occult date, it triggers even more fear. The superstition around the number thirteen goes back farther. In Norse mythology there were thirteen present at a banquet in Valhalla when Balder (son of Odin) was slain, which led to the downfall of the gods. Friday the 13th will happen between one and three times in any given year.

Twenty-eight was a special number linked to the menstrual cycle. Alistair Crowley saw twenty-eight as the number of the Beast, Bahimiron. Twenty-eight also means power for Cabbalists. Numbers divisible by three also are given extra meaning—with Revelations saying 666 is the name of the Beast.

The Kabbalah has a whole system of meanings linked to numbers.

Numbers have also been necessary to control the way the movement of our planet is measured.

The Maya tracked a fault in the solar year in which they counted 365 days per year. Because they could not use fractions, the "quarter" day left over every year caused their calendar to drift with regard to the actual solar year. The 365-day year contained months that were also given names.

The Sumerian Calendar, sixth century BC noted Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn, as well as sun and moon, and synchronized a lunar calendar of twelve lunar months a year with an extra month inserted every four years. The early Egyptians and Greeks copied this.

The Babylonian Calendar and the Jewish Calendar followed a lunar month (Genesis 1:14) and special offerings were given on the day of the new moon.

The Islamic Calendar, the lunar calendar used by Muslims, dates from 622 AD (the year of the Hegira); the beginning of the Muslim year retrogresses through the solar year, completing the cycle every thirty-two years. The Islamic (Muslim) year begins with Muharram. All Islamic dates are subject to sighting of the moon; an event that may be one day earlier or later than the date listed.

The Celtic Year was a solar year, marked by four major bonfire feasts a year dedicated to the sun.

Hindu Calendar. The year is divided into twelve lunar months, but, because of the shortfall, it becomes lunisolar. The solar year is divided into twelve lunar months in accordance with the successive entrances of the sun into the signs of the zodiac, the months varying in length from twenty-nine to thirty-two days.

Jewish Calendar (Judaism): the calendar used by Jews dates from 3761 BC (the assumed date of the creation of the world); a lunar year of 354 days is adjusted to the solar year by periodic leap years.

Gregorian Calendar: the solar calendar now in general use in the UK and used by Christians in the West was introduced by Gregory XIII in 1582 to correct an error in the Julian calendar by suppressing ten days, making 5 October be called 15 October, and providing that only centenary years divisible by 400 should be leap years; it was adopted by Great Britain and the American colonies in 1752.

Buddhist Calendar. Apart from the Japanese, most Buddhists use the Lunar calendar. The most significant celebration happens every May on the night of the full moon, when Buddhist all over the world celebrate the birth, enlightenment, and death of the Buddha over 2500 years ago. It has become known as Buddha Day.

Pagan Calendar. By the third century the term Pagan, or "Paganus", was used to mean all those who were not Christians. Slowly, it took on a more disparate meaning and the term is now often seen as an umbrella term that covers many belief systems such as Druids (who have their own calendar), followers of Asatru, who adhere to the ancient, pre-Christian Norse religion, Wiccans, who follow pre-Celtic beliefs, and those who follow the religions of ancient Rome, Greece, or Egypt.

Contemporary Satanism, as espoused by Anton La Vey, was created on 1st May 1966 through the San Fransisco Church of Satan. As with many religious leaders, he chose an auspicious date on which to launch his church. He has considered that the highest holiday in Satanism is the date of one's own birthday, in direct contrast to religions that deify "an anthropomorphic form of their own image" instead of seeing themselves as a god, as in Christianity (Ecclesiastes 7:1) where " the day of death [is better] than the day of one's birth". Satanism is a legal belief system in the UK.

Shintoism, Jainism, Bahai, Luciferianism, Chinese traditional religion, African religions, and all the branches of Christianity all have dates in common.

Christianity is the largest world religion (including all its subsects and branches) and Scientology is the smallest among the religions that are counted in national statistics.

Ceremonial time

When does a ceremony begin? According to the Eastern Orthodox Church calendar, the day begins after evening vespers at sunset and concludes with vespers on the following day. For this reason, the observance of all Eastern Orthodox holy days and Jewish holy days begins at sunset on the evening before the holy day.

Do not assume that because someone has been triggered by one date that they will be by all the ritual dates, as each abusing group behaves differently and prioritizes different dates. Only the survivor knows at what time the bad dates are most relevant and which dates these are.

Days of the week

For some survivors, a day has significance only if a ceremony happens to fall on it. For others, days of the week have a mystical meaning regardless of the week or month it is linked to. We can be so used to measuring our time in days and months that we lose sight of the fact that the names provide understanding of deep meanings.

Sunday is the first day of the week. From prehistoric times to the close of the fifth century of the Christian era, the worship of the sun was dominant. Sunday celebrates the sun god, Ra, Helios, Apollo, Ogmios, Mithrias, the sun goddess, Phoebe. In the year 321, Constantine the Great ruled that the first day of the week, "the venerable day of the sun", should be a day of rest. The Christian concept of resting on the Sunday was borrowed.

Monday is the day of the moon goddess.

Tuesday is the third day of the week. Tiw's day is derived from Tyr of Tir, the God of honourable war, the wrestler and the son of Odin, the Norse god of war, and Frigga, the earth mother.

Wednesday comes from the Scandinavian Woden (Odin), chief god of Norse mythology, who was often called the All Father and is linked to the Roman Dies Mercurii.

Thursday comes from Thor, the God of strength and thunder, who is the counterpart of Jupiter, or Jove. Thor is the only god who cannot cross from earth to heaven upon the rainbow, for he is so heavy and powerful that the gods fear it will break under his weight. It was said that whenever Thor threw his hammer, the noise of thunder was heard through the heavens.

Friday is derived from the Germanic Frigga, the name of the Norse God Odin's wife. Frigga is considered to be the mother of all, and the goddess who presides over marriage. The name means loving or beloved. The corresponding Latin name is Dies Veneris, a day dedicated to Venus, the goddess of love. Any Friday that falls on the thirteenth day of the month has a ritual meaning. Friday is the unluckiest day of the week for many Christians, who believe that Christ was crucified on this day.

Saturday is corresponding to the Roman Dies Saturni, or day of Saturn, the Roman god of agriculture. Saturday is also represented by Loki, the Norse god of tricks and chaos. Saturn is also linked to the Greek God Cronus, who devoured his children.

For Jews, the Sabbath and day of rest is Saturday.

It is worth noting the similarity of the names of days with Sun Day, Moon Day, Mars Day, Mercury Day, Jupiter's Day, Venus's Day, Saturn's Day.

Months

January comes from Janus, the two-headed God of doorways: the month was named by Pompilus, the second king of Rome ca 700 BC.

February is the Roman festival of purification that was held on the 15th of that month.

March/Martius was the original beginning of the year and the time for the resumption of war. Mars is the Roman god of war. He is identified with the Greek god Ares.

April comes from Aphrodite, the Greek goddess of love and beauty. She is identified with the Roman goddess Venus. Called Aprilis, from aperire, "to open", possibly because it is the month in which the buds begin to open.

May is derived from Maia (meaning "the great one"), the Italian goddess of spring, the daughter of Faunus, and wife of Vulcan.

June comes from Juno, the principle goddess of the Roman Pantheon. She is the goddess of marriage and the well-being of women. She is the wife and sister of Jupiter. She is identified with the Greek goddess Hera. However, the name might also come from iuniores (young men, juniors) as opposed to maiores (grown men, majors) for May, the two months being dedicated to young and old men.

July: Julius Caesar reformed the Roman calendar (hence, the Julian calendar) in 46 BC. In the process, he renamed this month after himself.

August. Augustus Caesar clarified and completed the calendar reform of Julius Caesar. In the process, he also renamed this month after himself.

September, Latin for the seventh month, had thirty days until Numa, when it had twenty-nine days, until Julius, when it reverted to being thirty days long.

October, meaning eighth month, has always had thirty-one days.

Novembris, meaning ninth month, had thirty days until Numa, when it had twenty-nine days, until Julius, when it reverted to being thirty days long.

December had thirty days until Numa, when it had twenty-nine days, until Julius, when it became thirty-one days long Numa Pompilius, the second king of Rome ca 700 BC, added the two months Januarius and Februarius. He also changed the number of days in several months to be odd, a lucky number. After Februarius, there was occasionally an additional month of Intercalaris "intercalendar". This is the origin of the leap-year day being in February. In 46 BC, Julius Caesar reformed the Roman calendar (hence, the Julian calendar) changing the number of days in many months and removing Intercalaris.

Dates that change: Easter and moons

While most ritual dates stay the same, dates based on the lunar calendar change each year and therefore need special attention.

Ash Wednesday, Easter

The dates of Easter weekend, Easter Sunday, Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, Ascension, Pentecost, Corpus Christi, first Sunday of Advent, Full Moons, and New Moons all change.

No new moons or full moons are shown in the monthly calendar provided, as they vary.

All phases of the moon have meaning, from new moon, first quarter, waxing gibbous, full moon, waning gibbous, last quarter.

The second new moon is called the Black Moon. Blue Moon is the second full moon to occur in a single calendar month. Two new moons and two full moons in one calendar month is seen to have more power.

The interval between full moons is about 29.5 days, while the average length of a month is 30.5 days. This makes it very unlikely that any given month will contain two full moons.

Eclipses also have meaning.

The quarter moon represents the moon goddess Diana, and Lucifer, the morning star. If we consider that the planet named Venus is sometimes called the morning star and sometimes the evening star and that the same name was given to Lucifer, we can see the way the emblems of different belief systems join together.

Table 1 shows some of the names given to the moon according to the month.

The seasons and weather

It is worth noting that while Western world beliefs have four seasons, there are other cultures that have or have had three seasons. For example, in Ancient Egypt, there was Akhet, the inundation (June–September), Peret (October–February), the Growing Season, and Shemu (March–May), the Harvesting Season.

Thunder, lightning, storm winds, and rain all have different meaning and different deities attached to them.

Table 1. Names of the moon according to month.

January	Old Moon	Wolf Moon	Moon after Yule, Ice Moon
February	Wolf Moon	Snow Moon	Hunger Moon, Storm Moon, Candles Moon
March	Lenten Moon	Worm Moon	Crow Moon, Crust Moon, Sugar Moon, Sap Moon, Chaste Moon
April	Egg Moon	Pink Moon	Sprouting Grass Moon, Fish Moon, Seed Moon, Waking Moon
May	Milk Moon	Flower Moon	Corn Planting Moon, Corn Moon, Hare's Moon
June	Flower Moon	Strawberry Moon	Honey Moon, Rose Moon, Hot Moon, Planting Moon
July	Hay Moon	Buck Moon	Thunder Moon, Mead Moon
August	Grain Moon	Sturgeon Moon	Red Moon, Green Corn Moon, Lightning Moon, Dog Moon
September	Corn Moon	Harvest Moon	Corn Moon, Barley Moon
October	Harvest Moon	Hunter's Moon	Travel Moon, Dying Grass Moon, Blood Moon
November	Hunter's Moon	Beaver Moon	Frost Moon, Snow Moon
December	Oak Moon	Cold Moon	Frost Moon, Long Night's Moon, Moon Before Yule

The significant dates per month

January

1: New Year's Day. A Druid (spirit) feast day (light fires on hill tops).
5: Shivaratri (night of Shiva creator/destroyer).
5 or 6: Twelfth Night.
6: Dionysian revels.
6: Kore gives birth/manifestation of divinity. Kore, Demeter, and Persephone make up the triple goddess.
6: Epiphany. This refers to celebration over the manifestation of the divinity of Jesus, as shown by the visit of the three Magi.

7: Eastern Orthodox Christmas.
7: St Winebald Day. Winebald was a successful Saxon missionary who founded the Benedictine Order and was the brother and son of saints.
12: Birth of both Rosenburg and Goering, Nazi leaders in the Second World War.
13: Satanic New Year.
15–16: Skillfest, the feast day of St Henry of Coquet Island, a Dane who settled here in the twelfth century, noted for his psychic perceptions.
17: Feast of Fools (Old Twelfth Night)/satanic and demon revels.
18: Old Epiphany.
18–22: Dream Festival (Pleiades).
20: St Agnes' Eve.
20–27: Grand climax (blood rituals). St Agnes, the patron saint of virgins, was martyred at the age of twelve or thirteen for being a Christian. On this day in Rome, the Pope blesses two lambs. Young virgins can have visions of delight on such a night. In the Satanic calendar, it is the conjuration of Telal, a warrior demon
30: Hitler named Chancellor of Germany

February

1–3: Mysteries of Persephone, Groundhog Day, Groundhog's Day. The popular "Punxsutawney Phil" groundhog comes out of his burrow to divine the next few weeks of weather. If he sees his shadow, there is a prediction that there will be six more weeks of bad weather until Spring finally arrives; if he does not see his shadow, the next seven weeks before Spring will be good weather. This pagan tradition features both the numbers "6" and "7", which, when added, equals "13". Groundhog's Day (Imbolg) represents the Earth Mother in some systems. As the Earth goddess sleeps inside the earth during the winter season, so does the groundhog. They represent rebirth and renewal.
The name "groundhog" was substituted for the Satanic name of the holiday, Imbolg, a night requiring human sacrifice.

2: Candlemas (Imbolc/Imbolg). This date is halfway between winter and spring solstices and means "with milk" for both goats and cows. Brigid's Day (2 February) was the Christianized version of Brigid or Bride, the great Celtic Mother goddess. The Irish called it Imbolc, and it celebrates the triple goddess. It is also called Candlemas, as candles are blessed on that day.

9: (Starts evening of 8 February.) Tu B'Shevat (Jewish celebration of spring).

13: Friday the 13th.

14: Valentine's Day is a pagan festival that encourages love and physical lust. It is celebrated precisely thirteen days after Imbolg, thus imprinting upon it the number "13", Satan's number of extreme rebellion. Most people view this day now as the day to honour your wife or lover.

Cupid, the son of Venus, is really Tammuz, son of Semiramis. Venus, daughter of Jupiter, is really Semiramis herself.

Jupiter is the head deity, a sun god. Nimrod, Semiramis's husband, is considered a sun god in the Babylonian Mysteries.

The name of this month comes from the Roman goddess Februa and St Febronia (from Febris, the fever of love). She is the patroness of the passion of love. Her orgiastic rites are celebrated on 14 February—still observed as St Valentine's Day—when, in Roman times, young men would draw billets naming their female partners. This is a time of clear vision into other worlds, expressed by festivals of purification.

St Valentine was not mentioned until 496 AD and there is still doubt about his origins.

14: Fertility rituals.

15: Lupercalia (she-wolf mother of Romulus and Remus: honouring of Pan).

16: Presidents' Day (a federal holiday in the USA).

21–22: Feralia/Terminalia (Roman All Souls'/boundary day).

25: Walpurgis. Saint Walpurga herself was a niece of Saint Boniface and said to be a daughter of the Saxon prince, Saint Richard. Together with her brothers she travelled to Germany, where she became a nun. Her feast day is commemorated on 1st May.

March

28: Hearthday, the day of Vesta, the matriarchal Roman goddess, who kept a perpetual fire on hearth and altar.

Easter varies each year between March and April. It is celebrated on the first Sunday after the first new moon after Ostara. This date celebrates the return of Semiramis into her reincarnated form of the Spring Goddess. The equivalent of Good Friday, "Easter Friday", has historically been timed to be the third full moon from the start of the year. Since the marrying of pagan Easter to Jesus' resurrection, Good Friday is permanently fixed on the Friday prior to Easter.

Within some abusive branches of Satanism and Luciferianism, some children aged 3–5 are reborn through a cow corpse, or sometimes goats. There are also mock crucifixions.

Easter is steeped in the Babylonian Mysteries, The Babylonian goddess, Ishtar, is the one for whom Easter is named. She was Semiramis, wife of Nimrod, and the real founder of the Babylonian Mysteries. After Nimrod died, Semiramis created the legend that he was really her divine son born to her in a virgin birth. She is considered to be the co-founder of all occult religions, along with Nimrod. Babylon: Ishtar (Easter), also called the Moon Goddess.

Catholics: Virgin Mary (Queen of Heaven) She links with the Indian Indrana, the ancient Jewish Ashtoreth, the Sumerian Innanna, the Greek Aphrodite and Ceres, the Egyptian Isis, and the Etruscan Nutria.

The Babylonians celebrated the day as the return of Ishtar (Easter), the goddess of Spring. This day celebrated the rebirth, or reincarnation, of Nature and the goddess of Nature. According to Babylonian legend, a huge egg fell from heaven, landing in the Euphrates River. The goddess Ishtar (Easter) broke out of this egg. Later, the feature of an egg nesting was introduced, a nest where the egg could incubate until hatched. A "wicker" or reed basket was conceived in which to place the Ishtar egg.

The Easter Egg Hunt was conceived because, if anyone found her egg while she was being "reborn", she would bestow a blessing upon that lucky person. Because this was a joyous Spring festival, eggs were coloured with bright Spring colours.

The goddess's totem, the Moon-hare, would lay eggs for good children to eat. Eostre's hare was the shape that Celts imagined on the surface of the full moon Thus, "Easter"—Eostre, or Ishtar—was a goddess of fertility. Since the rabbit is a creature that procreates quickly, it symbolized the sexual act; the egg symbolized "birth" and "renewal". Together, the Easter Bunny and the Easter Egg symbolize the sex act and its offspring, Semiramis and Tammuz.

Easter offerings are derived from the tradition where the priests and priestesses would bring offerings to the temples for Easter. They brought freshly cut spring flowers and sweets to place on the altar of the god they worshipped. They would also bake hot cross buns, decorating them with crosses symbolizing the cross of Wotan, or another god. The first instance of hot cross buns can be traced back to about 1,500 BC, to Cecrops, the founder of Athens. In Old Testament celebrations in Israel, women angered God because they baked this type of cakes to offer them in worship to the Queen of Heaven (Jeremiah 17:17–18).

Another popular Easter offering was freshly made or purchased clothes. The priests would wear their best clothes, while the Vestal Virgins would wear newly made white dresses. They would also wear headgear, like bonnets, while many would adorn themselves in garlands of spring flowers. They would carry wicker baskets filled with foods and candies to offer to the gods and goddesses.

Easter sunrise services were originated by the priest serving the Babylonian Ishtar to symbolically hasten the reincarnation of Ishtar/Easter.

Lent has been accepted by the Roman Catholic Church. However, it is a commemoration of Tammuz's death. He was killed by a wild boar when he was forty years old. Lent was commemorated for exactly forty days prior to the celebration of Ishtar/Esotre and other goddesses.

March

1: St Eichstadt. Conjuring of Ninkharsag, Queen of Demons, and Ninkaszi, Horned Queen of Demons, drinking of blood.
2: Dionysian revels.
9: Festival of Ishtar (Astarte, Aphrodite, Venus).

10: (Starts evening of 9th.) Purim.

15: Ides of March: rites of Cybele and Attis (begins twelve day death and resurrection ritual). Cybele was a Phyrigian mother goddess who fell in love with the mortal, Attis. In her jealousy, when he fell in love with another mortal, she drove him mad so that he castrated and killed himself. Zeus helped her to resurrect him.

16: Montsegur Day. In remembrance of the persecution of the Cathars.

17: St Patrick's Day.

18: Sheila-na-gig (Sheelah's Day, Sheelahis Day, Celtic creatress): Jacques De Molay Day (Knights Templar).

20–22: Pelusia, invocation of Isis (Hindi), Holi/Tubulustrum Roman purification/Shab-i-barat. Night of Forgiveness (Islam), Homage to the God of death.

21: Spring Equinox. Children dedicated to Satan or Tiamet.

21–22: Goddess Ostara (Ishtar, also spelled, Eostre), for whom "Easter" is named. Easter is the first Sunday after the first new moon after Ostara.

Eostre is mentioned in Beowulf, possibly identified with Kali. Red Easter eggs are placed on graves in Russia to assist rebirth.

21–24: Feast of the Beast/Bride of Satan/Feast of Priapus/Festival of Isis).

31–1 April: Vertmass, feast of green, linked with Green George, the goddess's consort who was the Green King of the woodland, or the fool of love.

April

1: April Fools Day: precisely thirteen weeks since New Year's Day.

6: Palm Sunday.

8: Day of the Masters.

9: Maundy Thursday. This commemorates the Last Supper of Jesus with the Apostles and falls on the Thursday before Easter.

12: Hitler's birthday (alternate).

19: This is the first day of the thirteen-day Satanic ritual relating to fire, the fire god, Baal, or Molech/Nimrod (the Sun God), also known as the Roman god, Saturn (Satan/Devil). This day is a major human sacrifice day, demanding fire sacrifice with an emphasis on children. This day is one of the most important sacrifice days in Satanist abuse groups.

19: Anniversary of the day in 1943 when, after trapping the last Jewish resistance fighters in Warsaw in a storm drain and holding them there for several days, Nazi storm troopers began to pour fire into each end of the drain, using flame-throwers. They continued pouring the fire into the drain until all fighters were dead.

20: Hitler's birthday.

20: Queen's Day (Netherlands).

21–1: May: Grand Climax/Da Meur/preparation for Beltane.

22–29: Preparation for sacrifice in some abusive Satanic sects (third week of April).

23: St George's Day/England's national day.

26–1 May: Corpus de Baahl

30: Walpurgisnacht (May Eve). This is the day before May Day, when, in German occult tradition, a major festival takes place. Very cleverly, Christianity took over the date and named it Walpurgisnacht after a Christian Nun, Walburga, who was born in the UK in the eighth century but ran an enlightened nunnery in Germany. She had two religious brothers, St Willibald and St Winebald, who had set up the monasteries there. Her remains were transferred to Eichstatt on May Day, which is how St Eichadat's Day, May Day, and Beltane became linked.

30: Anniversary of Hitler's death. This tradition was strong enough that Adolf Hitler decided to kill himself on April 30 at 3:30p.m., thus creating a "333" and placing his suicide sacrifice within the Beltane time frame.

30–5 May: Grand Climax/Da Meur/Beltane

May

1: May Day. Beltane Fire Festival. Major Celtic festival.

This is the Greatest Sabbat, and is marked by fertility rites in open fields. Seminal fluid is mixed with dirt and insects and inserted into the vagina of a virgin. If conception occurs, the children are children of Tiamet and Dur (Indur). Great bonfires are lit on the Eve of Beltane, 30 April, in order to welcome the Earth goddess. Participants hope to gain favour with this goddess so she will bless their families with procreative fertility. Since fertility is being asked of the Earth goddess, the Maypole is the phallic symbol and the circular dance around the pole forms the circle that is symbolic of the female sex organ. Four six-foot alternating red and white ribbons were connected to the pole; the men would dance counterclockwise, while the ladies danced clockwise. The union of the intertwining red and white ribbons symbolized the act of copulation.

For the Celts it marked the beginning of summer and the need to protect cattle from disease. For some, the great bonfires in Ireland were to protect cattle from witchcraft. In the past, this date was also dedicated to Mari, Mother Sea, as late as 1678 in Ireland.

9–13: Lumeria (three days Roman All Souls).
11: Mother's Day.
21–24: Rituals to mock the Ascension of Jesus to heaven, Ascension Day.
29–5 June: (Starts evening of 28 May.) Shavuot.
29–30: Memory Day dedicated to Joan of Arc.
31: Pentecost (Whitsunday).

June

1: Republic Day (Ireland)
3: Eastern Orthodox Ascension Day
6: D-Day (allied troops'invasion of France in the Second World War).
21: Summer Solstice. Can be marked by torture, rape, and sacrifice of traitors, sacrifice and consumption of an infant.
21: Father's Day.
23: Midsummer's Eve/St John's Eve Fire Festival.
24: Lighting the midwinter bonfires in New Zealand.

July

1: Satanic and demon revels. Blood sacrifice.
4: Independence Day in the USA.

14: Bastille Day in France.
17–23: Sacrifice of first-born males, communion given with their flesh and blood.
19–20: Sunfest. The title and meaning of Helios was later given to St Elias.
23: Beginning of Dog Days, linked to Sirius, the Dog Star, Sothis, star of Set.
25: St James' Day/Festival of the horned god.
26: Parents' Day.
30: (Starts evening of 29th.) N Tish B'Av.

August

1: Lammas/Lughnasadh (31st July, too). Lammas may be a corruption of "loaf mass", the celebration of the corn harvest. Lammas is midway between the summer solstice and the autumnal equinox. The wheel of the year is seen to shift from growing time to harvest time.
3: Satanic and demon revels.
12–13: Diana's day: the Roman name for the triple goddess, goddess of the moon and the three moon phases. Christians turned it into the Assumption of the Virgin Mary.
15: Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.
24: Mania (opening of nether world gate).
24–27: Fundus Mundi (a three day late-harvest festival).
26: Preparation for Feast of the Beast, or marriage to Satan. Fasting and anointing.
28: Feast of Nephthys (wife of Set, goddess of death).

September

1: Labour Day
5–7: Marriage to the Beast (Satan)
7: Feast of the Beast, marriage of virgins to Satan.
13: Grandparents' Day
19– 20: (Starts evening of 18th.) Rosh Hashanah.
20–21: Midnight Host, vows and hierarchy fasting for previous week. Personal blood sacrifice from tip of fingers/paw of pet, etc., hands planted in the ground for power.

21: Autumn/Fall Equinox, Mahon. From this date through Halloween, occultists believe the veil separating the earthly dimension from the demonic realm gets progressively thinner, with the thinnest night being 31 October; this thinning of the separating veil makes it easier for the demonic realm to enter the earthly dimension. Thus, on Halloween, evil spirits, ghosts, witches, hobgoblins, black cats, fairies, and demons of all sorts were believed to be running amok across the land. They had to be back in their spiritual dimension before midnight, Halloween, for the separating veil would then get thicker.

Jewish New Year period of Purification, Rosh Hashanah (date varies) and Yom Kippur (date varies), Day of Atonement.

23–30: Birthday celebration of Shri Krishna.
23: Mysteries of Eleusis.
28: (Starts evening of 27th) Yom Kippur.
29: Michaelmas.

October

2: Last day of Mysteries of Eleusis.
2: Durga Puja (Kali).
3–11: (Starts evening of 2nd.) Sukkot, Shmini Atzeret/Simchat Torah.
5: Opening of Mundus Cereris.
10: Dashara (Kali's victory over Mahishasura).
12: Dia de la Raza (Mexico).
12/20: Hitler's half birthday.
13: Backwards date re Halloween;13 as reverse of 31.
16: Death of Rosenburg.
17–18: Yom Kippur.
19: Death of Goering.
20/23: Hitler's half birthday.
22–29: Preparation for All Hallows' Eve.
31: Halloween/Samhain/All Hallows Eve/ Hallowmas/All Souls' Day, Halloween.

Preparation for the Isia (ring of six: Isis, Hathor, Nepthys, Horus, Thoth, Anubis). Resurrection of Osiris.

Start of the Celtic new year, the "dark" half of the year.

All Hallows Eve, as designated by the Catholic Church. This date is the Illuminati's highest day. Historically, Halloween is the deadliest ceremony dedicated to the Celtic Lord of the Dead, also symbolized by the horned god and the stag god. The Druids celebrated Samhain as a three-day fire festival, building huge bonfires, thought to ward off demons that roamed around; additionally, the fires provided the means by which the required human sacrifice would be presented to the sun god. In enormous wicker baskets, the priests caged both human and animal sacrifices, which they then lowered into the flames. The priests would carefully watch the manner in which the victim died in order to predict whether the future held good or evil.

Trick or Treat is over 2,000 years old. People put food offerings outside their homes so the wandering evil spirits would consume them on their way back to the netherworld. Failure to "treat" these evil spirits might result in a curse.

The American version of Halloween came from Ireland. The potato famine in 1840 brought thousands of immigrants to the USA. With them came the artefacts of their own folk beliefs and customs: goblins, Jack-o'-lanterns, bonfires, apples, nuts, and tricks. In Ireland on 31 October, peasants went from house to house to receive offerings to their Druid god, Muck Olla. This procession stopped at each house to warn the farmer that if he did not provide an offering, misfortune might befall him and his crops.

Frightening costumes. People clothed themselves in the most hideous and terrifying costumes. Huge bonfires were linked to Satan's domain. These bonfires provided the means by which the priests sacrificed the human and animal sacrifices so crucial to Halloween. When the last fires died out, people would race each other down the hills shouting, "The Devil gets the last one down".

Apple games. Apples have long been a token of love and fertility. At Halloween parties, people bobbed for apples in tubs of water. If a boy came up with an apple between his teeth, he was assured of the love of his girl.

Apple seeds were also used to tell fortunes. Peeling an apple in one long piece was supposed to tell a young girl about her future. Owls, bats, cats, and toads are an essential part of Halloween, and were known as "the witch's familiars". A divining familiar was perceived as the species of animal whose shape Satan would assume to aid the witch in divining the future. Other "familiar spirit" shapes include hens, geese, small dogs, rats, butterflies, wasps, crickets, and snails. Celts often hollowed out a turnip and carved a face on it to fool demons. They carried such lanterns to light their way in the dark and to ward off evil spirits. While the turnip continues to be popular in Europe today, the pumpkin has replaced it in America. "Jack" is a nickname for "John", which is a common slang word meaning "man". Jack-O-Lanterns literally means "man with a lantern".

There are many different legends involving Satan and Jack-o'-Lanterns.

November

1: Satanist High Holy Day (related to Halloween) All Saint's Day, (feast for the saints with no nameday of their own). The Isia: six days of ritual drama commemorating Isis searching for the pieces of Osiris, feast of the netherworlds, parting of the astral veil, resurrection of Osiris.
2: All Soul's Day (feast in honour of the dead), Day of the Dead (Santeria), Day of the Dead, El Dia De Los Muertos.
4: Satanic revels.
7: Rebirth of Osiris.
21–22: Musemass. The Christian church created this day for St Cecilia, goddess of music, who prayed to stay a virgin.

December

5: Sinterklaas (Holland).
6: St Nicholas's Day.
12–19: Jewish winter festival of Light, Chanukah, start of the Winter Solstice, animal sacrifice and live burial of victims to celebrate the dark time.
12–13: St. Lucia's Day.
17–22: Saturnalia.
21: St Thomas Day. Yule. Winter Solstice, fire.
21: Feast Day, orgies.
22: Yule/Winter Solstice.
24: Christmas Eve/Satanic and demon revels/Da Meur/Grand High Climax.

The Saxon name was Mondranect, the night of mothering. The day is dedicated to the birth of the sun and the goddess Astarte. The following night is celebration of the mother as Sea Mother.

25: Christmas Day, ascribed to the birth of Jesus, is the birthday of the Sun and Tammuz, the reincarnation of the sun god. Yule, the Winter Solstice of 21st December was moved by the Roman Catholic Church to 25th December. 25th December was also the Roman Saturnalia festival, a time for drinking and feasting. Druids also saw the mistletoe as representing sexuality at this period.

The winter solstice occurs on 21st December, and this is one of the highest pagan/Celtic holidays, since the "New Year" begins after this date for the cult. Special ceremonies are planned to ensure the coming of a new year filled with power, and the return of the sun's lengthening days. In some cults, children are abused by cult members dressed as Santa (anagram for Satan).

Since the sun was experienced as having reversed itself and was now rising in the sky, pagans believed this was a sign that the human sacrifices carried out in Samhain (Halloween) had been accepted by the gods. We continue to connect with these ancient beliefs through some of our Christmas songs.

Christmas Tree: The sacred tree of the winter god; Druids believed the spirit of their gods resided in the tree. Most ancient pagans knew the tree represented Nimrod reincarnated into Tammuz. Pagans also looked upon the tree as a phallic symbol.

Star: pentagram or pentalpha, the five-pointed star, the triple triangle. This is a powerful symbol of Satan, second only to the hexagram. The star is the sacred symbol of Nimrod, Candles represent the sun god's newly born fire. Pagans the world over love to use candles in their rituals and ceremonies.

Mistletoe is the sacred plant of the Druids, symbolizing pagan blessings of fertility; thus, kissing under the mistletoe is the first step in the reproductive cycle. Witches also use the white berries in potions.

Wreaths are circular, and they represent the female sexual organs. Wreaths are associated with fertility and the "circle of life".

Santa Claus: "Santa" is an anagram for "Satan". In the New Age, the god "Sanat Kamura" is an anagram for "Satan".

Reindeer are horned animals representing the "horned god" or the "stag god" of pagan religion. Santa's traditional number of reindeer in his team is eight; in Satanic gematria, eight is the number of "new beginnings", or the cycle of reincarnation. The Illuminati views the number "eight" as a symbol of their New World Order.

Green and red are the traditional colours of the season, as they are the traditional pagan colours of winter and seen by some groups to be key Satanist colours; red is the colour of blood.

26: Boxing Day (UK, Canada, Australia, New Zealand). Boxing Day is a day the higher classes gave gifts to the lower classes. Before or on 25th December, people of similar class would exchange gifts to celebrate the Christmas season. Gifts were not exchanged with the lower class until the next day, called Boxing Day. It is also known as St Stephen's Day. Sometimes gifts were put in a box, and breaking the box, or something like a Piggy Bank, would happen. Church used collection boxes to distribute money to the poor on this day.

26: St Stephen's Day (Scotland).

26–2 January: Hanukkah, Jewish Feast of Lights, Rededication of the Temple.

31: New Year's Eve.

The eight key dates

Other triggers

Birthdays come from the Assyro-Babylonian system and were linked to human sacrifice. Dying on a birthday is part of the "neat" way there is an attempt to control nature and time.

This calendar is an aid to looking at triggers linked to belief systems. There are, however, many other triggers linked to aspects of abuse, including, colours, jewels, clothes, eating, drinking, washing, sleeping, having sex, pregnancy and childbirth, blood, loud voices, hospitals, illness, reading, watching films, hearing sirens. In fact, given the enormous number of trigger some people have faced, it is remarkable that they can function in any way.

Some deities

The Babylonian deity Marduk was associated with Mars.

Bel/Baal was the name under which nations were introduced to Marduk.

Marduk/Nimrod has the serpent as his key symbol.

The worship of Nimrod and Semiramis is the key source of pagan religions.

Marduk led the rebellion of gods against Tiamat.

Mother and child, Semiramis and Tammuz, become Isis and Osiris, Venus and Adonis, Madonna and child.

Tammuz became incorporated into Satan.

Beel-Zebub, Lord of the Flies, also means motion and travel in that the fly was restless and darted about.

Ashtar, queen of heaven, kept "male" priestesses known as her faithful "dogs".

Conclusions

Casting the first stone

As the stones weep
Scrubbing at their bloodstains
On the village Square

I am asking the Elders
I am asking the "faithful"
Whose God-face lies
Clenched in their fists
Like a missile

[Valerie Sinason]

All recorded history shows an existence of religious beliefs, dates, and ceremonies. All belief systems have themes of birth, death, sacrifice, and rebirth in common. While there has been a progression in more democratic countries to moving from actual sacrifice to symbolic sacrifice, from blood to wine, there are fundamentalist belief systems and cults that perpetuate primitive modes of functioning. Of course, in times of war, even the most morally advanced nations revert to primitive modes of functioning.

The written tenets of most world religions, or rather, the all-too-human cultures they are embedded in, include approval for actions that are against twenty-first century law and basic child protection procedures. However, the slow progression to deities of loving attachment has allowed progress. Those who are frozen into the literal word are like the emotional part in a DID system, condemned to a perpetual darkness of shame, pain, and punishment, where a deity of light and love does not appear.

We must note that Satanism is now a legal belief system recognized by the British Government, and most Satanists would not hurt anyone and are often refugees from hell-based branches of Christianity from which they need a defence.

We also need to note that people in cultures without a deity or deities hurt others, and people with deities hurt others. We are a primitive species passing on our trauma. No single belief is the cause of ritual pain.

However, fascism plus religion carries an extra terror, as it gives a sense of hopelessness and slavery even after death.

The use and perversion of religions and other beliefs for the purpose of hurting children and adults is something that we all need to be watchful over.

CHAPTER TWO

"An evil cradling"? Cult practices and the manipulation of attachment needs in ritual abuse

Rachel Wingfield Schwartz

In his remarkable autobiographical account of his years held as a hostage in Beirut, Brian Keenan describes his captivity and his relationship to his captors as "an evil cradling":

> My days passed in a slow, gentle delirium; like the comfort and reassurance that a child must feel as its mother rocks and sings it a lullaby. I looked wildly at a dead insect in my cell, hanging in its cocoon. I felt a strange contentment. I felt no desire to leave this place. I found myself thinking with the shadows of panic rising in me that I was not ready to leave, that I did not want to leave. I began to dread my freedom, if it should come. [Keenan, 1993, p. 73]

In this account, Keenan enables us to begin to understand that being enfolded, cradled in this cocoon of captivity, evil though it may be, begins to present a kind of safety for the captive, the alternative to which-escape—seems to threaten only terror and the unknown. The survivors of ritual abuse and mind control that we will talk about over the course of this Conference grew up within an evil cradling; within families and cults who set out to make it impossible for them to ever escape; impossible for them to ever break the psychological bonds with their abusers, bonds carefully welded within a cocoon of torture and programming.

I was reminded, by Keenan's words, of a client of mine, a ritual abuse survivor who described her relationship with her mother—one of the main perpetrators of her abuse. She told me:

> I would sit for hours, often, just staring at her face or preferably stroking her arm or feeling her stroke mine. I got such a sense of security just being able to stare at her and feel her body next to mine. The rest of the world went away. Like we were in a bubble together. Even in to my twenties I would still sit on her knee, and I would still scream and shout sometimes if she left the room. It's years since I've seen her, but I still wake up crying for my mummy in the night. Part of me is desperate just to have the comfort of touching her again. She always told me I would never be able to live without her and even now I sometimes think she might be right.

The theme of this book is the manipulation of attachment needs. I think this is a key to understanding the traumatic experience of people ritually abused in cults. I want to write from the perspective of being an attachment-based therapist and explore some of what I have learnt over the years from survivors about the use and abuse of the attachment system by perpetrators within ritual abuse. I also want to think about what survivors need relationally from psychotherapy if recovery is to be possible, and what it means to try to build a new working model of attachment in therapy when someone has a history of that need for attachment being so distorted and manipulated. To address these issues, I am going to focus on my work over a period of eight years with a young woman I am going to call Jodi, who was a survivor of ritual abuse and mind control.

Jodi

Jodi was referred to me by a colleague, who assured me she would not be a long-term client and did not have severe trauma in her history. She had a life crisis she needed to talk over with someone. That was all. Her brother had recently been diagnosed with schizophrenia and she was feeling very concerned and distressed about him. She needed someone to talk to. However, I have found, as many of you may have, too, that once you have started working clinically around ritual abuse it tends to find you wherever you go.

Jodi arrived punctually for her first session, and was immediately charming. She had found the journey easy, she loved the house, she was so grateful to me for seeing her. She told me she was twenty-four years old, a drama student at a prestigious school, and she still lived with her family—her parents, and her younger brother, who was Jodi's main focus in this session. As Jodi talked about her brother's recent breakdown, and began to describe the panic she had been experiencing, I found myself starting to feel more and more anxious. Jodi was talking calmly, but I became aware that the feelings were intensifying; I was not so much anxious any more, but terrified. I could feel myself starting to hyperventilate. For a brief moment, I wondered if I was safe with her, or if she was about to attack me. The body countertransference hit me so rapidly and so powerfully I was literally struggling for breath, and struggling even harder to regulate myself. I needed to slow myself down enough to begin to unravel what was happening.

I said to Jodi, "As you were talking, I started feeling terrible anxiety in my body. Then I felt terrified and was struggling to breathe. I think you were letting me know how frightened you are. Is that right?"

She looked at me silently, and after a little while, nodded.

The feelings in my body started to recede, my breathing calmed down and so did the feelings of terror. Jodi, on the other hand, began to struggle. She tried to continue talking about her brother, but she could not focus, could not breathe properly, and was moving agitatedly in her chair. I could feel she could not bear to sit with me in the room for another minute and abruptly I got out of my chair, saying I was going to get her a glass of water, and left the room. I was puzzled about this; I had never done this in the middle of a session with a client before, but I also felt absolutely certain that it was the right thing to do, that she could not have coped with my presence any longer. When I returned, she was calmer, but different. She could not look at me, spoke in a gentle, halting voice, and tried to explain that she had been having trouble recently "losing herself"; as she described it, the fear would come, and then she would have no sense of where she was, or what was happening.

Although I was not sure what was triggering these feelings of fear, I had no doubt that I was sitting with an extremely terrorized young woman and my feelings also left me wondering if she had experienced violence. These were feelings I was familiar with when working with people who were severely traumatized.

Jodi decided she would commit to undertaking therapy, and arranged to see me twice weekly, although, over the eight years of our work together, she was to increase to four times weekly sessions. The early months were dominated by continuing intense shifts in states, the room drenched in fear, a sense of immanent violence pervading the sessions, with intermittent periods of us both being drawn in to calm, hypnotic, trance-like states. Jodi spoke in these sessions about her great concern and attachment to her brother. Jodi felt his vulnerability acutely and cited him as a key reason why she had not been able to leave home, despite being offered student accommodation at her drama school. Jodi also spoke in these sessions about her relationship with her mother. "We're joined," she said, "if she dies, I die. We're one person." When Jodi spoke about her mother, I would feel an intense sense of suffocation, alongside the depth of her ambivalence: of her desperately needing to be with her mother, to be in constant phone contact when she was away at school for the day, coupled with a rage and a desire to attack her mother.

In attachment terms, Jodi was presenting with classic features of disorganized/disorientated infants. She moved in and out of seemingly contradictory states, both in sessions and in relation to her mother. Longing for contact could be followed by becoming frozen or frightened when the contact became available. Being with Jodi was being with the ongoing, terrible experience of fright without solution; the terror was palpable, the strategies for managing it never anything more than a temporary escape into dissociation.

She felt to me like an occupied person, her mind and body colonized by violent and terrifying others from whom it was only possible to escape through dissociative trance states. These states grew more dominant as we continued the work, and Jodi would "trance out", as she called it, in sessions, lying on the couch drifting between associations, in a dream-like state, and often talking to me in a child's voice.

A pattern began to emerge between us that whenever Jodi took a step towards trusting me, she would follow up in the next session with an attack. This happened when there were reminders that we were becoming attached: for example, a break, or a missed session, or a feeling of connection.

We both survived Jodi's attacks. And I felt for Jodi an emerging sense of "going on being". I was careful to attune and respond to her levels of distress and fear, without coming any closer than that Jodi could bear.

It took this period of becoming "secure enough" in the relationship with me, and in the world, before Jodi was able to talk to me directly about the abuse in her family or about the ritual abuse. She began by talking to me about her father. He had sexually abused her from as far back as she could remember. He still sometimes came to her room at night to have sex with her. Jodi found herself unable to say no. At times Jodi could not find words to tell me what her father had done to her: in a child's voice she would start to try to speak, crying quietly, and would then make a scribbling movement with her hand as though to say, I need a pen, I need to write this. When she did write, it would just be words: rape, penis, mouth, bleeding. We sat together with tears in our eyes as she passed me a drawing of a child with a kitchen implement being pushed into her bottom and then later a knife. Jodi and I shared together this feeling of grief and sorrow for her child self, for how terrified she still was as she began to speak out about this. There was a feeling of deep closeness and connection in the session, and at the end Jodi smiled shakily and said thank you.

I had expected that there might be a backlash after this session, but had not anticipated the extent of it.

Jodi arrived at the next session and told me she had come to say goodbye, she could not come to therapy any more. She said she had also informed her drama school that she would not be coming back. She needed to get a job and get on her with her life. She had no idea why she had said the things she did last week—her father would never abuse her. She was a liar. She was wasting my time.

As Jodi spoke I was aware of another part of her being present: it was as though I could hear that part of her crying and crying, in terrible pain and despair. I responded to that part of Jodi. "Jodi, I can feel someone inside crying and crying as though they will never be able to stop. That person's heart is broken. I think we need to give her chance to speak."

Jodi shook her head, but I saw her eyes begin to fill with tears. "I can't tell you, I can't tell you," she said. For fifteen minutes we sat in silence, with tears pouring down Jodi's face, breathing slowly together. At one point, I broke the silence and said, "It's OK, just take your time. I'll be here for you, whatever it is." "I can't tell you because it's to do with you," she said. "It will hurt you." After more silence, and several attempts, Jodi was able to tell me that she had seen my cat in the garden on the way in to the session. She said she knew that if she came to see me again, she would have to kill my cat. She had an image in her head, of my cat split open, her insides taken out and displayed next to her. In the image, the blood was all over Jodi's hands. "I can smell the blood," she kept saying, "I can smell it and taste it in my mouth." As she said this, she went white and began to look nauseous. I could feel myself starting to feel faint in response, the vomit rising in my throat, and I was not certain I would be able to stop myself throwing up in the room. Jodi beat me to it, rushing out of her seat to the bathroom, saying, "I'm going to be sick." She arrived back in the room after being sick, pale and dazed. I asked her, "Jodi, when you were young, did you have any pets?" She nodded. "I had a rabbit. Then I had a kitten. And later a pet dog." What happened to them? She looked at me. "I don't know." "Perhaps someone inside knows," I suggested. "Why don't you ask?" She closed her eyes and when she opened them again, a small but lively voice said to me, "I know what happened to Jasmine, our rabbit. She was mine." I recognized this little one: I had met her before, and she had been a big help to Jodi and me in the therapy so far. "Hello Josie," I said. "Would you be able to tell me about Jasmine?" Josie told me that Jasmine was Jodi's pet when she was four years old, and that she had been given to Jodi by her grandmother as a special present. Josie looked after Jasmine and would play with her in the garden for hours. Then, one evening, she had arrived home from school and her mother had been cooking dinner. Jodi had asked what was for dinner but had been told to be quiet and to wash her hands ready for the meal. As Jodi had her first bites of the stew her mother had cooked, her father began to laugh. "Jasmine won't be playing with you much now," he had said. At first, Jodi has refused to believe it. She had shouted at her father, told him he was lying. She ran down to the hutch and found Jasmine missing. Her mother insisted she come back to the table. "You are going to finish every last mouthful on that plate," her mother had told her. Jodi sat there for hours, trying to swallow through her tears and through rising vomit. When she did not finish her plate before going to bed she was forced to eat the stew cold for breakfast the next morning.

I felt in shock as she told me this story, struggling to imagine how a child could bear this. But Josie said brightly, "But that wasn't so bad. It wasn't as bad as when we had to kill the kitten." A few years later, at the age of seven, Jodi had been allowed to keep a kitten, which had turned up as a stray in their garden. Jodi said the kitten was her best friend. When she wanted to escape her father's abuse and her mother's rages, she would hide in the garden shed with Kitty, playing or just falling asleep with Kitty curled up beside her or in her lap. One afternoon, her mother found her asleep in there with Kitty and told her to bring the cat into the house. She said that Jodi had been a bad girl. She had been telling lies. That her mother knew she had been thinking bad thoughts about her family: that she was angry with them, that she hated them. She said that Kitty would have to be punished: Jodi had been so bad, that she had caused Kitty to have to be hurt. Jodi had a choice. Either her mother would kill Kitty slowly, or Jodi could kill her quickly so that she would not feel too much pain. Jodi sobbed and begged her mother to hurt her instead of Kitty. But her mother said no: when Jodi was bad, it was the things that she cared about that would be punished. That was what happened if you were bad inside, and you loved something or someone. As Jodi's mother began to slowly torture Kitty, Jodi did break down and agree to kill Kitty. She sat in my consulting room as an adult, with tears pouring down her face, and said, "It broke my heart. It was like part of me died inside. I never felt the same again. I knew that I was bad deep down and that my badness would take everything and everyone away from me that I cared about."

We were able to understand from this why Jodi had been so afraid that our closeness in the previous session, and her disclosure of her father's abuse, would mean that she would have to hurt me in some way and why this had become focused on my cat. Over time, these fears were to re-emerge many times, and often precipitated a memory of being made to believe, programmed to believe, that if she grew attached to anyone other than specific cult members, she would lose them, and also that she would put them and herself in danger.

After this, Jodi and I had a period of intense closeness. At times, the intimacy in the sessions felt almost exhilarating. Warm, loving feelings were often present as she shyly shared her successes at drama school and allowed more and more of her people inside to come and meet me and spend time with me. Again, we were to face a backlash. Jodi came into the session one day and told me coldly that she was sick of my yucky, sickly, nicey-nice ways. That she knew what I was up to, and she knew what I was really after. I was sick and a pervert, just like everyone else. I was only pretending to care about her. I asked her where this had come from: she insisted it had not come from anywhere, she was just making sure I knew that I could not mess her about or play games with her. This went on for several sessions, as I tried to understand where this had come from and endeavoured to find out if anyone else in the system knew what had happened. Eventually, with much shame, an adult in her system explained that her family and "they"—she did not specify who "they" were at this stage—had told her that I was only being nice to her to get her to have sex with me, that in the end, everybody wanted something, and that was clearly what I wanted.

She told me that she had believed this because some people inside, particularly the children, did not understand about sex. They did not understand that there were relationships where two people were not supposed to have sex. This led to her describing to me how father would take her to see men as a child, his friends or other family members, and tell her to have sex with them. "Sometimes they paid him." It then also enabled her to tell me more about her relationship with her mother.

Jodi and her mother had often slept in the same bed since Jodi was a child and this had stopped only recently, at Jodi's instigation. "She taught me how to give her orgasms when I was just little. She used to get me to look at porn sometimes too, to show me what to do. It made me feel special to her. Like we had a special relationship that no one could ever break into. She always told me that we were joined and that she could read my mind. She would do games and experiments with me to prove she could read it. She told me I belonged to her, I was part of her, that the two of us would be together in the afterlife, too. That there would never be anyone else in my life who could know me and love me like she did, because I had come from inside her and I belonged inside her."

As we talked more about Jodi's mother and her hold over Jodi, it became clear that her mother had been able to manipulate Jodi's terrible fear of not being in proximity to her, of needing her presence, alongside Jodi's enormous sense of loyalty to her mother. Jodi's attachment to her mother had been fused with training—training which was really torture—which taught Jodi to believe that her mother had power over her life and death and controlled her internal world. This training had also heightened Jodi's attachment to her mother.

Jodi recalled incidents from early in her childhood, in which her mother would put her in life and death situations and then seemingly rescue her from them, just in time. On one occasion, her mother had locked her in a trunk and shut her in the cellar where, she said, no one would hear Jodi if she screamed. In the trunk with Jodi, she put insects, including maggots, of which Jodi was particularly frightened. Jodi remembers the panic and the terror, the feelings of suffocation and the certainty she would die. Gradually, she said, she gave up—just found herself drifting in a dissociated space, aware she could barely breathe any longer. At that point, in Jodi's memory, her mother opened the trunk and pulled her out, sobbing, asking Jodi how she had ended up being locked in trunk, telling Jodi she loved her desperately and no matter where Jodi got lost, she would always find her. However bad things got for Jodi, she would always save her.

In Trauma and Recovery, Judith Herman describes the process of "pair bonding" between victim and perpetrator. She explains,

> This is the traumatic bonding that occurs in hostages and survivors of abuse who come to view their captors as saviours. . . . The repeated experience of terror and reprieve, especially within the isolated context of a love relationship, may result in a feeling of intense, almost worshipful dependence upon an all-powerful godlike authority. Some victims speak of entering a kind of exclusive, almost delusional world, embracing the grandiose belief > system of the perpetrator and voluntarily suppressing their own doubts as a proof of loyalty and submission. Similar experiences are regularly reported by people who have been inducted into totalitarian religious cults. [1992, p. 92]

We see here that Satanist cults are able to manipulate these psychic susceptibilities as a result of bonding through extreme trauma, and draw the victim in to wider submission and loyalty to the group's belief system.

Our attachment system is most activated when we are in danger, and the intensity of being rescued from these near-death experiences reinforced the desperate clinging nature of Jodi's attachment to her mother. She literally believed that her continued survival depended on proximity to her mother, and that leaving home, leaving her, would mean death. Jodi described how her mother had reinforced this childhood magical thinking through drawing Jodi in to a supernatural belief system, a form of witchcraft through which her mother was able to make Jodi believe that shat she had claimed her soul and that terrible death and eternal torment would result if she tried to leave her mother. "She possessed my soul through a spell. The punishment would be eternal if I left her."

At this stage, Jodi began to talk more about the involvement of the wider cult in her life. She started to paint in sessions when she could not find words for what had happened to her at the hands of other cult members, and with the involvement of her parents. This set of paintings and drawings brought a new atmosphere to the room—chilling, sinister, full of terror and sadism. There were paintings of Jodi's mother gagging her, holding a knife to her feet, threatening to cut them off, pictures of blood, axes, knives, scissors, blindfolds, electroshocks, being hung upside down, strangled, and having her stomach cut open. As Jodi free-associated on this, she was able to communicate with the people inside who had drawn the pictures, and through them we learned more about the programmes of torture she had gone through to enforce her loyalty to the cult. During this period, in my notes I wrote, "nausea, blood, semen, vomit, sweat: the room reeks of them. Like it's pouring down the walls".

From early in her childhood, Jodi had been encouraged to make particular friendships with adults or other children in the cult. These were carefully fostered, as with her earlier relationships with her pets, with the clear intention of demonstrating to Jodi that the cult had control over the making and breaking of her attachment bonds. Jodi described how, from an early age, her attachments to other children were used to manipulate her into doing things for the cult that she otherwise resisted doing. She had memories of being forced to watch one of her friends being abused, and being told that unless she carried out an act she shrank from, such as killing an animal, or abusing another child, the abuse of her friend would continue, or they would be tortured. At times, she would be told that unless she tortured her friend, they would be killed. Having seen these people kill, Jodi said she absolutely believed they would make good their threats. She believed them capable of anything. Jodi's most painful memories at this time involved her younger brother, who was now schizophrenic. Jodi said, "He was littler than me, and I was always so frightened for him—he never seemed to do things right, he was always getting punished. They used to make me hurt him—they would say, 'we're going to cut out his guts unless you hurt him or unless you abuse him'. Sometimes I refused, but then they would torture him and make me watch and I would beg them to stop. Then I had to do what they told me. Every time I look at him now, I know it's my fault that he's so ill, that he keeps breaking down. I should have found a way to protect him or to get him out of there. I was older than him, he depended on me."

Unsurprisingly, Jodi's relationship with me created enormous conflict inside her. I was seen as a threatening force. Some people inside feared I was luring Jodi in to a trap, but more people felt I was dangerous because I was threatening her attachment to her mother. There were particular people inside who had been created by her mother and by the cult, who believed it was their role to ensure Jodi's loyalty to her mother at all costs: these were programmed alters, who tried desperately to sabotage Jodi's relationship with me. Others inside felt that even if she survived separating from her mother, internally she would be alone forever. Only the others in the cult could understand her, would not reject her for doing the things she had done. They knew she was special and powerful, and also would not be disgusted by her.

All cults instil these feelings in their members, but it is particularly effective in ritual abuse, because the sense of being other and separate is brought about through breaking the very boundaries and taboos of what it means to be human. Cannibalism, drinking blood, eating and drinking faeces and urine, committing incest and murder—these acts contravene what anthropologists would describe to us as the boundaries that cultures use to define being human and being a member of human society. Jodi did not only feel she was different from other people, but that she would not even be included or accepted as a member of human society. This meant that the cult became the only society of which she could be part.

None the less, through our regular sessions and her experience of being attuned to, Jodi was beginning to feel as if she might be able to belong to another world, to this world. The work we had done to help her regulate her core self functions was enabling her to participate in life at college. Talking about her mother's abuse of her enabled Jodi to begin to separate from her mother. She was also working part-time to achieve some financial independence for the first time. She was making friends and she was doing well in her classes. She rarely lost time now, and this gave her a sense of being part of the world that she had never had before.

What was not clear to us was how safe Jodi was from cult abuse in the present. The fact that Jodi was not losing much time seemed hopeful. But we began to receive communications from the others inside that she still was not safe. For the first time, Jodi announced that she was going to leave home. The next phase of the therapy was a battle for Jodi to make this happen.

In November, after months of tumultuous sessions and sadistic attacks on me and the therapy, Jodi moved out. Internally, she was then immediately flooded by persecutory cult voices: lying to her, seductive, tormenting her constantly, telling her she had to be punished. Jodi was making threats to go back, and saying she could not break contact.

As Judith Herman describes, > the sense that the perpetrator is still present, even after liberation, signifies a major constellation in the victim's relational world. The enforced relationship during captivity, becomes part of the victim's inner life. . . . In the case of sexual, domestic and religious cult prisoners, this continued relationship may take a more ambivalent form: the victim may continue to fear her former captor and to > expect that he will eventually hunt her down, but she may also feel empty, confused and worthless without him. [1992, p. 91]

It felt as if Jodi was stuck at this point forever. It was only possible for a shift to occur through an enactment in the transference–countertransference relationship. I was by this point feeling devoured, what Valerie Sinason calls the cannibalistic countertransference; Jodi's persecution and abuse in the sessions and constant pushing of boundaries between sessions were making me feel bullied, controlled, and victimized. I realized that I had to liberate myself from Jodi's internal abusers: that anything else would lock us into a sado-masochistic re-enactment, a home from home for Jodi where relationships were again as they were in the cult, only this time I was the victim. I told Jodi I felt unable to continue the work unless the bullying stopped and the constant attacks on me and the therapy stopped; I found my subjectivity, and stood up to her persecutors. She knew I meant it. Having experienced me doing this enabled Jodi to do it, too. She broke contact with her family and the cult.

This was then followed by changes as a result of a new strategy inside to co-operate and negotiate—the abusers were no longer in control inside or out.

The atmosphere in the sessions was often one of excitement, intimacy, and intense emotion. This raised Jodi's fear of sexuality and an intense fear of loving me. Having love in her life at all felt like an acceptance that she deserved love, which, in turn, meant that she was ceasing to receive the punishment she felt she required; it was betraying her loyalty to the cult and to her mother, and, more significantly, betraying those she had been involved in abusing or killing.

Jodi reached the point where she knew inside herself that she had to try to work through the guilt and self-hate about being made to be a perpetrator. When Jodi had reached puberty, as with all female ritual abuse survivors, she was forced to kill her baby, whose birth had been prematurely induced by the cult doctor. Did Jodi remember being pregnant? She described holding the baby in her arms for a few moments after the birth, just before the killing. As a thirteen-year-old, powerless to prevent the killing, she made a bargain with herself. She and the baby would stay frozen in the moment forever. Although she could not save her baby, in order to deal with her remorse she swore to herself that she would love the child forever and never share that love with anyone else or feel it again: in that way, she could make the baby's short life have a meaning. This meant that in therapy she fought and battled against the growing loving feelings for me, and repeatedly attacked the relationship, as it felt like a profound betrayal and abandonment of her baby.

Becoming conscious of this horrific event enabled Jodi to connect with the person inside, frozen in time, still holding the baby. A great deal of negotiation and communication went on inside, until it was agreed internally that it was time to let the baby inside be taken to heaven to be with God. We planned carefully for the session in which this was to happen. Jodi brought some flowers for the baby, and some bulbs for us to plant outside, to mark her loss. Inside, some of her people came and put their arms around the Jodi who was still holding the baby. They gently held her, while they took the baby from her. Tears were pouring down Jodi's face. "It's time now," she said. They took the baby to a bridge, which passed outside of the system, into another world outside of her. Jodi carefully laid the baby on a hillside filled with flowers on the other side of the bridge. Then the little group said goodbye, and walked back together over the bridge, holding up the part of her that had been frozen but who was now collapsing under the weight of the tears, the pain of knowing that her baby was gone, and this loss could never be undone.

This proved to be a turning point for Jodi in allowing herself to accept that the past happened and can never be changed. She has to live in the present, however much pain there has been. It was time for a life outside the cult.

There was, however, one final and fundamental conflict around attachment still to be faced. Jodi was finally able to let her dead baby go, but her brother was very much alive. He was still living at home, and Jodi did not know the extent of his continued involvement with the cult. As her brother's birthday approached, we noticed a dramatic deterioration in Jodi's state. She began damaging the relationships and people in her life and things that mattered to her again. She even lost some time again, coming to and finding she had cut herself. She dreamed about a birthday cake and we were able to make the connection with her brother. As Jodi began to face her profound feelings of survivor guilt, for being able to leave when he could not, at times she felt despair. It began to feel that we were stuck again: she could not believe that it would ever be all right for her to have her freedom and her life, knowing that she had left him behind. She felt that doing this would mean that the cult was right: she was not human, inside she was just selfish, and she had proved it time and again when she harmed others to save herself.

She began to feel drawn back to contacting the family. Perhaps she could prove that she did care about someone else more than herself. In desperation, I reviewed my learning about survivor guilt and read everything I could lay my hands on to try to understand what might help Jodi. What did feel clear to me was that she needed some sense of not being alone with this, of belonging to a community of other trauma survivors who could assure her that it did not rob her of humanity to live and move on. She also needed to find a way to understand that although she wanted to save her brother, she could not. Only he could find his way out, and that might never happen.

In my reading, I came across Brian Keenan's An Evil Cradling, with which I started this paper. During his four years in captivity, Brian Keenan was held in a cell with journalist John McCarthy. He recognized that it was this relationship with John that enabled him to survive and to hold on to his sanity.

He feels he owes his life to John, and vice versa. Then the day comes when he is told he is going to be released. This means leaving John behind. He is left with the dilemma of refusing his freedom, or staying behind in captivity with John. Keenan describes his internal battle over this, and his eventual realization that to choose to remain in captivity would be a betrayal of his relationship with John and would diminish what they had fought for together.

He writes,

> I remember every moment of my time alone, my time with John and with those other captives. And I remember how we first met, our relationship, the kinds of needs I had of John and he of me. And how we sought always to give and take, always thinking of the other. And as I review it all, all that wonder, I see his face stare in mine. I had watched this man grow. And I know that if in my defiance I walk back in to that room and have myself chained, refusing > to go home, I will have diminished our relationship. I cannot do this. I know that in going free I will free him. I know that the deep bond our captivity has given us will be shattered if I return. Our respect for each other demands of each that we take our freedom when it comes. [1993, p. 292]

When Jodi read these words, something began to release inside her. She could understand why Brian Keenan had made the choice that he had. She did not feel he was a bad person for leaving John behind. She wept many tears, and wrote her brother long letters she could never send, but she resolved in herself that she had to find a way to say goodbye to him. She visited a park they had played in as children and read out loud Brian Keenan's words and a poem she had written to say goodbye to her brother. She brought me the poem afterwards and asked me to keep it. "You know, in a way no one else could, what it means to me to leave him. You know I loved him. Despite everything they did to try to stop me from believing I was capable of loving anyone. You know I am capable of love. You know this because you know I feel love for you."

Jodi was right. They were not able to destroy her capacity to love, or her connection to it. They manipulated her need for attachment, but, ultimately, it was her ability to attach and her ability to build a new working model of attachment that enabled her to escape them. Through our relationship, Jodi has internalized a sense of being loveable, of being able to relate, of being able to function in this world. We worked together for eight years; five years has passed since then. Jodi now has a well-paid, successful job in theatre, friendships, and a loving long-term relationship with a partner. I want to finish with a quote from a letter I received from Jodi after her therapy ended.

> We're finding it a challenge to become part of normal life now outside of the cult: no therapy, and without constant emergencies, adrenaline, urgency. But I'm also aware I'm ready for civilian life. I'm being demobbed. Sometimes the fighters from the past get worried they won't be wanted anymore or needed. A bit like a Mad-Eye Moody in Harry Potter: a bit OTT, too suspicious, spotting dark wizards everywhere. But he's also someone who sees unpleasant truths that other people would rather not see. So he's important, and those people in me are important. They've been through so much. They deserve to be part of my life in this world now.

I think of you often, and I know you will be there for me if I need you. I have such strong feelings of love for people I'm close to: every time I'm glad to see someone, or I hug someone, or I make love with my partner, I know somewhere deep inside that I survived what they did to me. I don't treat people the way they did. I would never make that choice. It makes me feel whole.

And you know, often now, I can actually FEEL that it's all me, and all of me is here, us together. And it's my life now, no one else's. All the supernatural stuff is gone, and rain is just rain and not acid; and lightening is just a natural phenomenon and not an attack or electric shock torture. And I am me. In real time.

CHAPTER THREE

Torture-based mind control: psychological mechanisms and psychotherapeutic approaches to overcoming mind control

Ellen P. Lacter

> "Can we get control of an individual to the point where he will do our bidding against his will and even against such fundamental laws of nature such as self-preservation?"
>
> (CIA Document, Project ARTICHOKE, MORI ID 144686, 1952)

Psychological mechanisms

My goal in this chapter is to analyse through established psychological principles how torture-based mind control programming is installed and exerts continued control over victims.

It is painfully humbling to study mind control. The secrets of how it "works" are buried deeply in the minds of survivors whose mental registration of the process was originally impaired by torture, drugs, smoke and mirrors, and dissociative processes, both defensive and effected by abuser manipulation, and whose capacity to later recall and reveal this trauma is limited by terror, abuser subterfuge, and the capacity of the therapist to bear witness to such calculated abuse. Further complicating this study is the variation in methods and forms of mind control reported by survivors.

I will present patterns I have observed for further exploration. My primary data is my work with survivor clients, depth interviews of other survivors, including many psychologist-survivors, interviews with colleagues treating survivors, and written accounts by survivors, most of whom I have interviewed and found credible. I am particularly indebted to Dr Hans Ulrich Gresch, German psychologist, cold war mind control survivor, and author of a book on mind control (Gresch, 2010), for his generous correspondence with me on his experiences as a victim and his insights into mind control as a scholar.

Working definition of torture-based mind control

I define torture-based mind control as the systematic application of (1) acute torture, including pain, terror, drugs, electroshock, sensory deprivation, oxygen deprivation, cold, heat, spinning, brain stimulation, and near-death, and (2), conditioning, including coercive hypnosis, directives, illusions (staged tricks, film, stories), spiritual threats, manipulation of attachment needs, and classical, operant, and fear conditioning, to coerce victims to form altered mental states, including (a) hyper-attentive blank slate (tabula rasa) mental states that arise spontaneously in response to perceived threat to physical survival, and are completely attuned to external stimuli, ready to do whatever is needed to survive; (b) self-states that spontaneously form in response to threat to psychic survival, that is, levels of mental anguish that exceed the tolerance of all previously existing ego states, and that are mentally registered apart (dissociated) from previously existing ego-states; (c) ego-states that develop more gradually through conditioning, all three of which are subjected to "programmer" strategies to define, control, and "install" within them perceptions, beliefs, fear, pain, directives, information, triggers, and behaviours, to force victims to do, feel, think, and perceive things for the purposes of the programmer, including execution of acts that violate the victims' volition, principles, and instinct for self-preservation, and to cause ego-states that usually have executive control of mental functions (the host, front, or apparently normal personality) to have no conscious memory for the torture, conditioning, programming, controlled ego-states, or executed programmed behaviours. (Note: In the field of "torture-based mind-control", this term is generally synonymous with "torture-based" or "trauma-based", followed by "mind control programming" or "programming".)

My proposed definition refers to both self-states and ego-states. Self-state is the broader term, including self-states that have minimal sense of self or self-agency, such as torture-induced fragmentary self-states that register pain and terror internally, largely separate from higher cognitive processing and with a bare sense of "me". Ego-state refers to a self-state with significant self-identification and self-agency, often referred to as an alter, dissociated identity or personality in the literature on dissociative identity disorder (DID).

The term "host" refers to the ego-state that is usually experienced as "me", that usually spends the most time in executive control of mental functions and behaviour, and that is more aware of benign circumstances than past or present trauma. Some individuals have more than one host or "front" ego-state. In the literature on dissociative disorders, the term "host" is also often referred to as the apparently normal personality (ANP) (van der Hart, Nijenhuis, & Steele, 2006).

The term "executive control" refers to the implementation of mental functions, otherwise known as "executive functions", that enable goal-directed thought and behaviour, including self-awareness, motivation, volition, initiation, planning, purposive action, and self-regulation, which relies on monitoring, shifting, inhibiting, and self-correcting, functions primarily attributed to the frontal lobes, specifically the prefrontal cortex (Lezak, 1995).

Torture-based mind control is practised by individuals and groups who seek to maximally control and exploit others, particularly children. Included are practitioners of abusive religious rituals (e.g., Satanism and abusive witchcraft), organized crimes against children (child pornography, prostitution, and trafficking), and groups with political, military, and espionage agendas.

Survivors commonly report torture using electroshock, spinning, isolation, confinement (cages, coffins, etc.), sexual abuse, beatings (especially to the head), hanging or pulling with ropes and chains, suffocation, drowning, being held over fire, blinding or flashing light, forced ingestion of blood, urine, faeces, flesh, etc., hunger, thirst, sleep deprivation, sensory deprivation, submersion in ice water, drugs to induce paralysis, pain, confusion, amnesia, etc., application of snakes, spiders, maggots, rats, etc., and being forced to perform or witness abuse, torture and sacrifice of people and animals.

Mind control phenomena reported by survivors

Survivor accounts are the primary source material on torture-based mind control. Critics say this is untrustworthy data. However, torture is criminal internationally, and its effects cannot be directly studied.

Clinicians assess the reliability of survivor accounts based on narrative coherence, goodness of fit between symptoms and reported history, diagnosis of a trauma disorder, differential diagnosis (Lacter & Lehman, 2008), and from multiple sources of corroboration from other survivors.

I have reviewed three lengthy written narratives about torture-based mind control:

1. Svali (pseudonym): How the cult programs people (1996);
2. Trish Fotheringham: Patterns in mind-control: a first person account (2008) (Fotheringham reports not having read any other survivor accounts when she wrote her chapter);
3. Anonymous survivor: Kabbalah-training (provided by a therapist colleague, 2008).

Although these three accounts are very different, each includes abuser aptitude testing of newborns, training infants to dissociate, bonding infants to trainers, destroying all sources of comfort, torture to induce blank-slate self-states (Fotheringham described this in interviews, not in her chapter), developing and categorizing self-states by colour, spinning torture, all-seeing eyes, suicide programming, programming using illusions such as film, and staged dramas to create internal landscapes (or inner worlds).

Some of the strongest corroborative evidence for mind control is a 2007 internet survey in which 1471 people from at least forty countries responded as survivors to the Extreme Abuse Survey (EAS) (Becker, Karriker, Overkamp, & Rutz, 2007).

The following list of reported mind control phenomena incorporates a sampling of the EAS findings.

1. Torture to induce the formation of receptive/programmable dissociated self-states. Of 1012 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "My perpetrator(s) deliberately created/programmed dissociative states of mind (such as alters, personalities, ego-states) in me," 640 (63%) said "Yes."
2. Torture to influence the host with no conscious awareness. The host experiences unexplained behavioural compulsions to perform particular behaviours, and programmed self-states take executive control to follow programmed directives, unbeknown to the host.
3. The perception of "structures", that is, mental representations of objects, usually inanimate, in the body or internal landscape in the mind. Often-reported structures include buildings, walls, containers, grids, computers, and devices of torture. Structures often serve organizational purposes for programmers, such as containing groups of self-states that serve particular functions, storing files of information, serving as barriers (walls, caps, seals) to separate groups of self-states, and hiding deeper levels of programming and structures. Dissociated self-states perceive themselves as trapped behind, within, or attached to structures, often reliving the pain, suffocation, electroshock, etc., used to "install" the structure.
4. Perceived explosive devices, electroshock wires and devices, and vials capable of releasing toxins and drugs, in the body of specific self-states, or in the internal landscape, to control behaviour.
5. Perceived internal monitoring devices to watch or "read" and transmit thoughts, e.g., all-seeing eyes, microphones, and microchips.
6. The perception of internal programmers, abusers, demons, and human spirits, to watch and control the victim. Of 996 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "Perpetrators have on at least one occasion made me believe that external entities/spirits/demons had taken over my body," 530 (53%) said "Yes."

7. Novel torture and near-death torture, including anoxia, brachycardia, and cardiac arrest due to suffocation, electrocution, freezing, drowning, etc., to induce tabula rasa programmable states to form. Of 1109 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "Near drowning experience caused by perpetrators," 565 (51%) said "Yes."
8. Torture, especially electroshock, to "anchor" (set deeply) programming in the unconscious mind. Of 1119 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "My memories of extreme abuse include electroshock" 558 (50%) said "Yes."
9. Programming beginning in the first two, three, or four years of life serving as a foundation for later programming. Of 975 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "I was subjected to government-sponsored mind control experimentation at birth through 2 years," 139 (14%) said "Yes."
10. Programming to punish the victim when any self-state threatens to disobey abuser directives, especially to never remember or disclose their abuse, including flooding the victim with anxiety, pain, spinning or drugged sensations, illness, self-harm, and suicidality. Some survivors develop an awareness that these experiences are not their own reactions, but originate in programming. Of 997 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "I have experienced self-destruct programming installed in the event I began to remember the programming", 565 (57%%) said "Yes."
11. Self-states programmed to perform particular roles, such as soldier, courier, assassin, cult leader, etc., and skills, such as speaking a foreign language, flying an aircraft, remote-viewing, and sexual behaviour. On the EAS, 175 respondents reported mind control programming through which they were trained to become assassins and 203 respondents reported mind control programming designed to develop psychic abilities.
12. Self-states programmed as tape-recorders and computers to store information.
13. Self-states programmed to report in to handlers by phone and to assure ongoing abuser-contact.
14. Anti-therapy programming causing victims to feel "stuck", unable to speak, hear, or remain awake, to create chaos, to be acutely suicidal, and to disbelieve all memories. Of 1097 EAS respondents who replied to the item about having suicidal thoughts immediately before traumatic memories surface, 737 (68%) said "Yes."

15. Programmed stimuli, for example, hand signals, words, telephone rings or tones, that trigger self-states to experience fear or to perform behaviours unbeknown to the host.
16. Programme codes to access self-states, to install, reset or activate programmes, to turn on back-up (fail-safe) programmes, to erase (remove) programmes, to "set off" explosive devices and to release toxins. Of 967 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "One or more of my alters had access codes", 332 (34%) said "Yes."

Clinical observations of mind control phenomena in victims

I have observed the following indicators of torture-based mind control:

1. Clients suddenly switch, in response to internal or external cues, to automaton-like self-states, with stiff posture, glazed-over eyes, inability to hear or respond, then begin to walk or drive to a phone or destination, with full amnesia in the host for the time in that state. Of 963 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "I have (or have had) at least one robot alter", 270 (28%) said "Yes."
2. Four clients reported the identical code to "remove" the same kind of programme, including about ten characters (details omitted for security and confidentiality) with the same prefix or suffix with spelling variations. This code is not in books or on the internet. These people lived in distant regions. I also observed individuals report very slight variations of a code for another kind of programme.
3. Proper removal codes "disappear" a structure; slightly incorrect codes fail. I have witnessed clients experience enormous relief when a proper removal code caused a structure to "vanish".
4. Identical abuser names and titles, not in books or the internet, reported by geographically distant survivors.

5. I have observed injuries, such as large scars, electroshock burns, and dislocated limbs that I believe were not self-inflicted, and that were consistent with reported programming torture.
6. When clients recall and work to resolve torture-based mind control, they regularly experience acute fear, suicidality, urges to self-harm, dizziness, sleepiness, feeling drugged, jerking as if being electro-shocked, urges to stop therapy, and robotic-like statements of "I must have made it all up," or "I want to go home" (meaning to return to the abusers).
7. Strong fear and startle responses to the phone ringing and extreme sensitivity to indoor lights.
8. Great consistency in reports of programming over time. Present recollections match rediscovered journal-writing, art, sand trays, etc., from as many as ten years earlier.
9. Clients experience marked symptom relief as programming is made conscious and resolved.

Historical evidence

In 1953, Allen Dulles, then director of the USA Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), named Dr Sidney Gottlieb to direct the CIA's MKULTRA programme, which included experiments conducted by psychiatrists to create amnesia, new dissociated identities, new memories, and responses to hypnotic access codes. In 1972, then-CIA director Richard Helms and Gottlieb ordered the destruction of all MKULTRA records. A clerical error spared seven boxes, containing 1738 documents, over 17,000 pages. This archive was declassified through a Freedom of Information Act Request in 1977, though the names of most people, universities, and hospitals are redacted. The CIA assigned each document a number preceded by "MORI", for "Management of Officially Released Information", the CIA's automated electronic system at the time of document release. These documents, to be referenced throughout this chapter, are accessible on the Internet (see: http://abuse-of-power.org/modules/content/index.php?id=31). The United States Senate held a hearing exposing the abuses of MKULTRA, entitled "Project MKULTRA, the CIA's program of research into behavioral modification" (1977).

Of 1000 EAS respondents who replied to the item: "Secret government-sponsored mind control experiments were performed on me as a child", 257 (26%) said "Yes," and 219 of those 257 remembered seeing perpetrators wearing white doctors' coats. Of 451 respondents to the Professional Extreme Abuse Survey, seventy-one professional helpers from at least six countries reported work with survivors reporting government mind control experimentation.

Psychological mechanisms underlying programme installation and function

What psychological capacities and mechanisms do programmers manipulate to effect mind control?

The dissociative disorders field has established that DID is associated with chronic, intense, early abuse, often involving a combination of physical, sexual, and emotional abuse, frequently including profound neglect, family violence, and a generally chaotic home environment (Chu, Frey, Ganzel, & Matthews, 1999; Draijer & Langeland, 1999; Ogawa, Sroufe, Weinfield, Carlson, & Egeland, 1997; Putnam, 1997; Pynoos, Steinberg, & Goenjian, 1996; Ross, 1995; van der Kolk, McFarlane, & Weisaeth, 1996). However, responses to acute torture are very different from responses to chronic trauma.

It is also well known that amnestic barriers separate the experience of trauma-bearing self-states, also known as "emotional parts" (EPs), from the awareness of the host (ANP) (Nijenhuis & den Boer, 2007). But how does this inform us on how programmed self-states can effect specific emotional and behavioural responses in the host in mind control victims? Furthermore, what psychological mechanisms allow programmers to "install" directives, codes, structures, harm-producing devices, internal programmers, malevolent entities, and files of information in their victims? How can the mind accurately register such complex information during mental states impeded by torture? How can programming be achieved in the first few years of life? Might torture somehow enhance the mind–brain's capacity to encode information and store it in pristine form?

Incorporating current knowledge on trauma and dissociation, I will explore some of the psychological processes that begin to answer these questions. Some of these mechanisms are well evidenced and some are more theoretical and hypothetical.

Dissociation: use of torture to induce and exploit dissociative processes

A synthesis of survivor accounts suggests that the central psychological mechanism that permits mind control programming to be effected is that extreme torture can force a victim's psyche to form new, readily programmable self-states, separated from the front personality by programmed amnestic barriers, that can be exploited to "hold" and "hide" directives, skills, and information. The conditions that appear to most reliably yield new programmable states are (1) application of torture in the preschool years or to already dissociation-prone individuals, and (2) application of forms of torture that victims have not yet learned to endure, such as novel or extremely prolonged torture.

Some of these self-states are developed into ego states that have the capacity for executive functions, often beginning with the assignment of a name and specific function, followed by extensive conditioning to (1) develop desired skills, (2) learn cues to access and control the ego state, and (3) develop barriers to keep all memory of this abuse from the host. Other induced dissociative states are used for more internal functions, such as holding pain, terror, information, and representations of structures to serve purposes in the inner world.

Is this the stuff of science fiction? Historical and psychological evidence demonstrate otherwise.

USA mind control projects

Declassified CIA documents provide a historical record of MK-ULTRA projects that manipulated amnestic and dissociative states.

MORI 017395 states that Subproject 136 (1961) would use drugs and hypnosis to induce and control dissociative states, including multiple personality disorder, and would use "psychological tricks", reward, punishment, and electroshock to control behaviour, including that of children.

MORI 090527 (1951) http://abuse-of-power.org/modules/content/index.php?id=31http://michael-robinett.com/declass/c000.htm details an experiment that successfully placed two girls in "very deep trance", and used post-hypnotic coded words to make them carry and activate a bomb, followed by instructions for absolute amnesia.

Gresch (personal communication, 2010) reports that he and other children were programmed to be suicide bombers in the 1960s in what was probably a NATO project (including the CIA) to defend West Germany against the Warsaw Pact with tactical nuclear weapons, including portable "Special Atomic Demolition Munitions" (never actually deployed). Gresch reports that the children were programmed to lie in wait in foxholes, ready to detonate these "mini-nukes" against Soviet tanks that were to be manoeuvred into "killing zones".

MORI 190713 (1955), "Hypnotism and Covert Operations", discusses placing the "conscious mind in a state of suspended animation" to make subjects "have amnesia both for the fact of having been hypnotized and the origin of whatever new idea or impetus to action has been implanted in his unconscious mind".

In an article in the Providence Evening Bulletin of 13 May 1968, George Estabrook, described as a former consultant for the FBI and CIA, is quoted as stating, "the key to creating an effective spy or assassin rests in splitting a man's personality, or creating multipersonality" (Ross, 2000, p. 162).

Tien

Psychiatrist H. C. Tien developed electrolytic or electricity/love therapy (ELT) in the early 1970s (Tien, 1974). Tien discovered that torture, particularly electroshock, combined with directives, can "erase" a patient's original identity, beliefs, and name, and replace these with an identity, beliefs, and name chosen by the "therapist", congruent with the process of torture-based mind control.

Cameron

In the 1950s, Ewen Cameron, MD, of Allan Memorial Institute at McGill University in Montreal "treated" non-consenting patients, most probably diagnosed with schizophrenia, in what inarguably amounted to torture. Between 1957 and 1960, MKULTRA funded this research (Weinstein, 1988).

Cameron's treatment had two phases. In the "depatterning" phase, for fifteen to thirty days (sixty-five days in some cases), patients were administered massive doses of LSD and electroshock, usually combined with prolonged, drug-induced sleep, to ultimately induce a "tabula rasa" state and "complete amnesia" for one's life (Cleghorn, 1990; Marks, 1979; McGonigle, 1999). The "psychic driving" phase followed, sixteen hours a day for several weeks. Patients were forced to listen to endless loop taped descriptions of their painful past and inadequacies, sometimes accompanied by shocking their legs to intensify the negative effect, followed by, for two to five weeks, listening to tapes describing how they wanted to get well and the behaviours to facilitate this, such as becoming self-assertive (an interesting irony) (Marks, 1979).

Harvey Weinstein (1988), psychiatrist and son of a victim, aptly describes Cameron's work as "a wholesale attempt to erase minds and reprogramme" subjects (p. 147), assisted by MKULTRA.

In both Cameron's "treatment" and in mind control, torture, primarily electroshock, is applied to induce a tabula rasa state, followed by attempts to develop a brand-new persona.

Use of electricity to modify soldiers' behaviour in the First World War

Electroshock was used by military psychiatry to eradicate unwanted behaviour in soldiers since at least the First World War. The goal was to override soldiers' "weakness", such as "hysterical pseudo-paralysis", to get them back to the front (Fassin, Rechtman, & Gomme). Noteworthy were French neurologist, Clovis Vincent, who "boasted of regularly obtaining rapid results after what he termed a 'merciless struggle' between the patient and doctor" (ibid., p. 48), and German physician Fritz Kaufmann; his "Kaufmann cure" involved application of powerful alternating currents to paralysed limbs (Rejali, 2009, p. 136).

Austrian psychiatrist Wilhelm Neutra (1920), treated soldiers with "fiercely painful faradic [electric] currents" in 1914, and claimed that over 100 psychiatrists applied these methods since the beginning of the Great War.

Neutra reasoned that war hysteria is a subconscious conflict between the instinct of self-preservation and patriotism or morale. He believed that if hysterical behaviour becomes associated with pain produced by the electroshock, the subconscious is going to search for a better solution.

The same basic psychological mechanism is used in much mind control. The dissociated fear of torture is greater than the fear of executing the self-endangering behaviour desired by the programmer.

Although we may never have evidence of torture-based mind control directly evolving from military electroshock treatments, I believe the likelihood is high.

Pavlov

Ivan Pavlov is most famous for his discovery of classical conditioning based on research with dogs. Pavlov presented a warning signal (the conditioned stimulus), such as a bell, and shortly after (e.g., five seconds), gave the dogs an unconditioned stimulus (such as food). The warning signal then produces a conditioned reflex, such as "food excitation" (e.g., salivation).

Lesser-known is that Pavlov also used electroshock as a warning stimulus. We now understand this as a form of fear conditioning, the basis for kinds of mind control that rely on victim responses of fear and pain to programmed external and internal cues (discussed later).

Still less known is that Pavlov also studied the effects of overwhelming stress on the dogs' prior conditioning (Pavlov, 1941; Sargant, 1957).

In the Leningrad flood of 1924, water seeped under the laboratory door and Pavlov's dogs nearly drowned, swimming in "terror with heads at the tops of their cages" (Sargant, 1957, p. 17). Many lost all prior conditioning. Pavlov described the dogs as dissociating cortical and subcortical mental activity, and being in a state of hypnosis, similar to some human "mental disease". Pavlov surmised that in severe trauma, "the brain might be wiped almost clean, at least temporarily, of all the conditioned behavior patterns recently implanted in it" (Sargant, 1957, pp. 16–17). With months of patient work, Pavlov reconditioned most dogs. Then he let a trickle of water run under the laboratory door and the dogs all panicked and were re-traumatized, again losing all prior learning.

Pavlov's observations parallel survivors' reports of tabula rasa states forming in mind-control torture: all prior learning is lost, "wiped clean", and a trauma trigger reactivates the trauma state.

Sargant

British psychiatrist William Sargant is probably best known for his work on "acute war neurosis" ("battle fatigue", "shell shock") with Second World War soldiers (1957). In addition, he directly studied the effects of overwhelming stress on humans, as Pavlov did with dogs.

Sargant compared "war neuroses" to Pavlov's "experimental neuroses" in dogs. He observed stress-induced "states of greatly increased suggestibility" in combat soldiers (ibid., pp. 24–46), as well as in people who had undergone prolonged emotional and physiological stress in sudden religious conversion and political/ideological brainwashing.

Sargant claimed that the immediate effect of severe stress in humans and animals is "usually to impair judgement and increase suggestibility" (ibid., p. 82). He imposed severe stress on patients so that "some of the new abnormal patterns may disperse, and the healthier ones can return or be implanted afresh in the brain", much like Cameron. Sargant also applied similar stressors, including states of fear and anger, insulin shock, electroshock, and prolonged drug-induced sleep, up to fourteen or fifteen days, in a "sleep treatment ward" (Freeman, 1987).

Sargant and Cameron both had espionage ties, Sargant to British Secret Intelligence (Sargant, 1957), Cameron to the CIA (Thomas, 1989, p. 208, 1998). Sargant and Cameron had met several times

(Thomas, 1998) and may have been friends (Collins, 1988, p. 42). Sargant had also met with Gottlieb, director of MKULTRA (Thomas, 1998).

Snapping and cult indoctrination as dissociative processes

Conway and Siegelman, in Snapping: America's Epidemic of Sudden Personality Change (2005) explain that ceremonial rituals for cult indoctrination, including repetitive chanting, meditation, suggestion, sometimes food and sleep deprivation and infliction of pain, finally result in a "snap":

> an experience that is unmistakably traumatic . . . Sudden change comes in a moment of intense experience . . . an unforeseen break in the continuity of awareness that may leave them detached, withdrawn, disoriented—and utterly confused. The experience itself may produce hallucinations or delusions or render the person extremely vulnerable to suggestion . . . [p. 5]

This experience conforms to mind control survivor reports that extreme abuse, isolation, sleep and food deprivation, sensory and ideological bombardment, and fear-inducing illusions, suddenly induce the formation of a suggestible mental state that are receptive to new ideologies.

The ancient Greek initiation ritual into the "Greater Mysteries" incorporated elements of sentencing the initiate to death, amnesia-producing drugs, rebirth, and renaming to erase prior memory and induce receptiveness to the formation of a new identity (Graves, in Sargant, 1957, pp. 194–195).

Ritual abuse survivors describe the same steps in rebirth, initiation, and marriage rituals: terror, pain, helplessness, and fear of demonic forces, followed by methods to induce amnesia, including drugs, followed by "rebirth" as a member of the group, provision of a new name, a ceremony to marry the "convert" to the group's deity, and a formal claim or announcement of belonging to the group.

Historical accounts of cult indoctrination, Tien, Cameron, Pavlov, Sargant, and First World War electroshock "treatment" of soldiers, and MKULTRA documents citing knowledge of inducing and manipulating amnestic and dissociative states, all support survivor accounts of overwhelming stress inducing the sudden formation of suggestible mental states. Our current knowledge of dissociative processes helps to tie this all together.

Torture in early childhood to induce a dissociation-prone psyche

Torture-based mind control, by most survivor reports, begins before four years of age, usually by age two, to make the psyche dissociation-prone and to serve as a foundation for later programming.

Young children have a greater capacity to enter trance states than older children and adults, allowing for dissociative, self-hypnotic responses to overwhelming stimuli (Putnam, 1997). Peterson (1991) explains,

> Developmentally natural dissociative activities in tandem with primitive defense mechanisms may lead a child to block off painful memories using a dissociative process . . . Without a person' conscious volition, a pattern of protective dissociations may begin to develop, creating newly established and increasingly distinct parts of self, encapsulated in time, and memory segments that are unavailable to the rest of that person's consciousness. [p. 153]

Fotheringham (2008) explains that a "pattern of protective dissociations" was natural for her:

> "I," the primary person . . . was not aware of these alternate identities or their pieces of "my" life. It seemed natural for life to be broken into chunks . . . so "lost time" went unnoticed. Since continuity was unknown, there was no sense of discontinuity . . . my brain's way of coping with difficulties was "wired in"—simply create another alter! [p. 499]

Putnam (1997) views DID as a developmental failure to integrate the discrete, state-dependent, aspects of self that are normal in young children into a cohesive sense of self. Support for this view is found in Blinder's (2007) review of the research and neurobiology on the development of an autobiographical self. Blinder concludes that prior to four years of age, a child's sense of self is more disjointed than cohesive, and that an autobiographical self emerges at around four years of age as a function of the child's "ability to hold in mind multiple representations of the world simultaneously".

Gresch believes that programmers understand that the personality lacks cohesion in early childhood, and that they begin abusing victims very early, "to hamper any real personality development to replace it with a subhuman structure, to be used like a programmable robot" (personal communication, 2009).

After the fourth birthday, a relatively coherent sense of self helps protect against formation of fully separate self-states.

Once a "pattern of protective dissociations" has developed, programmers can use torture to induce new dissociative self-states to form, then "build" the behavioural repertoire of these self-states through conditioning, training, hypnotic suggestion, etc. Dissociation-proneness keeps these self-states maximally segregated from each other. Even in adolescence and adulthood, new self-states can be induced to form in dissociation-prone individuals, a capacity exploited by programmers.

Dissociative responses to chronic and acute trauma

What allows suggestible, malleable, self-states to form in response to severe stress? Much of this can be understood by distinguishing the nature of dissociative responses to chronic, lower-intensity trauma from responses to acute, higher-intensity trauma.

In response to chronic, lower-intensity trauma and shame-evoking trauma, self-states are likely to form and remain dissociated largely as a function of an active mental effort of the relatively non-traumatized self to shield itself from awareness of painful or unacceptable memories, thoughts, feelings and motives.

This is the mechanism of self-state formation emphasized by Dell (2009). Dell contends that dissociated self-states are formed by "dissociation-potentiated repression", the defensive use of repression in individuals with substantial self-hypnotic or dissociative ability.

Thus, such dissociative self-states are born, in large part, by an act of self-agency, are more cortical than subcortical, and have the active organizing purpose of coping with the trauma that precipitated their formation. These trauma-bearing self-states are also likely to remain dissociated from the relatively non-traumatized self by way of an ongoing mental defensive effort to disown the unacceptable. Some of these self-states "hold" knowledge of trauma that is intolerable to the host. Some are skilled at managing physical pain. Some may defensively identify with abusers and reject the self. Some may be internal self-helpers (ISHs).

Having formed to protect the self, I believe that these ego states are somewhat less susceptible to mind control, and, in some cases, successfully elude detection by the abusers.

In contrast, in response to acute and higher-intensity trauma, the victim is likely to react more reflexively and instinctually. These responses probably largely derive from subcortical mechanisms that activate very quickly in response to perceived threat to physical or psychic survival, vs. purposeful, slower, cortically mediated mental activity (LeDoux, 1996). Some of these responses involve hyper-arousal, including fight/rage, flight/panic, and sympathetic nervous system arousal. Some involve hypo-arousal, including immobilization/freezing, passive submission, numbing, derealization, depersonalization, impaired attention and cognition, and lowered heart rate, breath rate, and muscle tone. These states are more a function of intense emotional and physiological states taking precedence over cognitive coping strategies as the trauma occurs, than the psyche's efforts to extrude intolerable knowledge from awareness (van der Kolk, McFarlane, & Weisaeth, 1996).

A third response to high-intensity trauma, perhaps only a reaction to perceived immediate threat to life, combines elements of hypo- and hyper-arousal. This state is characterized by sudden and surprising calm, absence of fear or pain regardless of the extent of injury, intensely focused attention, sensory hyper-acuity, mental quickness, and an expanded sense of time (Dell, 2009; Heim, 1892).

Mind control survivors report that self-states formed in response to high-intensity trauma arise spontaneously due to a break in self-agency, and are mentally registered apart from the other self-states from their inception. Accordingly, they remain dissociated from the host with less mental effort than self-states formed defensively. They intently focus on accommodating their abusers. Some remain internally "fixed in space and time", reliving the pain and terror that provoked their formation (van der Hart, Nijenhuis, & Steele, 2006). Some perceive the pain and terror of the trauma they endured as "normal", the only reality they know.

The model of "structural dissociation of the personality" of Steele, van der Hart, and Nijenhuis (2009) is close to what I believe occurs when self-states form in response to high-intensity, acute trauma, such as torture. Their model emphasizes that traumatic material is registered differently and apart from benign experience, as it occurs. They contend that an ongoing integrative deficit results in a structural dissociation of the personality, and only secondarily is this division a result of a psychological defence. They posit that when individuals experience aversive stimuli, such as a major threat, mental and behavioural "action tendencies" are activated to avoid or escape the threat. Such experience is registered in "emotional parts" of the personality, a separate psychobiological system than that employed to approach attractive stimuli and adapt to daily life, the "apparently normal parts of the personality". If overwhelming trauma occurs to a child, or if a primary attachment figure is frightening, this hinders the otherwise normal developmental progression towards integration of the two psychobiological systems. The host's phobic avoidance of traumatic memory held in emotional parts maintains the division, which probably involves a preconscious mental effort, a psychological defence.

States formed in response to high-intensity trauma are more rudimentary than self-states formed with less intense trauma. Some have a limited sense of "me-ness". Many are only "fragments". Both can develop an increased sense of self over time. For example, self-states formed in response to a particular kind of abuse tend to take executive control whenever that abuse is reapplied, and can have an autobiographical self within those episodes, including experiencing themselves as the age of the body at the last episode of that abuse.

Programmers use rudimentary self-states to construct personae to perform desired functions. Gresch (personal communication, 2008) explains that a young child's immediate response to torture is to enter a survival-driven state of hypnotic heightened attentiveness and suggestibility that is ultra-receptive to learning. Thus primed, this state may be exploited in limited ways, such as "fragments" trained to obey commands or perform circumscribed behaviours to avoid punishment. Or, this state may be further augmented through a long-term "torture-hypno-conditioning process", to carry out more complex executive functions. Terror controls this type of self-state long-term, in that it is stuck, "unable to leave the torture chamber in its own mind".

In many cases, survivors discover self-states that appear motivated to serve their own needs, to later discover that programmers deliberately orchestrated their organizing purpose. For example, some ego-states see themselves as powerful or believe themselves to be "chosen" for some honoured position, but they are amnestic for the early, severe abuse, that forced their formation and kept them controlled. Genuinely human needs motivate such parts, but they are not born of psychological defence; they are deliberately induced to form, then conditioned and manipulated.

I believe that practitioners of torture-based mind control have a depth understanding of all of these kinds of dissociative states, calculatingly induce some types to form, limit some to holding pain and terror, condition some to perform executive functions of more complexity, manipulate "self-created" ego states to the degree that they can, all to exploit the unique properties of each to the fullest.

Torture to induce formation of self-states

Mind control survivors report that their abusers understand well that torture induces a dissociation-prone psyche to form new programmable self-states, and calculatedly torture victims for this purpose.

Carol Rutz, mind control survivor and author of A Nation Betrayed (2001), believes that existing self-states tend to "come up" in sequence from older to younger, to distribute the burden of torture being applied, until finally a defenceless baby appears, less capable of using the mind to cope, and more programmable (personal communication, 2009).

Many survivors claim that sophisticated abusers recognize that a new self-state has arisen when the child no longer reacts with terror or pain to the torture. This new state is immediately named and given directives. Abusers may also "install" the perception of entities and structures. These messages, entities, and structures become paired with pain and terror in the new trauma-bound state, which has no cognitive capacity to process or reject any of this input. This all remains dissociated from the host.

In this vignette, Rutz and her two-year-old self-state, "Little Girl", recount programming at age four, designed to form a new self-state, "Samantha". After administering a "truth drug", the doctor says:

> "Come forth little one—I need to know your name!"
>
> "Little girl."
>
> Then the doctor says, "Who else?"
>
> "Nobody."
>
> He knows we's lyin so he makes our body jump and hurt real bad. We got lectricity going through us.
>
> "Shadow, our name is shadow."
>
> Now they want to know who Shadow is.
>
> Shadow gotted made at Grandfathers' before we came here [describes ritual that induced the formation of Shadow].
>
> Now they knows all our names. If ya knows our names—ya got power and control. They says theys gonna give us special numbers. Later Dr No, the lady Doctor says, "We are gonna help you, little girl, not to have any more pain. You don't have to feel it ever again."
>
> "They's gonna make Samantha come . . ."
>
> (Intense electro-shock was delivered in order to allow my mind to dissociate and create Samantha who would never feel pain. In the future, whenever I was put through a tortuous painful experience, Samantha would automatically be the alter who took over the body and she would hide the memory and the pain from the rest of the system . . .).
>
> "Back, just let the memories go back"
>
> That be what the doctor tellin us alright. [Rutz, 2001, pp. 17–18]

In 2009, I asked Carol Rutz to help me understand how Samantha could both "never feel pain", yet "hide the memory and pain from the rest of the system". She explained,

> "Samantha" took the pain and hid it from the rest of the system. So she really did feel pain, even though the lie [by the abusers] was that she would not. So, she "complied" and consciously believed she did not feel pain, but she did hold the pain, less consciously. The rest of the system did not feel pain. "Little Girl" certainly believed Samantha did not feel pain, and that was important because she was one of the main presenting alters. Whenever a situation occurred where pain was administered the alter, Samantha came out and encapsulated the pain.

"Blank slate" programmable mental states

Many survivors report that in response to prolonged, especially novel, torture, victims suddenly stop resisting and enter a paradoxically calm, pain-free, highly receptive and programmable mental state. They describe a psychophysiological mental state, not a state with a sense of identity. An anonymous survivor (2008) described this as "kind of like a memory stick for a computer. Not a fragment—just an object waiting to be written on."

Fotheringham (2008) explains that novel torture reliably elicits such states:

> Do a new form of torture. If it is a familiar form of torture, it will just default to the one who is programmed to take that . . . A new part forms . . . totally linked to self-defense and self-protection . . . constantly looking outward to know what to do to stay safe . . .

Gresch (personal communication, 2008) describes this process:

> To evoke a "blank slate", the torture must proceed until the victim stops resisting, beyond any feigned compliance, beyond the point of genuine obedience and submission, until the victim finally surrenders all personal intention, and then the programmers push even further, and achieve their goal, the blank slate state . . . The victim is calm and receptive. This is the physiological reaction to torture if applied in the right way . . . Your last chance for survival > depends on receptiveness to everything the situation commands of you . . . The victim reaches a state in which it is extremely suggestible, in an extremely hypnotic state, ready to accept everything . . . They can implant a so-called "personality", actually a script of personality, in this highly receptive ultra-learning state.

Gresch explained (personal communication, 2009) how this newly formed state does not experience pain or terror, yet is ultimately controlled by pain and terror in the moment and long-term:

> This new state does not register in consciousness the painful torture that precipitated its formation, yet less conscious pain and terror continually fuel its receptivity and hyper-attention. Though dissociated states segregate this experience as it occurs, it is registered to some degree as a whole in the mind/brain. The programmed information is preserved intact, with little deterioration over time, largely through an associational neural network connecting it to the preceding pain and terror.

Dell (2009), in a recent synopsis of the literature on "peritraumatic dissociation", provides support for survivor accounts of tabula rasa states forming in response to life-threatening trauma. He explains that in response to perceived threat to life, people automatically enter a state of "absence of pain, absence of fear, a calm state of mind, a slowing of time, accelerated thought, clear thinking, heightened sensory perception, and a heightened ability to execute motor skills with precision and confidence" (p. 762). Dell describes this response as "situation-specific", "task-oriented", and lasting "only as long as that life-threatening situation lasts" (p. 761). He calls this "evolution-prepared dissociation", in that "perception is immediately adjusted and instantly tuned to the most survival-relevant aspects of the environment" (p. 760). Such a mental state would make torture victims highly receptive to programming.

Support for this phenomenon is found in the work of Albert Heim, who documented the experience of survivors of near-fatal falls in 1892. Heim found that 95% of fall victims experienced a mental state of "heightened sensory and ideational activity, and without anxiety or pain" (p. 135), the same mental state described by torture-based mind control survivors. Heim said of his own near-fatal fall, "my thoughts and ideas were coherent and very clear, and in no way susceptible, as are dreams, to obliteration" (p. 134). Heim noted that hearing was the last sense to be lost. The ability to hear in near-death situations and enhanced memory acuity would both facilitate the objectives of mind control.

Psychological impact of naming new self-states

Assignment of names to self-states is central to mind control, as it was to Tien's electrolytic love therapy. Abusers quickly assign names to define new self-states, such as "Evil", or "Lolita". Self-states tend to perceive themselves as belonging to whomever named them. If the programmer delays in assigning a name, and the self-state can name, it may be able to elude the trainer. Names allow programmers to call self-states forward. Survivors often guard the names of self-states to prevent their being summoned.

Gresch (personal communication, 2009) explains, "The art of mind control is the art of controlling attention". Names are a means for programmers to manipulate this attention. He explains, > Names combined with code phrases trigger the execution of programmed mental mechanisms, that is, thoughts, emotion, and behavior, in compliance with programmer instructions, fueled by fear conditioning. For example, if somebody says "I am your god, Peter Munk, one two three", a programmed self-state based on a modified prototype of "Peter Munk," a character in Wilhelm Hauff's fairy tale, "Das kalte Herz," [1858] will be activated. Peter Munk is unemotional, obedient, lacking in self-awareness, and motivated to avoid torture. This alter has been torture-hypno-conditioned to execute a number of mental actions, including (1) to activate Hugo, an other alter, to take the pain if Munk is tortured, (2) to report any access to the programmer, and (3) should any intention to resist programming enter the conscious mind, the image of a "pillar of power" will appear, the words will be heard in a threatening manner in the inner ear, the mind will be flooded with depression, and the conscious mind will feel a compulsion to once again be obedient to relieve the depression.

Gresch explained how this programming involving the "pillar of power" was effected:

> The "pillar of power" was a magical object in the inner world of the "alter", Peter Munk, which symbolized the concentrated power of the perpetrators. Peter Munk was instructed to imagine the pillar of power with his inner eye. He was then told to image that he was trying to pass the pillar of power, and to give a sign with his hand when he was about to do this. When he gave the sign, he was electro-shocked through an electrode fastened to his penis. The programmer commanded, "You shouldn't try to betray me. Look! I now allow you to recognize that we have attached measuring sensors to your head. We have recorded the brain waves when you are trying to pass the pillar of power. We know what you are doing". It doesn't matter whether the perpetrators really were able to manage this. What counts was that Peter Munk believed it.

Polyvagal theory

What neurobiological mechanisms account for the formation of highly programmable self-states and mental states in response to torture? Stephen Porges' Polyvagal Theory (1995, 1999) provides some clues.

The vagus nerve is the longest of ten cranial nerves and is critical in responding to threat. Porges specifies two distinct branches of the vagus nerve in mammals: (1) The smart vagus, the phylogenetically newer, ventral branch, and (2) The vegetative vagus, the phylogenetically older, dorsal branch.

In response to threat, the smart (ventral) vagus first deploys the parasympathetic nervous system (PNS), activates socially affiliative behaviour with the same species, that is, help-seeking, and maintains relative calm. If this cannot effectively manage the threat, it shifts its strategy to fight or flight, mediated by the sympathetic nervous system (SNS). If fight or flight cannot adequately cope with the stressor, the vegetative (dorsal) vagus activates, inhibiting the heart via the PNS, yielding a "shut-down" of behaviour, tonic immobility, freezing, death-feigning, or submission to the threat. This reptilian/amphibian response may be considered a dissociative response (Beauchaine, Gatzke-Kopp, & Mead, 2007), perhaps similar to "evolution-prepared dissociation" as described by Dell (2009).

I corresponded with Porges in 2008 to determine whether the dorsal vagal responses of submission or paralysis may relate to mental states induced to form under torture, and whether such states might be receptive to encoding information, that is, being programmed. Porges explained that "a physiological state, in part, mediated by the dorsal vagal complex might promote dissociative states". Porges also said that he believes that dorsal vagal states are mediated, in part, by oxytocin, a hormone important in pair bonding and social memory, and that this might yield strong bonds to the perpetrator (an other critical element in programming). He said that dorsal vagal states might facilitate one-trial learning, a rapid, relatively indelible conditioned response, closely connected to fear conditioning. He said that learning in this dorsal vagal state "may be disconnected from the experience and this may form the basis of a different personality structure". He was careful to add that these hypotheses, and how they relate to states of calmness, remain to be tested.

Thus, the dorsal vagal threat response may contribute to a calm, receptive state, perhaps similar to Dell's "evolution-prepared dissociation" (2009), that may be highly receptive to encoding information via one-trial learning and to bonding to the abuser, and information encoded in such states may become stored in a "different personality structure", all responses advantageous for mind control.

Introjection of abusers and programmers

Most clinicians in the dissociative disorders field agree that internal representations of abusers are commonplace in DID, and that these are usually self-states who have taken on the demeanour of frightening abusers. Psychological mechanisms that drive the formation of "abuser self-states" include many variants of identification with the aggressor. Their "masks" often conceal young, trauma-bearing states. Many mind control survivors also report discovering self-states who were programmed to take on abuser characteristics in order to control other self-states.

Many survivors also perceive within them internalized programmers, witchcraft spirits, and entities that are not self-states at all. These are experienced as "foreign bodies" installed in mind control.

I believe that programmers often intentionally "install" representations of themselves in mind-control torture. Gresch (personal communication, 2009) explains,

> The victim must execute the orders of the programmers when they are not present. So they try to "implant" themselves into the mind of the victim . . . Through torture, the perpetrators switch off the critical mind of the victim . . . All of the torture-enhanced faculties are exclusively fixed to the commands of the programmer, just like in hypnosis. This is much more than obeying—it is introjecting the perpetrators . . . The generic abuser maltreats the victim to satisfy his needs. But the mind controller uses torture and pain to transform the psyche of the victim.

Above, Carol Rutz described the torture-driven formation of "Samantha". The next day, Rutz explains that, using drugs and hypnosis, Gottlieb created twin self-states specifically for government mind control: "Baby", who was told it lived in "Neverland", and "Guy" to live in "Shadowland" (Rutz, personal communication, 2009). Then Gottlieb commanded, "The genie appears when Neverland is opened. Remember, I am your master and I am the genie" (Rutz, 2001, p. 19). Although survival-driven attachment needs are at play here, I believe that the internalization of this Gottlieb–genie must be understood as a foreign body, a psychological introject, not a self-state.

Many survivors also describe rituals in which witchcraft abusers "placed" parts of their "spirits" inside of them, usually in specific self-states, through the transfer of body fluids and substances. "Attached spirits" are perceived to internally repeat the controlling messages first spoken in rituals, such as, "You belong to me", "You will obey me", etc. Commonly, such abusers also "attach" their deities to strengthen the spirits' effects. Affected self-states may also perceive that the abusers captured parts of their own spirit to hold captive within themselves.

Even if the host views such "transfers" as impossible, self-states formed and indoctrinated in the "theology" of these abusers generally perceive them as very real, and the impact is devastating, as they feel inhabited by these "attached" entities.

Programming the unconscious mind

Many survivors report that programmers ultimately seek to install mind control beneath the level of all self-states in what their programmers called the "unconscious mind".

The CIA document MORI 190713, "Hypnotism and covert operations" (1955) explains that an "operator" can use hypnosis to place the "conscious mind" in a state of "suspended animation" to "reach and affect the unconscious mind directly", to "successfully" "transplant ideas and motives", that are felt to be one's "own free will", with post-hypnotic amnesia for the hypnosis. This document explains the powerful compulsion to follow hypnotically placed dictates:

> Let us suppose that a good hypnotic subject has entered the deepest stage of hypnosis. If the operator then suggests, "After I awaken you, you will have no recollection of what has occurred. Furthermore, exactly 1 hour after you are awakened you will go to the nearest telephone and dial (any number). To whomever answers you will say (any message)," in all likelihood the subject will do just that . . . If the subject after awakening remembers or is told that he has been given a post-hypnotic suggestion, what it is, and when it will become operative, he still will experience the greatest difficulty in resisting it. Almost the only way in which he can obtain release from an almost intolerable feeling of discomfort is to carry out the post-hypnotic suggestion as given him; or, alternatively, have the suggestion removed under hypnosis. For what has been created is very similar to, if not identical with a compulsion neurosis. [ibid., p. 8]

Survivors report that the unconscious mind is accessed in lengthy near-death torture by a complete breach of self-agency after all self-states have been taxed beyond endurance, before the victim can create another self-state, before the victim loses physical consciousness, or occasionally in the moments between two pre-existing states taking executive control. One psychologist-survivor explained (2009): "When you have an alter, you are fortified. You are motivated to protect the self. The space in between alters is when they can get to the unconscious mind."

Survivors report that, once accessed, the mind is "laid bare" and records information with no ability to process, question, or reject input. It has no self-awareness, no emotion, no ability to act on its own behalf. It "believes", or, more accurately, "takes in whole", what it is told or shown. This is when programmers reportedly "install" much foundational programming, especially structures to organize the system of self-states.

Survivors report that structures are installed using commands and illusions. A child, having previously been shown a model of a building, may be told, "The building we showed you is in your mind". The programmer may project a grid on a child's chest, then command, "The grid is in your chest", "Go inside the grid". The programmer might put a button on a child's navel and command that the button detonates a bomb if the child ever remembers. These commands and illusions become paired with the torture applied immediately before and after. Steve Oglevie, mind control consultant (personal communication, 1996 to 2006), explains that this causes the structures, illusions, and commands to be perceived to be as real as the torture itself. Schwartz (2000), in a chapter largely devoted to mind control in his book, Dialogues with Forgotten Voices, explains:

> [T]he power of all statements made during and immediately after abusive episodes while the victim is in an altered state will be enhanced by the absence of an operative critical consciousness (Conway, 1994) and by the indelible connection with intense fear, intolerable anxiety, or mind-shattering dread. [p. 318]

Because programming "installed" in the unconscious mind was never consciously registered in any self-state, it is usually more "deeply buried".

Blank-slate mental states and the "unconscious mind" are similar, but not identical. Victims report that programmers use the unconscious mind as a writable memory chip to store information, and use blank-slate mental states to develop self-states that can take executive control to serve abuser functions.

Massive memory storage

MKULTRA was interested in the use of hypnosis for enhanced memory storage and retrieval. MORI 190713 (1955) states:

> Post-hypnotic suggestions . . . have been known to endure for years. The image that comes to mind is a blackboard on which a message will endure until erased or blurred by time. [p. 9]
>
> . . . a hypnotized person can recall past events with astonishing clarity and detail, in many cases when he does not realize with his conscious mind that he "remembers". [p. 19]
>
> . . . One's memory for detail under such conditions appears to be boundless. [p. 21]

Enhanced memory capacity is critical to much mind control, including memory for lengthy codes, secret information storage, enhanced skills, etc. Can human memory be enhanced to this degree?

Many survivors report that intelligent infants are selected for mind control programmes. And many survivors report having eidetic recall.

Many survivors also report training for acute memory and sensory skills, including being punished, often with electroshock, for failing to remember, failing to discriminate between similar stimuli, and failing to perceive low-grade stimuli. MORI 017395 (1961) http://abuse-of-power.org/modules/content/index.php?id=31http://michael-robinett.com/declass/c000.htm states,

> Learning studies will be instituted in which the subject will be rewarded or punished for his overall performance and reinforced in various ways - by being told whether he was right, by being told what the target was, with electroshock etc. [p. 6]

Gresch (personal communication, 2009) explains,

> Like many victims, I was "programmed" with the tape recorder metaphor. I was trained to remember complex semantic information . . . If I failed, I was tortured . . . Application of torture causes the programmed information, programmed "post-hypnotic" cues to retrieve the information, and the pain and terror of the torture to be paired together and subconsciously isolated in ultra-long-term memory.

The capacity of the mind for vast information storage is supported by cases of hypermnesia and "hyperthymestic syndrome" (Parker, Cahill, & McGaugh, 2006; Tammet, 2007).

I believe that programmers have learned to combine torture-based conditioning and the use of high-intellect victims to access and exploit a capacity for hypermnesia that may exist in many people.

Programming the host

Survivors report that extensive programming is done to develop a front/host personality who behaves "normally" and is amnestic for the abuse and the existence of programmed self-states.

In "successful" programming, the host is shell-like, lacking much sense of self. It functions like a chameleon, adapting to the demands of each setting. Clinically, it suffers alexithymia, derealization, and depersonalization.

Survivors with shell-like hosts may be more likely to have had foundational programming in infancy. This often includes a division in the psyche between (1) the "normal" side, amnestic for the abuse, often associated with the daytime and right side of the body, and (2) the side entrenched in the abuse, often associated with the night-time and the left side of the body.

In some survivors, the host has some substance, depth, and emotional range. It is more of an agent of self motivated by genuine needs, curiosity, etc. In this case, dissociative barriers between the host and programmed parts may have formed largely through defensive processes, rather than exclusively by programmer design. Although such hosts are usually initially amnestic for their torture and relatively traumatophobic, they are usually more motivated to approach trauma material than shell-like hosts.

The interface of programmed self-states and the host

Two main mechanisms appear to control the interface between programmed self-states and the host: (1) specialized programmed self-states control "switching" of executive control between programmed self-states and the host, and (2) the pain and terror of programmed self-states flood the personality system when the host or other self-states violate programming (see next section).

Pierre Janet's famous case of Lucie illustrates this first mechanism. Janet hypnotized Lucie to carry out post-hypnotic suggestions. Lucie executed these, but forgot doing so immediately afterwards. Lucie was also amnestic for being hypnotized. In contrast, Adrienne, Lucie's second "hypnotic personality", recalled everything that happened while Lucie was hypnotized, and claimed that she executed the post-hypnotic suggestions without Lucie's knowledge (Dell, 2009, pp. 715–716).

In successful mind-control, the host functions much like Lucie. The host is unaware of programmed parts or the directives they execute, but key programmed parts are aware of the host and largely control it, as did Adrienne.

Gresch (personal communication, 2009) explains that his controllers relied on three mechanisms: (1) a front façade, unaware of the abuse and other self-states, (2) a system of obedient robotic self-states, and (3) isolation of the "kernel", the essence of his original self, which the programmers knew they could not extinguish, so must isolate. Obedience by all self-states was ensured by Peter Munk, "the mediator", who believed that his controllers monitored his brain waves and would detect any intention to disobey. If resistance to any directive entered consciousness, programmed parts would re-experience their torture, pain would flood into consciousness, and the "front" would feel compelled to perform as directed.

Unconscious implicit memory for trauma and fear conditioning

Torture-based mind control relies on the capacity to induce victims to re-experience their torture should they violate programme directives, while ensuring that the host remains amnestic for the source of his/her distress. Well-established psychological mechanisms explain how this "works".

LeDoux (1996, 2007) provides extensive neurological and psychological evidence for two long-term memory systems: (1) an explicit memory system that is more conscious, cognitive, and verbal, and (2) an implicit memory system that is more unconscious, emotional, and non-verbal. LeDoux's research reveals that implicit, unconscious memory of pain and fear "may represent an indelible form of learning" (p. 204). In post-trauma responses,

"stimuli associated with the danger or trauma become learned triggers that unleash emotional reactions in us" (LeDoux, 1996, p. 150). LeDoux calls this form of classical conditioning "fear conditioning".

Fear conditioning appears to be fundamental to how torture-based mind control "works".

LeDoux's research shows that emotional information is largely subcortically mediated by the amygdala in responses engineered for survival—fast, largely automatic, and unconscious. In contrast, cortical responding is slower, conscious, and allows for mental flexibility, decision-making, and execution of one's will in choosing how to respond.

LeDoux (1996) explains that much emotional learning, especially fear conditioning, "operates independently of consciousness—it is part of what we called the emotional unconscious" (p. 128). The largely unconscious "emotional system" more strongly affects the conscious cognitive system than vice versa. Thus, "people normally do all sorts of things for reasons they are not consciously aware of (because the behavior is produced by brain systems that operate unconsciously)" (p. 33); ". . . we are often in the dark about why we feel the way we do" (pp. 52–53).

Survivors report that programmers intentionally use torture and drugs to attempt to block victims' capacity for conscious cognitive processing. They then fear-condition trauma-bound self-states. Then, fear-conditioned responses are automatically executed outside of conscious, cognitive awareness.

Van der Hart, Nijenhuis, and Steele's (2006) theory of structural dissociation dovetails neatly with LeDoux's model of fear conditioning. In their model, EPs have a very limited sense of self, largely restricted to re-experiencing trauma. They store amygdala-mediated emotional and sensorimotor memories of terror and perceived threat, and are often fixated in past trauma with little awareness of passage of time.

Both models help us understand torture-based mind control, which relies on storage of memory for noxious emotional and somatic states in the subconscious implicit memory system of trauma-bearing EPs, and leakage of these implicit memories into the consciously experienced emotions, sensations, thoughts, impulses, and behaviours of ANP(s). When programming is working "well", ANPs remain "in the dark" about the derivation of these noxious responses in the torture-conditioning of EPs.

Conditioned "triggers", such as an abuser's voice, hand signals, etc., induce uncontrolled fear and pain in the ANP. Similarly, failure to perform in ways that avoided pain and terror by the EP, such as compliance with directives, induces a powerful need in the ANP to perform the conditioned behaviour.

It is clearly advantageous for programmers to "place" fear-driven programming in the largely unconscious amygdala and to bypass the conscious, will-based cortex. Accordingly, programmers maximally fear-condition the amygdala-bound implicit memory system, largely within trauma-bearing EPs, to induce automatic responding, and maximally block cortical cognitive processing to attempt to eradicate critical thinking and assertion of free will.

Operant conditioning

Operant conditioning, that is, the use of reward and punishment to increase or decrease behaviours, is a mainstay of mind-control torture, usually applied to condition the behaviour of specific self-states.

In this example of programming of almost unfathomable cruelty, Gresch (personal communication, 2008) provides an example of punishment with a twist—by proxy. Another victim is killed to train his "mediator" personality to properly allocate memories, to remember what the abusers want him to remember and to forget what they want him to forget:

> The flower game: Forget me and forget-me-not: A perpetrator confronts the child with a list of common words like cow, flower, chair, or so. Every word is connected with "forget me" or "forget-me-not". The list becomes longer and longer. The child is punished if he/she remembers or forgets the wrong words. Then the day of the big test comes. Target child is not tested, but another, expendable child. The test is staged as a ritual, maybe a Satanic ritual. When the tested child makes a mistake, the master of ceremonies kills this expendable child with a knife in front of the eyes of the target child.

Drug effects

MKULTRA drug experimentation on unwitting subjects is extensively documented (Ross, 2000; Scheflin & Opton, 1978; Thomas, 1989; Weinstein, 1988) including extensive evidence of testing drug effects on suggestibility, hypnotic states, psychophysiological stress responses, amnesia, and as truth serums for interrogation (e.g., MORI 017441, 144686, 190713).

Mind control survivors report extensive use of drugs to induce sedation, immobility, trance, and suggestibility, to induce dysphoric states (anxiety, nausea, pain) to punish resistance, to induce formation of self-states, and to bring victims to near-death, to block the formation of memories, and to create amnesia. Drugs that induce pleasure are used to reward compliance: "Sometimes they give you drugs that let you experience hell, sometimes they give you heroin" (Gresch, 2009).

Many survivors recall programming to make them perceive the presence of vials of mind-altering substances in their bodies that will be released into their bloodstream or brain if they violate programme injunctions. Particular self-states are often programmed to remain fixed in sedated or hallucinatory drugged states, and programmed to take executive control when victims begin to remember, or risk disclosing, their abuse. These form the basis of much anti-therapy programming.

The impact of electroshock

Electroshock may be the most common form of torture reported by mind control survivors. It appears to have two primary uses, to produce amnesia and to induce pain. MORI ID 146342 (1951) reveals:

> [a psychiatrist . . . a fully cleared Agency consultant] . . . stated that using this machine [Reiter] as an electroshock device with the convulsive treatment, he felt that he could guarantee amnesia for certain periods of time and . . . for any knowledge of use of the convulsive shock.
>
> [The doctor] stated that . . . lower current . . . produced in the individual excruciating pain and . . . the individual would be quite > willing to give information if threatened with the use of this machine.

Electroshock to the head sufficient to cause loss of consciousness and motor convulsions results in retrograde amnesia for the shock and preceding ten minutes (Shorter & Healy, 2007). None the less, there is evidence that the fear associated with the shock remains (Fox, 1993), as in fear conditioning. It follows that shock might cause programming to be registered fairly indelibly, albeit unconsciously.

Tien and Cameron used electroshock to respectively "erase" and "depattern" the mind. Post-electroshock, both found the mind more receptive to suggestion, consistent with survivor reports.

Many survivors report extensive use of electroshock to condition behaviour and to induce new self-states to form, often to their genitals and extremities. Gresch (2009, personal communication) states,

> I was tortured with electricity most of the time. Most survivors will probably report electric torture at the genitals . . . The perpetrator has a hand gear with which he can lead electricity to the penis or vagina of his victim.

Shock level is easily modulated. Threats to increase shock, promises to stop, etc., ensure compliance. It is easily classically conditioned to neutral stimuli that can be used as triggers. An electrician explains,

> The mental portion of shock is so intense . . . My cell phone vibrates and I get a fear reaction. It contracts the whole body. I can't think of any other form of torture that would give a torturer any more control.

Coercive hypnosis and manipulation of the imagination

Survivors report that hypnosis is the basis of much mind-control. MKULTRA documents provide extensive evidence of CIA interest in covert, coercive hypnosis (1) to block conscious processing and induce amnesia, (2) to induce dissociative states, (3) to make individuals execute "unethical actions", combined with drugs, after electroshock, during sleep, with auditory and visual stimuli, and after physical duress such as forced wakeful states, and (4) to create post-hypnotic assassins (MORI ID 144686, 017395, 017441, 190691, 190713). Estabrooks, one of the MKULTRA doctors, "publicly acknowledged the building of Manchurian Candidates" (Ross, 2000, p. 159).

Research has shown that one type of highly responsive hypnotic subject, the "amnesia-prone" individual, is likely to have been abused as a child and to have dissociative symptoms (Barber, 2000).

Mind control survivors are dissociation-prone, amnesia-prone, and fear-conditioned to submit to their trainers. Receptiveness to hypnosis "involves the intentional evocation of a special state characterized by focused attention" (Putnam & Carlson, 2002). Survivors are primed for states of intense, narrow attention to environmental cues to ensure survival. A psychologist-survivor (2008) explains, "Fear focuses attention intensely, and survival information is encoded deeply."

Rutz (2003) explains that her programming was eventually accomplished with hypnosis alone:

> All the programming that was done to me by the CIA and Illuminati was trauma-based using things like electroshock, sensory deprivation, and drugs. Later the trauma wasn't necessary, only hypnosis accomplished with implanted triggers and occasional tune-ups . . .

Rutz reports that Gottlieb, her programmer, also induced new self-states, "Baby" and "Guy", to form through hypnotic commands unaccompanied by torture.

Preschool children often make little distinction between reality and fantasy, actual events and pretend play. Programming begun in early childhood exploits their magical thinking and high hypnotizability. Programmers know that fantastic perceptions and beliefs "implanted" in the first four years of life will "stick", especially if "installed" in self-states dissociated from the host. Effects are enhanced by dependence on the programmer, "attaching" ominous entities, models, hallucinogens, and use of film.

This vignette illustrates the suggestibility of a frightened young child. Until she remembered this event, she was paralysed by the sight of maggots:

> [T]here was beating and rape at the [abusers' house] that generally ended with the body having to clean up the rotten fruit [with maggots]. There was the same basic message . . . every time. They told her the maggots were the first sign they knew the body was talking. They [abusers] would send that to the body. It was the first warning . . . "The truth of speaking out carries on the wings of the flies". Then, the flies would bring back the warning . . . They said, "Flies are not of nature; they are witnesses to death, that's what creates the maggots, to eat the dead body."

Survivor Lynn Schirmer (2008, personal communication) explains use of story characters to develop self-states:

> Elements of the Wizard of Oz movie were used in programming, especially the bit (in my case) about having no brain. Generally this was used to remind major alters inside of their limitations, that they can't access certain parts or memories, and calls up programming that induces a hazy air-headed feeling. They actually played the little Tin man song in the lab room.

Much programming relies on illusions and films, often combined with torture and drugs to increase suggestibility. Programmer goals in staging these events include making self-states perceive (1) that their abusers have magical power, usually over life and death; (2) that a harmful object or entity was installed; (3) that the victim was tortured, as in the film/drama; (4) that the victim behaved as in the film, for example, sexual films to build sexual alters, concentration camp films to form prisoner or torturer alters; (5) that others were killed due to victim disobedience; (6) that the victim harmed or killed others; (7) that personalities have died; (8) that the victim has powers of astral travel and psychic assassination.

Many survivors report being drugged, strapped to an electroshock device, and forced to watch a film that shows a child with similar features strapped to the same device. Victims believe they are watching themselves. One survivor described a camera pointing at her to further cement the illusion. Terror and helplessness are compounded because no movement or vocalization effects the "self" in the film.

Many survivors who initially believed they were tortured in Nazi concentration camps later realized that these memories were black and white and that a number flashed at the beginning of the memory. They then realized that they were forced to watch a Second World War Nazi film.

In her Kabalah-Training Document, this anonymous survivor describes her programmers' tricks:

> The perpetrators believe that when the eyelids are closed the light that is seen through them confuses the mind making it unable to tell the difference between reality and fantasy. You can tell them they have been abducted by aliens and tell them what they are seeing in the alien ship. You can tell them that they have had surgery, and that a device for keeping track of them is hidden under their scalp. You can tell them that the eye of Lucifer has been placed in their stomachs to keep an eye on them . . . As long as a small cut or scar of some kind is done at the same time, they will believe the eye of Lucifer has been placed in their stomachs to keep an eye on them, and they will believe it forever.

Survivor Patricia Baird Clark (2001) describes use of models and hypnosis to install her inner world:

> . . . a child may be . . . shown a castle . . . She spends several days in the castle going through painful, terrifying rituals in many of the rooms. She is forced to memorize the castle's entire layout. There will be a small replica of the castle much like an architectural model . . . Once this has been memorized, she is subjected to magic surgery. A tiny replica of the castle is shown to the child and she is told that it is being placed inside. The castle is now "within" . . . In this person's inner world she can now walk through the rooms and this castle has become as real to her in the spiritual dimension as it had been in the physical world.
>
> In subsequent rituals . . . the alters formed will be assigned to live in various rooms. These rooms are guarded by demons and booby traps are placed in strategic places so there is no escape . . . These castles have cold, dark dungeons filled with rats and snakes along with torture rooms . . .

Manipulation of attachment needs

Fear-driven attachment to one's abusers is endemic to severe abuse. Van der Kolk (1989) explains, ". . . children in particular, seek increased attachment in the face of external danger . . . When there is no access to ordinary sources of comfort, people may turn toward their tormentors" (p. 396).

In extreme abuse, appeasing the abuser subverts all self-advocacy. Schwartz (2000) explains, "The shocking absence of any anger at the perpetrators is entrenched and stays intact, as though prolonged immersion in sadistic abuse and extreme trauma bonding have almost completely reversed the self-protection system of the survivor" (p. 314).

Most mind control survivors recall their programmers developing bonds with key ego states beginning in the first few years of life as long-term tools of control, often designating themselves as "Daddy" or "Mummy" of particular ego states. Carol Rutz recalls Sidney Gottlieb telling her new alter, "Baby",

> "I am you mammer and your papper. You love only me, and I am the only one who loves you. I feed you and hold you, and you are mine alone" . . . Our baby part grew to love and depend on "Daddy Sid" as her only source of love and nourishment. From that day forward, a deep bonding took place . . . No matter what experiment he was to make me a part of, I would love and remain loyal to the man who my baby alter considered sole supplier of the basics of life, food, and love. [Rutz, 2001, p. 19]

A psychologist-survivor (2009) explains the readiness of newly formed states to bond to abusers:

> The newly formed tabula-rasa state will naturally attach to the abuser. This is a survival-based physiologically driven bonding response. If the abuser says; "You are Samantha, I am your Daddy, I love you, you belong to me, you will come when I call," this is taken in uncritically.

Consistent with object relations and attachment theory, Gresch believes that identity develops within significant relationships. For self-states induced to form within torture, the significant other is the programmer. Accordingly, it defines itself by the interactions within that moulding process, whether that be stories, hypnotism, torture-based conditioning, etc. By design, it has no motives of its own, except to avoid torture through complete submission to the abuser.

"Good cop–bad cop" and intermittent reinforcement are also used to build bonds. Children "excuse" and dissociate massive amounts of abuse to earn a pittance of highly "conditional" love. Svali explains,

> [T]he child is left alone, for . . . hours, to an entire day as the child grows older. If the child begs the adult to stay, and not leave, or screams, the child is beaten . . . The trainer will then "rescue" the child, feed and give it something to drink and bond with the child as their "saviour". [1996]

Svali (ibid.) explains that her abusers conditioned babies to associate nurturing and attention with night-time and rituals, and abandonment with daytime, a time of no rituals, so that the infant "eventually will associate cult gatherings with feelings of security".

Bonds of romantic love are also exploited, including ritual marriages between ego states and key abusers. Two children are sometimes married to exploit each child for long-term control of both. Such "weddings" often include exchange of bodily fluids to "attach" the spirits of each child to the other.

Programmers understand that genuine loving bonds are a great threat to ongoing control. The need for love may override the fear of torture, helping victims break free. So, sophisticated abusers seek to extinguish all hope for love. Protectors may be impersonated, or drugged and brought to events, to make them appear as abusers.

Set-ups are used to destroy trust in law enforcement and child protection. One victim was made to believe that fire sirens meant that her abusers were watching. Police sirens played during abuse, and abusers in police uniforms, further cement fear. Many abuser groups include actual police officers.

Psychotherapy may be the greatest threat to programming. Many survivors report that when they begin therapy, their abusers intensify their programming to reinforce "Don't remember–Don't tell" programming and to bolster "reporter" self-states to monitor any threats to programme integrity.

Exploitation of defensive identification with the aggressor

Mind control victims are essentially hostages, dependent on their abusers for their lives. Accordingly, ego states usually form who deny their own needs and identify with their abusers (Frankel & O'Hearn, 1996). Such ego-states may align with ideologies of their abusers (Stockholm Syndrome), including "national security" and spiritual ideologies, and often terrorize other self-states internally.

Programmers build on these defensive and survival responses, with characteristic pre-meditation, to serve their own ends.

Svali (1996) explains,

> Many trainers will put themselves in the person, over the internal programmers or trainers . . . The survivor may be horrified to find a representative of one of their worst perpetrators inside, but this was a survival mechanism . . . The survivor may mimic accents, mannerisms, even claim the perpetrator's life history as their own.

Ritual abuse and mind control victims are usually forced to harm others as soon as physically able. Toddlers are made to "kill" animals, even if their hands must be forced. "Claims" or names designating them as "Murderer", "Evil", etc., "cement" these beliefs in targeted self-states.

No-win double-binds force victims to believe they freely "chose" to abuse others. Survivor Lois Einhorn, PhD (2006), explains,

> I continually face "choices" as my parents ask me unanswerable questions: "Do you want to be hit or hit your sister?" "Do you want to have darts thrown at your front or throw them at your sister's front?" "Do you want to have a wire hanger put in you or do this to an animal?" . . . Through being hit with a switch, we play, "How high can we make my little tushi jump?" My father, mother, and sister each take turns and keep score. If my sister loses, she is hit further. [p. 4]

Rage is manipulated to form abuser alters. Many survivors report being subjected to days-long torture to induce rage-filled parts to form, who are then trained as soldiers or warriors. Svali (1996) explains:

> . . . The child is severely beaten, for a long period of time, by the trainer, then told to hit the other child in the room, or they will be beaten further. If the child refuses, it is punished severely, the other > child is punished as well, then the child is told to punish the other child. If the child continues to refuse, or cries, or tries to hit the trainer instead, they will continue to be beaten severely, and told to hit the other child, to direct its anger at the other child. This step is repeated until the child finally complies . . . The child will be taught that this is the acceptable outlet for the aggressive impulses and rage that are created by the brutality the child is constantly being exposed to.

Many abuser groups falsely promise key ego states that if they are loyal and obedient, they will eventually attain positions of power and reduced abuse. Most survivors have ego states who believe they were "chosen" for priest and priestess positions. These ego states are often amnestic for much of their early abuse, and only later realize that positions of power in their abuser group are only earned by "being able to take more pain" than other members.

Many abuser groups ultimately seek to develop individuals who consciously choose to be abusers. In the following description, Kernberg (1994) explains that the antisocial personality develops in a world of sadistic persecutors. This accurately depicts the world of mind control victims:

> The antisocial personality proper may be conceived as a characterologic structure so dominated by hatred that primitive, split-off idealizations are no longer possible, the world is populated exclusively by hated, hateful, sadistic persecutors, and to triumph in such a terrifying world can only occur by becoming oneself a hateful persecutor as the only alternative to destruction and suicide. [p. 701]

Svali (1996) explains that her abusers subjected children to "betrayal programming" to squelch all loving bonds and to create a world limited to "hated, hateful, sadistic persecutors" to yield an antisocial psychic structure, a "willing" persecutor. Young children were given "saviours", only to have these adults later betray them. Children were given so-called "twins" with whom to develop close bonds, only to be later forced to hurt or kill that "twin".

Schwartz (2000) explains that addiction to power is the outcome in such sub-cultures:

> Those who have not been personally exposed to those extremes may be unable fully to appreciate the compelling, corrupting, > degenerative spiral of extreme power obsessions. History has shown that once an individual or group becomes inflated with power (Hitler, Idi Amin, Pol Pot, the Duvaliers, Stalin, to name a few), a pattern of extravagant sadism, wanton cruelty, and irrational and ultimately self-destructive binges of exhibitionistic violence leads to eventual explosion or collapse. History has yet to reveal that these same diabolical dynamics are at work outside the context of war and politics—in perpetrator groups inflicting their power on children worldwide in the form of unimaginable abuse. [p. 319]

Manipulation of "free will" and "the spirit"

The concepts of "free will" and "the spirit" diverge from the more traditional psychological concepts discussed thus far. However, many mind-control survivors report that the will and spirit were the most sought-after prizes of their abusers.

Gresch (personal communication, 2009) explains that programmers go to great lengths to get victims to submit to their will:

> The goal of mind control is total obedience. But, the absolute sovereign of the inner world is the individual. A human being can't be totally obedient unless he or she has decided to be. So the torturer must make his victim believe that total obedience is the best choice . . . An artfully tailored system of mechanisms subconsciously links every idea to resist with the experience of annihilating torture.

Victims of espionage-based mind control describe most of their programmers as strict behaviourists and brain scientists who exclusively seek control of the mind and will.

Abusive cults also seek to control the spirit. This survivor recounts use of drugs, hypnosis, formal "claims" and "attachments" to "trap" her spirit: "He drugged me. He said that he put my heart [spirit] in a chest with a lock. He put his heart over my heart, and said, 'Your heart is mine, my heart is yours, I hold the key to your heart."

Survivors of both espionage and ritual groups commonly report "anti-God" programming. Faith in a loving God provides hope and support, both threats to mind control. Programmers mix torture and illusion to induce fear of God. Some victims report electroshock by the "hand of God". Many victims are programmed to invert all Judeo-Christian terms, to reverse "God" and "Satan", love and hate, and all prayers. Victims commonly experience aversions to God, religion, and houses of worship. In sophisticated witchcraft abuse, a full half of the self-state system may reject God as a threat.

Both technological and spiritual programmers manipulate victims into defining themselves as shameful, evil, and unworthy of belonging anywhere but in the abuser group. Fotheringham (2008) explains that her abusers' Catch-22 set-ups left her with "soul-deadening shame":

> At age 5, the death and dissection of a kitten was proof of the black soldier alter being able to "stomach the job," and at 6, a test proving "family loyalty" forced a choice for the dark blue alter between letting my little brother get hurt or letting our pet rabbit suffer and die . . . [A]ny capitulation in such double-bind situations left me with crippling, soul-deadening shame, guilt, powerlessness and helplessness, especially in the presence of people with authority or "good, decent people." [p. 507]

This psychologist-survivor (2009) describes the Machiavellian tactics used to make her feel aligned with the devil:

> They put me in a wooden casket and buried me . . . I heard the sound of shovels full of dirt hitting the top of the casket in a rhythm. Then I heard nothing. It was pitch-black dark. It was hard to breathe because there was dust in the air. Then, it goes blank. I believe I passed out from terror, lack of air, and believing I was dead . . . Then, I heard a sound and it was faint, then louder, then finally a shovel hitting the casket . . . I was yanked out by the same person who buried me. He said that people do not come back from the dead unless they make a deal with the devil, and he laughed in a sneering way. Then he said I had a choice. He said, "Get back in the casket, or do X." This happened many times. The things I had to do to stay out of the casket were horrible, including sexual acts using animal parts, and hurting other people and animals. If I would not do as he said or get in the casket willingly, he would force me into the casket with spiders. When I came out, he said that I was not bitten because spiders do not bite people with bad blood. If I did the abuse he ordered, he said, "Look what you did, you are > just like us, you are as evil as us, if you ever tell anyone, they will know you are as evil as us."

The "soul-deadening shame" of recalling the harm done to others is the point where many survivors abandon their healing journeys, a trap intentionally set by programmers. Schwartz (2000) explains that in victims who were made to harm others, "Identifying with abusers' ideologies and motivations not only sustains attachment [to abusers], but allows victims to endure excruciating, otherwise intolerable guilt and shame" (p. 299). Defensive dissociation of the excruciating pain of facing that one harmed another human being may be the greatest driving force behind the compulsion to repeat evil in general.

Psychotherapeutic approaches to overcoming mind control

In my experience, the process of discovering and overcoming programming is facilitated by having as much knowledge of programming as possible, means of working with survivors to obtain information about their programming, methods to effect deep inner change such that the programming is no longer effective, and stabilization and containment strategies to support the survivor during these processes.

I believe that most people need the support of another person to become conscious of, and to overcome, programming. This is normally a therapist, but is sometimes a clergyperson, friend, or significant other. For some survivor-therapists, it is a colleague. But rarely can a survivor look at programming trauma alone, even with established psychotherapeutic tools and a strong spiritual base. It is usually too painful, frightening, and disorientating to face without an external anchor for support.

"Don't remember", "Don't tell", and anti-therapy programming

Based on my work with clients and my interviews with other survivors, I have come to believe that programmers put as much, or greater, effort into "cover-up" programming to try to keep their victims from developing conscious awareness of their programming as they put into the agenda-driven programming itself. When "Don't remember" and "Don't tell" programming are overcome, the rest of the programming is much more easily made conscious and overcome.

Thus, when "Don't remember" and "Don't tell" programming are "activated", this not a time-wasting obstacle, but a primary problem requiring resolution. Working through this programming can be understood as an opportunity to analyse the resistance. Thompson (2004) explains, "[A]nalysts who 'analyze' the resistance endeavor to turn the tables on it by making the resistance, not merely an artifact of the treatment, but the focus of it" (p. 130).

When working with survivors of mind control, what we normally think of as "resistance" is compounded by the fact that it was deliberately "installed" and is "fuelled" by dissociated self-states who perceive their abuse as ongoing. By abuser design, the determinants of this resistance are less consciously available. But, the source of this resistance is the very programming we seek to resolve.

It is important not to "blame the survivor" for these "blocks". High motivation is necessary to resolve programming, but is usually not enough alone.

Many well-meaning clergy make the mistake of believing that free will, deep spiritual faith, and asking God to reveal the truth should be enough to discover and resolve all programming. But programmers understand the power of faith and programme their victims against God. Even deeply religious survivors often struggle with aversive reactions to the word "God", prayer, etc., based in unconscious anti-God programming. For some survivors, choosing an atypical word to refer to God reduces the effects of such programming. For others, more creative circumventions are required.

In ritual abuse groups low in programming sophistication, "don't remember" programming may be the most severe, deeply buried trauma. A victim of such a group was attempting to work through a ritual when she saw flashes of coloured light. In exploring the meaning of the lights, she recalled, "You tell, you die." She discovered that as a small child, she had begun to tell an aunt of her abuse. Her abusers took her to more advanced programmers to silence her. These programmers electroshocked her repeatedly, each time saying, "You tell, you die." Once this became conscious, she was able to change these words to "I choose to live". With support and guidance for each step, she was able to ask her spiritual source to go into the programming room, push the abusers away from herself, destroy the electroshock equipment, pick up the self-states formed by this trauma, and bring them to an inner healing place she had already created. Thereafter, the only "blocks" while working through the rituals were perceived "spiritual attachments" from rituals.

Gresch (personal communication, 2009), explains that one of his self-states was programmed to prevent any progress in psychotherapy:

> One of my "alters" was trained to behave properly in psychotherapeutic situations. I was conditioned to refrain from psychotherapy, but the perpetrators know that no programming is perfect. So they teach their slaves how to be a very, very compliant, and sometimes a resistant client who gives his or her therapist the feeling of healing and progress where there really is none. Be sure that whenever in a psychotherapeutic situation, alters appear and execute their programs. If the survivor is not recalling and defying the abuse and programming, then the perpetrators are holding the reins.

Many survivors are also programmed against the use of hypnosis by anyone but their programmers and handlers, since hypnosis is an effective means of obtaining information from the unconscious mind and in overcoming programming. Hypnosis is also a basic tool in programming and, therefore, very frightening to many survivors. Many therapists have learned to never use formal hypnosis or the term, "hypnosis", when working with mind control survivors. However, this does not limit the therapy process in that survivors of mind control are generally adept at narrowing and intensifying the focus of their attention, as in hypnosis, and readily use imagery of their own volition.

Knowledge of programming

I believe that therapists working with survivors of mind control must be students of programming. The more we understand, the more we recognize signs of various kinds of programming, and the more easily we can formulate the right questions to help our clients discover their programming. When we demonstrate some level of comfort in asking about programming and working with it, we begin to earn the trust of dissociated self-states.

I believe that complete "neutrality" and use of only open-ended questions has a high risk of promoting many "false negatives" in ritually abused and programmed clients. I have observed that neutral questions, such as, "and then what happened?", often leave clients too alone in their fear, causing much trauma to remain dissociated, often indefinitely. Focused questions allow for more material to come forward. For example, asking, "Was anyone else involved?", lets survivors know we are open to hearing of multi-perpetrator abuse. Asking, "Was it perceived that anything was attached in that abuse?", lets survivors know we are open to work with perceived spiritual aspects of the abuse. Asking whether anything was done to intentionally control the mind opens the subject of mind control.

Proponents of "false memory syndrome" will argue that we should not formulate questions based on prior knowledge, that this influences our clients to produce false memories. I agree there is a risk of generating confusion and acquiescence if therapists ask questions that assume the unstated. However, questions that are too general often fail to communicate that the therapist understands enough to help.

For example, if a client recalls torture in a concentration camp, questions about whether the memory is in colour or black and white may reveal that the memory involved viewing an old film. One survivor recalled that Satan revived a dead animal. When asked about the position of the body and what the body was wearing, she recalled being strapped in a chair rigged for torture and wearing a helmet with virtual reality goggles.

A more complex example is sophisticated electroshock programming. One or more coloured wires might be attached to the chest, head, genitals, extremities, etc. Programmed self-states may perceive that they are wired together and that they can only be detached from the electroshock device by cutting the wires in a particular order, turning down the electricity in specified increments, removing attached explosive devices, etc. If done out of order, programmed self-states might perceive the explosive devices at the end of the wires to detonate. Informed questions can help a client feel safe enough to remember this kind of programming: for example, "Where are the wires connected to [each alter]?", "How many wires are connected to [each location]?", "What are the colours of those wires?", "Is there anything at the end of that wire?", "Do any wires connect one [alter] to another?", "Is there anything more we need to know about the wires?" In contrast, the reliability of the information might be weakened and fear may be induced by asking, "Is there an explosive device at the end of that wire?"

Informed questions are also helpful in working through abusive rituals. Significant information may be learned by asking who dressed the child and how. Witchcraft abusers often place jewellery, painted words, body substances, etc., on victims to "attach" themselves. It may help to ask who brought the child to the event, who was there, if artefacts were used and their significance, etc. Since abusers often compete for spiritual dominance of victims, it is often revealing to ask, "Did anyone else do anything to harm the child before or after this event?" If such questions are not asked, survivors will sometimes work through a ritual without discovering and resolving the most adverse and controlling elements.

The more we know about programming, the more skilfully we can also side-step programmed self-destruction, health, and mental health consequences. The host may be determined to defy all such programming. However, the entire programmed purpose of some self-states is to trigger punishment programming, and these functions are executed independently of the host.

For example, complex programmes have "failsafes", such as bombs, booby-traps, back-ups, and re-sets. Programmes may be networked to activate multiple programmes if there is interference with any one programme. Sophisticated programmers install removal procedures, including codes, so they can remove, replace, and redo programmes. Removal of such programmes requires a cautious, methodical approach. If the programmer said a specific removal code must be used, the affected self-states often perceive that only that exact code can erase that programme. To these self-states, the programmer may be perceived as God. Generally, to remove such programming, the exact code must be found, the programmed removal steps followed, and each element undone within the reality of the programmed self-states.

I will not minimize the difficulty of researching programming. "Don't remember" programming makes reliable information hard to come by. And there are so many kinds of programmes, it is a daunting task. Additionally, there is much misinformation, as well as probably deliberate disinformation, on the Internet.

None the less, we can learn much from survivors' written accounts and from consultation with survivors and colleagues. Information about specific forms of programming is often too sensitive for large Internet forums. There is a risk that specific case examples can get back to a client's abusers and that those abusers may retaliate against that client for "telling". Inexperienced therapists may disclose too much detail to clients, resulting in fear, confusion, or negative programming consequences. Generally, therapists working with mind control survivors "play our cards close to our chests" so that we do not help programmers outpace us with their strategies. As one survivor told me, "You are part of the experiment."

Establishing safety

It has been my experience that almost all survivors of ritual abuse and mind control benefit from the use of a formal process to "protect the space" prior to depth therapy work to overcome programming.

I tell my clients that when they are in my office, it is a place dedicated solely to their healing, and that both they and I have the right and the power to assert our will to protect the sanctity of this place from anyone or anything that might intend otherwise.

Most clients benefit from the use of a formal declaration or prayer for this purpose. For many non-religious clients, their declaration is simply a setting of an intention. It may begin with, "By my will", "I declare", etc. Religious clients may do the same, or pray to, or in the name of, their spiritual source.

Before depth work, I ask my clients if they want to say their declaration/prayer or have me say it. Almost always, they choose for me to say it. The effect is very calming and focusing.

This sample declaration is by an atheist:

> All energies and entities that are not part of our true self must leave immediately to at least 50 feet away from all sides of this place. This is my place to heal. No entry of any kind is permitted for any reason. Nothing can be seen, heard, or felt in any way by any entity not a part of our self. I do not permit any thoughts, distortions, manipulations, videos, pictures, fears, sickness, pain, or other feelings to enter. This is my place of healing. All entities must comply.

Using this declaration, material could be discovered and processed that was previously blocked. When, none the less, the work became blocked, reasserting the declaration unblocked it.

This prayer/declaration is by a survivor with a broad-based, vs. specifically religious, faith in God:

> In God's Divine Light and Love, I command any parts not truly my creation that do not serve the truth and light of the Creator to leave now, never to return. I bless them and send them back to their source and their family.

Clients who discover victimization by witchcraft cults often declare or pray protection against the kinds of spiritual attack used by such abusers, including refusing parts of their abusers' spirits, their demons, curses, hexes, vexes, threats, closing portals, and turning back astral pathways. Victims of such cults often sense that particular "forms of evil" are being sent as we begin a session, and occasionally within the work. This is usually more easily managed than a "block" based in prior spiritual programming, which usually must be made conscious and resolved. Most clients find that they need only, in prayer or declaration, refuse to allow each form of perceived attack. This generally "clears" the way for the work to proceed and reduces any perceived interference later in the session.

Making programming conscious

Programming works when it remains intact and undisturbed in dissociated self-states and in the unconscious mind. Conversely, programming is disabled when it becomes conscious and is then defied or changed.

I use the term "defiance" to refer to the assertion of one's will against doing or believing as one's abusers and programmers directed, trained, conditioned, hypno-suggested, claimed, etc. I use "change" to refer to making modifications in the unconscious mind, inner world, or self-states. The survivor may relocate a self-state from a site of torture to a healing place in the inner world. Programmed directives and claims can be changed to self-affirming statements, as in the survivor who replaced, "You tell, you die", with "I choose to live". Toxins, explosive substances, and drugs can be removed in prayer by a spiritual source or "beamed out" as per Star Trek. Programme removal codes can "erase" programmed structures from the internal landscape. Programme reset codes can be changed to impossible stimuli, for example, a one-inch tall baby giraffe with peppermint breath whistling Dixie. Perceived malevolent human spirits and entities can be expelled by assertion of will or prayer. Once these modifications are made in the inner world, they tend to "stick" and do not require ongoing conscious effort. What programmers initially established in the inner world through torture, illusion, and hypno-suggestion, the survivor now re-sculpts in ways that serve the self.

Another necessary quality is the desire, perhaps the decision, to face the past trauma. The significance of this decision is eloquently shared here by Rutz (2003). I share this with many clients:

> In those early days as the bits and pieces of my life were expressed on the pages of my journal I was afraid all of the time—24–7. I was flooded with memories, flashbacks, and nightmares. Fear was my number one major obstacle to overcome before any real work could be done. I was afraid of remembering and I was afraid not to remember. I was afraid the cult would somehow know I was talking and send someone to exterminate me. I was afraid the memories were really true. I was afraid I was a liar and for some reason making it all up. I eventually came to accept and know that no matter what; I had already lived through the worst. Remembering, understanding, feeling and incorporating those experiences was the pathway I walked to slowly integrate my alters.
> Fear consumed me until I finally let go and allowed the details of my life to flow from my mind to the paper and then in therapy through my mouth. I found that letting my alters finally have a voice and speak the truth was the only way through the fear. My > alters found painting and drawing to be a perfect expression for getting scenes recorded—peoples [sic] faces, places, buildings, ceremonies. I never knew what was going to be painted or drawn, I just gave my alters free reign. Years later when I actually was able to match real people and places with these, the validation was overwhelmingly powerful and helped me to understand what truly happened to me.

"Who" works in therapy to overcome programming?

The work of becoming conscious of programming, defying and changing it, is accomplished in a highly focused mental state. The intense affect associated with discovering this trauma must be either tolerated, distanced from defensively, symbolically contained, or regulated with intense cognitive focus, as LeDoux (1996) suggests, "getting the cortex to control the amygdala". At the close of the session, the survivor is usually both physically and mentally exhausted.

"Who" in the self-state system needs to do this work? Who can tolerate it?

For many years, I thought that the host must be the ego state to work with in therapy to discover and resolve programming. This was based on work with a number of survivors with strong hosts who embodied much "true self" and who functioned somewhat as a hub for the entire self-state system.

However, in some cases, the host functions more as a superficial shell, like a chameleon adapting to each setting, or as a programmed façade, than as "true self" acting on its own behalf. This kind of host is inadequately connected to the survivor's needs and history, and lacks the emotional forbearance to face the abuse. However, as other ego-states successfully address programming, an initially weak host often becomes more "real", "full", and able to tolerate painful and frightening memories.

Relatively developed ego states with a significant sense of self that extends beyond the torture they endured, and who seek the highest good for the whole self, can sometimes engage in therapy to work through programming. In some cases, these are "hard", "tough", rebellious ego states, not aligned with the aggressor, but true advocates for the self. Their detachment from vulnerable emotions is a tool that often helps them confront memories of torture.

Sometimes, ego states originally heavily programmed for system oversight functions decide to defy their abusers and change "sides". These ego states know much more than their own experience, having been programmed for key monitoring functions, such as recorder and reporter alters, or regulatory functions, such as alters that control "switching" between the host and programmed self-states, or system leadership roles, such as alters with significant status in their abuser groups.

Gresch (personal communication, 2009) worked through his programming with the help of his "mediator", programmed as system administrator to (1) steer his front personality, which was only a staged façade, and keep it amnestic for the programming, (2) deactivate his "kernel" (original self), and (3) ensure that his torture-hypno-conditioned alters, all off-shoots of the mediator, executed their duties as directed. When the mediator decided to defy his programmers, its knowledge of the system helped overcome the programming.

Miller (2008) discusses the importance of working with system leaders, especially those who believed their abusers' lies, false promises, and threats, to discover their abusers' deceptions and to gain the co-operation of the alters beneath them in the internal hierarchy. Then, internal observer and recorder alters can assist the therapist in selecting the most critical memories that need to be worked through.

Fotheringham (2008) had a self-created record keeper who hid boxes of records unbeknown to her abusers. This alter was able to later help her work through memories of the abuse:

> Unbeknownst to my handler and trainers, a record keeper alter split off and got stuck at age eight, due to an overload of righteous outrage and hate from witnessing and recording too much hateful, horrific wrongness and injustice. Most of the "boxes of records" were kept by this alter and hidden in my inner tunnels. Luckily, "files in folders" had recently been introduced and instituted as the main storage system of my inner world, so this absence amazingly went unnoted, and the records remained pure and intact until this alter was discovered in my late 30's [sic]. As a result of this > particular split, a significant piece of my natural activist/defender voice escaped later "adjustments and fine-tuning," and was never caught in the "shutdown and discard" programming which happened later. [p. 510]

Many survivors have the experience that parts of the self went out-of-body during abusive events and saw the events from a bird's eye-view. Other ego states were perceived to hide within the body as they watched the abuse. From these vantage points, these parts often "see" through abusers' illusions, disguises, tricks, film, etc., and have more knowledge than directly tortured self-states.

Victims of abusive witchcraft often have a hidden ego state who was largely self-created to fend for itself in the world of abusers. This ego state often "watches" the abuse as it occurs. At some point, especially within a respectful therapy relationship, this part may question the world-view, theology, and agenda of the abusers. This part can be of tremendous help in resolving programming if it joins forces with the true self or a strong host. However, these significant kinds of shifts do not tend to happen early in the recovery process.

In many cases, memories of programming are initially registered in a multitude of self-states, and these alters join forces to process these. Many therapists invite all self-states affected by a particular event to meet in an internal therapy room to go through the event. Fotheringham (2008) explains,

> [E]xperiences were . . . often fragmented as they occurred. This meant that one alter could be "out" for an event, while one or more of [the] base alters "siphoned off" the feelings, emotional states, and/or pain that went with whatever was experienced, without truly being out in the body. Due to this, each alter's piece of the memory had to be accessed and addressed before the whole experience could be considered reclaimed and healed. [p. 497]

Fotheringham (personal communication, 2010) explains that her host and alters worked together to discover her programming. Her host provided intention and focus by deepening into whatever emotional or somatic state she was experiencing. She focused on the feeling and how she felt it in her body, asking, "What's this feeling about; where does it come from? What is it connected to? What is its root cause? What does this feeling have to tell me?" (see Watkins's "affect bridge", 1971, and "somatic bridge", 1992). Then, her trauma-bearing states, and states perceived to have observed the abuse, often from out of the body, would share the memories. She found that her emotions were, in essence, a synthesis of her trauma experiences, and her greatest tool in guiding her to discover her memories.

Rutz (personal communication, 2009) similarly found that all involved alters had to contribute to resolve their programming, often by initially addressing the fear of the alter in the greatest pain:

> [I]f it was a ritual abuse situation, it was possible that four or five alters would be part of it. One for the pain, one for the ritual, one for being transported, etc. etc. . . . I think that the reason many DID people have trouble recalling what happened to them is that you most always have many different alters as part of one situation. It is not possible to recall the entire event unless you get the perspective of each alter involved. If you can work through the fear of the alter presenting with all the pain, you have the possibility of actually reaching the rest. Many times I would remember events backwards, and then lastly put it all together and understand and feel the ramifications of it all.

In some cases, the above methods are adequate to discover and resolve programming. In other cases, many programmed self-states are "frozen" in time and space in sites of torture and are inaccessible to the survivor and therapist. If they "come forward", they often bring overwhelming pain, terror, and drugged states with them, restricting the capacity for mental focus, and flooding the psyche with their distress. Many self-states cannot participate because they are too fragmentary, limited to the function they originally served during the abuse to suffer pain or terror or perform a circumscribed behaviour.

Much programming is held in place by self-states in hiding. Many hide in terror. Some are hidden in compliance with torture-hypnotic directives to "go to" particular locales in the unconscious mind, and are now "too far away" to be reached, often behind walls or chasms installed in programming. Some survivors have groups of self-states programmed to internally "reside" apart from each other by programmers with different agendas. These groups are usually largely unknown to each other. Even "watchful" parts may not have been able to witness the entirety of some events.

In victims of ritual abuse, affected self-states often perceive themselves to be controlled by malevolent spiritual attachments. It is only after much of the "spiritual programming" is "undone" that these self-states feel "free" enough of spiritual evil to participate in therapy in any way.

So, in many cases, the survivor needs more than a strong host or other strong ego states to work through programming. "Don't talk", "Don't tell", and anti-therapy programming are aimed at silencing hosts and other key ego states. Registration of programming events is often spread across many self-states, many hidden. Some self-states are obedient or loyal to their abusers. Some believe the theology or illusions, tricks, and lies of their abusers. And some programming is placed directly in the unconscious mind, "beneath" the level of all self-states.

How can the survivor overcome these barriers to consciously processing their programming?

Obtaining a meta-view

One solution to many of these obstacles is to work with the survivor to develop a means of obtaining a meta-view of the survivor's trauma history and self-state system. A few methods to achieve a meta-view include work with internal self helpers (ISHes), work with a strong self-reflective "true self", work with the unconscious mind, and work with the survivor's spiritual source. These are somewhat overlapping constructs and each survivor and therapist will define them differently.

An internal self helper may be considered a specialized ego state or a superconsciousness beyond ego states. Many therapists and clients understand it as spiritual in nature; others understand it in purely psychological terms. Conceptions of the ISH include the spiritual self, spirit, soul, the part connected to God, a higher self, source of inner wisdom, inner guide, co-therapist, observing ego, hidden observer, central organizing force, an ego-state aware of all other self-states (a hub), holder of all memory and life experience, and the unconscious or subconscious mind itself (Adams, 1989; Comstock, 1991).

Some survivors and therapists ask why the wise, system-savvy ISH cannot be the host. My observation is that ISHs expend great mental energy to be "up front". They can sustain this only briefly, although this can be extended, especially within the support of a therapy relationship.

In some people, the "true self" and ISH are much the same. For others, an ISH is a specialized ego state that one accesses in a highly focused or meditative state, while the "true self" is broader in scope. In internal family systems therapy, the "Self" is considered to be the undamaged core identity and the "system leader" a therapist to the "internal family" (Goulding & Schwartz, 1995; Nichols & Schwartz, 1991). Internal family systems therapists help clients move into the position of the "Self" to work with their dissociated ego states. For other therapists, the "true self" is viewed as something that must develop more gradually, through increased capacity for self-reflection, genuine expression of affect, integration of trauma memory, and increased critical thinking (Schwartz, 2000).

For Gresch, only his true self, whom he views as the "one-and-only person", could discover and overcome his programming. Gresch views all alters, including the host, as originating in this true self, and having long ago submitted to executing scripted roles in response to torture and training designed to break the will. When the survivor becomes aware that he or she "created alters" to comply with the abusers, this critical "break-through" allows the true self to make the choice to defy the programmers and discard the roles and alters. The most challenging step to this critical act of defiance is to reduce the fear that had kept these memories and the true self hidden (personal communication, 2009).

A third means of obtaining a meta-view is to work with the unconscious or subconscious mind (UM). Fortunately, it is not necessary for my purposes here to attempt to define the elusive UM. It will suffice to say that therapists and survivors who use the UM as a resource to work through trauma generally view it as a holder of all memory and information about all self-states. Many also view it as a source of wisdom, the spiritual self, and the connection to God.

Work with the client's spiritual source is also a means to obtain a meta-view. The spiritual source may be God of an established religion, a broader "higher power" or source of love, the spirit within, or light, love, truth, etc. Some survivors prefer an animal that symbolizes strength or protection. For some survivors, there are limits to the material that can be obtained through work with a spiritual source. For other survivors, one's spiritual source provides an effective meta-view.

Some survivors are able to focus inward to obtain a meta-view to make their programming conscious, and to overcome it, without the assistance of a therapist, friend, or loved one. They have usually already done a great deal of inner work on themselves, and they are usually currently safe. Some have a strong spiritual foundation. Some use art, writing, or sand trays to increase inner focus. Some need only the support of an empathic witness to do the work. Some describe having internal ISHs who are always working to undo programming.

These survivors are the exceptions. In my experience, most survivors cannot do meta-view work unassisted. It requires a state of deep internal focus and external support is needed to stay grounded. Most survivors also need help to structure and tolerate this hard work. I have found it tremendously helpful for the therapist to help the survivor develop a formal procedure to obtain a meta-view to discover programming, to provide much guidance in overcoming it, and to help contain noxious trauma-derived affect and somatic sensations that arise in the process.

Development of a formal procedure to make programming conscious

Before beginning the hard work of making programming conscious and overcoming it, I spend a good deal of time working with clients to develop tools that create enough structure and safety to do this difficult work, that allow for a meta-view of trauma memory and the self-state system, and that facilitate resolution of programming. These tools include:

1. Obtaining a family tree and history, education and work history, areas of residence, etc., for future reference.
2. Creation of a formal declaration or prayer to "protect the space" at the start of depth work.
3. Maintaining deep respect for the client's free will. I often ask, "Is it your free will to do this work?" before processing programming. During the work, I often ask, "Do I have permission to ask . . .?" The choice to proceed, in itself, helps to reduce anxiety and increase focus. It is important to avoid power struggles, even when there is risk of harm to self, even when re-contact with abusers may be imminent. Pressure to control any thoughts, feelings, or behaviour is likely to be experienced as reminiscent of abuser control. Efforts to control high-risk behaviours may be perceived as a promise of more protection than the therapist can provide, ultimately leading to disappointment, and can make the client feel disempowered or overly dependent on the therapist. The therapist can work with the survivor to increase safety, but the motivation to work to stay safe must originate in the survivor.

4. Exploring the client's deepest values and spiritual beliefs to determine the role of this "spiritual source" in the work. Beliefs as non-specific as the right to freedom, truth, healing, or love for animals can be powerfully applied to resolve programming. Spiritual beliefs can help in protecting the safe place, containment strategies, effecting change in the inner world, "rescuing" states from sites of trauma, and for healing of traumatized states.
5. Creating a container to store pain, fear, spinning, body fluids, and drugged and toxic states, in order to reduce flashbacks and flooding, and to side-step programming to re-experience trauma. I often say, "There is no value in reliving pain and fear; go ahead and place those in your container." For extreme torture, repeated guidance may be required, for example, "Continue to store the shock", or, "Reduce the spinning by half, reduce it by half again. Let me know if it has been stored." In some cases, noxious states and substances may need to be stored in separate containers. The client's spiritual source can also be used to contain or remove unwanted feelings and substances.

Rutz (2003) explains how she used a toy box to contain memories between sessions and how she learned to be able to "stay in the present" in therapy:

> [We] all know how awful abreaction is, even though it is effective at allowing the alters to tell and getting a really accurate picture of what took place . . . [I]n the beginning I was doing nothing but abreacting. I would find myself in my mind in a room looking at a closed door. After opening the door for the first time I always knew I would find a traumatic scene from my past, generally where a new alter had been created.

When I left the therapists [sic] office I would have to put what I had been working on away, so that I could effectively live during the week without being bombarded by the new material. I created an internal safe place to put the memories that we worked on in each session so that I would not be flooded in between. It was a toy box and I would set a stuffed animal on top before I left the office. During the week we would journal or not, which ever felt safe, and then let the memories back out of the toy box again in therapy the following week. This was different from the safe place my alters eventually built to go to for healing.

Later after my therapist had attended a seminar we began using grounding techniques so that while I was remembering I could also remain in the present. This was much less painful and traumatic to the system and every bit as effective as pure abreaction. My grounding technique was really simple. I taught myself that when I would begin to abreact and lose total control, I would grab the arm of the chair and bring myself back to the awareness of where I was. That insured that I was still in the present, and this happened in the past and did not have the power to hurt me anymore.

6. Creating an inner place of healing or recovery, a place where self-states can be "rescued to" from the sites of their abuse, to physically and emotionally heal. This place can include nurturing ego states, spiritual help, pets, soothing things, etc. A pre-established healing place increases the capacity to discover programming, including lowering resistance posed by frightened self-states.

   Rutz (2003) explains how she used a healing place for alters to rest and heal and for grounding:

The same visualization that was used by perps for programming enabled us to undo that programming. We created a healing place inside where anyone who chose to could go and rest and get help from other alters in healing. I found parts that couldn't speak because of programming or being preverbal and a helper alter would agree to be used for the memory retrieval work. That part would remain grounded so that the emotional impact was not so overwhelming. I believe this is really important and could cause system wide shut down if we attempt to handle too much at one time.

7. Creating a place to do the work of making programming conscious and resolving it. A place devoted to this work greatly facilitates meta-view work. Some survivors readily create such a place. Others believe that there can never be any safe place. Some have been programmed against any inner safe place (Svali, 1996, Chapter Two). If a survivor feels such a place is not possible, I explain that many others initially felt the same way, yet created one. It is essential to maintain a stance of "We will create a way around every abuser intimidation and machination", in order to overcome programming.

   The survivor decides "who" will work in this place. It may be one or more of a host, ISH, the "true self", etc. Prior to "going to" the working place, it often helps to have all other states go somewhere to be distracted, such as a playground.

   Safety measures can be established to travel to this place, such as a secret entry or being taken by one's spiritual source. I suggest that the journey be made possible only when it is of their genuine free will and exclusively for the purpose of their healing, to prevent abuser coercion or threats being used to force survivors to reveal their place.

   Additional security measures are needed with very fearful survivors. Once the designated ego states are in this place, I let them know that they can develop additional safeguards to further hide it from outside detection. Programmers install illusions, such as buildings, guards, locks, and internal barriers in victims' inner worlds to control them. Survivors can use this same imaginative capacity and malleability of their internal worlds to their own advantage. The survivor ultimately has more control of his/her inner world than a programmer ever could.

   Fotheringham (2008, personal communication) explains how she created places for her healing:

As part of my healing, I adopted the use of structures for my own benefit. When I had a need for a specific alter or group of alters that could not be met within the already existing structures, or by > adapting them for my purpose, one of my alters . . . would design a new structure to serve the needed purpose. I ended up with, among others, a Healing House with a Healing Hot Springs Hot Tub . . . a huge 4 story Discovery Lodge with an Intensive Care Unit and "Memory Processing Unit" (to ease extreme suffering of individual alters trapped in torture, by extracting and storing memories for later retrieval and processing), a Nursery (with soundproofed room for the one who screamed all the time) . . . and big, individually equipped dorm rooms for the various groups of children, and the 24 Rear Guardsmen who mostly became child-care-givers!

I suggest clients use their creative capacity to hide their working place from everyone, including me. Only the voice of the therapist need be heard there. I say, "Only you need to know how you hide this place. You can create a decoy, like a painting can hide a safe, like a secret-door bookcase can hide a room. Your first place can be a counterfeit with an illusion that makes it look like the work is stuck, with your true place anywhere in the universe, perhaps accessible only through your spiritual source."

Once the designated ego states are in the working place, it is important to help them feel "grounded" there so they do not relive the trauma memories being processed. I might say, "Feel where you are sitting, tell me what you see, what is the temperature, etc." While working, if the client begins to relive a memory, I remind them, "Stay in your working place without 'going into' the trauma."

A procedure should also be developed to help clients leave the working place at the close of the work, such as "locking" or otherwise securing it and grounding themselves back in the office.

Once back in the therapy room, most clients need to process the trauma they have discovered in more conscious, less intently focused, more emotional ways. Some clients choose to "leave" their memories in their working place until the next session. Over time, they develop increased tolerance for conscious memory of the trauma they are processing, and reserve this option for the most difficult material.

8. Establishing procedures to obtain information while in the working place. Clients who work with an ISH or the "true self" usually use a fairly straightforward process of choosing to work and deep focus on exploring the origins of particular symptoms or snippets of memory. Clients working with a spiritual source usually pray to be shown the truth about what happened. Clients working with the unconscious mind may simply get a sense of "knowing", or they may create additional imagery to know or see "answers" and images. One survivor lowered her questions in a bucket into a well that represented her unconscious mind; the bucket brought the answers or images forward. Others watch words or images on a television screen, read the answers from a book, etc.

Material to explore and kinds of questions to ask

Some survivors proceed to discover programming with a simple intention to know about anything that was done to control the self. It is often expeditious to focus on the most pivotal information as soon as possible, by asking something like: "What is the most important event to look at?", or to begin with the earliest programming, since it is often foundational for later programming.

More often, current material supplies the direction for the work: a disturbing thought or impulse, a flashbulb memory, a stimulus that "triggered" distress, a somatic sensation or symptom, a sense of fear or threat, a dream, symbols in art, writing, or sand trays, or efforts to understand a particular self-state.

In the early stages of using this process, and later as particularly sensitive information is broached, it is helpful to repeatedly ask, "Do I have permission to . . .", or, "Would it cause any harm to look at . . ."

Early in the process of doing this work, and at the beginning of a day's work, small, specific questions help to "grease the works" and are more manageable because the survivor is in a trance-like state, "somewhere" between the external and internal worlds, between mental clarity and dream-like primary process thought. Small, focused questions also reduce fear of remembering and telling.

Formulating questions is the real art of this work. Questions should be focused, yet not leading. Because this work requires such intense mental effort, it helps to repeat what the client just said within the next question: "And when [what client just said], what happened next?" (www.davidgrove.com/).

When beginning with current material, a good first question is whether that issue has something to do with a particular event. If the answer is yes, the next question might be, "Do I have permission to ask for the age of the body at the time of this event?" It helps to set the stage for the event by asking who dressed the child, who took the child there, whether it occurred outdoors or indoors, who was present, the position of the body, etc. These concrete details generally make the memory more accessible, and the survivor may then be able proceed in the order of what occurred.

Important areas to explore include how the child was abused and whether anything was done to put the child in an altered state of consciousness, for example, drugs, spinning, suffocation, near-death, etc. It is important to learn about what may have been placed on, or in, the body of the child. It is critical to determine whether new self-states were formed, whether their purpose was to serve the self or the abusers, and the degree the abusers used these newly formed self-states for their purposes. A useful question is, "For what purpose, or in response to what, was this part created?" It is important to discover the words spoken to harm, control, define, or name self-states. Sometimes, it is important to explore whether the information provided is accurate or a product of deception, hallucinogens, hypnosis, illusion, film, perceived spiritual evil, etc.

Perceived spiritual effects must be explored, including whether it was perceived that anything was attached to, or "captured" from, the child in this event, and whether words were spoken for spiritual control, such as claims, curses, commands, and covenants. It may be important to discover whether this event resulted in the perception of portals or astral pathways that allowed abusers continued spiritual access to the child.

Sample beginning of a dialogue to discover programming

Is there a particular event we have to look at to help this part? Yes.

Do I have permission to ask the age of the body at the time of that event? Yes.

How old was the body at the time of this event? Three.

Do I have permission to ask about the location of this event at age three? Yes.

Was this event indoors or outdoors? Indoors. In a house.

And this event in a house, was it where the body lived or another house? Another.

Do I have permission to ask whose house? No.

Do I have permission to ask who took the child to this house? Yes.

Who took the child to this house? The grandmother.

Did the grandmother dress the child for this event? Yes.

How did the grandmother dress the body? A dress.

May I ask the colour of the dress? Black. [Often a colour used for sacrifice.]

Did the child wear anything else? A chain.

Where was the chain worn? Around the waist.

Did anything hang from the chain? Yes. A locket.

Did the locket have a stone, a carving? A portrait.

Am I allowed to ask the subject of the portrait? No.

Did the grandmother place this locket on the child? No.

Am I allowed to ask who placed the locket? The lady in the portrait.

Am I allowed to know if this person was a rival of the grandmother? Yes, she was.

When the grandmother brought the child to this event, did she present her to someone? The rival.

Did either of them speak? Yes.

May I know who spoke first? The grandmother. She said, "I give you my granddaughter."

Did the rival respond? Yes, she said, "You have done well."

At this event at three, were others present? Yes.

How many others? Twelve.

Were any male? No.

Were there other children present? Yes.

May I know how many? Three.

Were any male? One newborn baby boy.

Am I allowed to ask the ages of the two female children? Three and six.

Were these children already known to the child? Yes.

Am I allowed to know who they were? No.

Where were the other children when the body was presented to the rival? The girls were on altars. The boy was with one of the ladies.

After the rival received the child, what happened next? She was placed on the altar.

Who placed the child on the altar? The grandmother.

On an altar by herself? With the other three-year-old.

Were words spoken when the grandmother placed the body on the altar? Yes.

Am I allowed to know the words? Part.

What part may I know? "I give you to . . ."

Spoken by the grandmother? Yes.

And when she spoke those words, what happened next? . . .

This continued piecemeal, until the event was completed. Then, "disconnecting" the harm, physical, mental, spiritual, etc., culminating in rescue of the three-year-old ego state, can begin, as follows.

Resolution of programming once it is made conscious

Making programming conscious is very challenging. Resolving programming once it is made conscious is comparatively easy. It relies on defiance of programmers' directives, training, conditioning, and hypno-suggestions; assertion of one's will against abuser attempts at spiritual bondage; use of one's imaginative capacity and the malleability of the unconscious mind to re-sculpt the inner world to one's own needs and wishes; communication and negotiation with significant ego states; "rescue" of self-states from their abusers and from the sites of their torture to an inner place of healing; in some cases, integration of ego states into the self. These changes are most deeply accomplished while the survivor is still in the inner place created to do the work of discovering and resolving programming.

Svali (1996) explains that survivors can use a limitless creative capacity to overcome programming:

> The good news is that this internal landscape is highly malleable. Once parts are "found", and the binds that trap them in harmful sites are discovered and resolved, they can be helped to permanently relocate to places of safety and healing in the internal world. And scenes and structures installed in the mind to cause harm can be removed. In essence, the work of healing and disabling programming uses to the survivor's advantage what programmers used to their disadvantage: the limitless malleability of the internal landscape.

Krystal (1988) captured the essence of this therapeutic approach when he wrote about helping traumatized alexithymic patients achieve a "wish-based psychic structure" and the need for patients to be in trance-like states to modify self- and object-representations:

> The patient, formerly suffering a psychic 'hole', has to be helped (at some risk) to convert the absence of psychic representation to a wish-based psychic structure. [p. 482]
> In my extensive work on this subject, I came to the conclusion that because the problems of alexithymics are a reaction to conflicts registered as preverbal, infantile, or purely affective memories, the usual approaches of psychoanalytic psychotherapy fail us. To deal with such early and/or severe trauma, the patients have to experience trancelike states in which modifications of self- and object-representations can be achieved. [p. 481]

Conscious processing of tricks, illusions, lies, and set-ups

Once programming tricks, lies, films, set-ups, etc., are made conscious, revealed for what they are, and the affected self-states are discovered, they lose their potency. The survivor now has the conscious capacity to mentally reject the intended messages, perceptions, and set-ups. Programmed triggers come under conscious control. In some instances, triggers are further mastered by changing them to impossible stimuli, like a purple and blue polka-dotted apple playing the saxophone.

Self-states formed or harmed in these events need help to leave these scenarios. They need physical, emotional, and often spiritual, separation from the abuse they endured.

Physical separation involves guiding the survivor to use his or her spiritual source, strong and helpful ego states, powerful animals, or even inanimate devices, to "go into the memory", push the abusers back away from abused self-states, detach them from the devices of torture, cleanse their bodies of any abusive drugs, toxins, blood, sexual substances, etc., destroy the equipment (electroshock machines, restraints, film projectors), and to relocate the affected self-states to the inner place of healing. Most survivors readily employ such suggestions. Some survivors initially express that these interventions feel artificial or invalidate their abuse. I share that I agree that this work will not change that this abuse occurred, and the memory will never disappear, but that for self-states who perceive themselves "stuck" in the sites of their abuse, this "adds an additional frame" to this memory, a corrective ending, and that this ending also reflects truths, such as their love and compassion for hurt parts of themselves.

Psychological and "spiritual" separation also usually require guidance by the therapist, at least initially. Survivors have been so intimidated and dominated by the mind-set of their abusers that they initially feel unable to think outside of the abusers' frame. For example, survivors manipulated into harming others usually believe, as their abusers intended, that they are deeply evil. Therapists have the natural impulse to want to argue with survivors about their having been given no good choices, that everyone has a breaking point when tortured, that there is a survival instinct that takes over when one's life is threatened, etc. These approaches may help in the long term, but rarely have an impact short-term. The guilt is existential. And it is natural to unconsciously seek to undo harm done to others through suffering and self-punishment. I have found that a more useful immediate intervention is to guide the survivor through a pronouncement or prayer and to ask them to repeat my words if they feel that I am speaking truth, and to stop and correct me if I have it wrong. I say something like:

> I, [name], on behalf of all of my parts, refuse to submit to [abusers'] claim that I am as evil as they are. The truth is that I never wanted to do [act]. I was coerced by [abusers]. I did not do [act] of my free will. They gave me two choices that were both unbearable. It is a lie that I agreed to this act. Any agreement made under torture, threat, or trickery is invalid, legally and spiritually. I reject their statement that I was evil. That lie belongs to them, not to me. I choose the truth that I was an innocent, terrified child who deserved love, protection, and respect.

Generally, all of these steps must occur before affected self-states can be rescued to a healing place. If affected self-states are unable to be moved to a healing place, it usually signifies that critical elements of the event have not been discovered and resolved. It is helpful to ask, "Is there something else we need to know before these parts can go to your healing place?" On occasion, ego states need to "tell their stories", release their emotions and sorrow, before they can be relocated.

Conscious choice against directives, claims, curses, covenants, threats, etc.

Words that abusers and programmers pair with torture have a deep and devastating effect on their victims. It is important to reject or renounce verbal commands and proclamations, especially words to define the roles or nature of self-states, assigned names, claims of spiritual ownership or evil, curses to threaten or create expectations of harm, covenants (coerced agreements), triggers to call forward self-states, codes to access, activate, re-set, back-up, programmes, and, in many cases, to replace these in declarations or prayer with proclamations, blessings, new names, new roles and defining purposes, impossible stimuli (for triggers and codes) etc., of one's own choosing.

An anonymous survivor and psychotherapist explained the critical importance of discovering the words of programmers:

> The last and very necessary step of dismantling the structure, for me, was to remember exactly what the programmer told me and the imagery that I created from this. Once I realized that the structure was that way because of what someone told me, I was able to dissolve it permanently. Strangely, just knowing that the programmer told me to make it that way did not work. I had to remember exactly what he said and what I did in response. I did not always do exactly what they wanted, but sometimes just told them I did. What I did in response to what they said was just as important as what they said for me to get rid of the structure.

Formal declarations and prayers have a powerful effect in overcoming words intended to define, control, and harm the survivor. Here is a sample prayer to rename a self-state:

> I ask you God, on behalf of myself and all of my parts, to hold this three-year-old part of me and let her know in her heart that the abusers lied to her when they told her that her name was Unlovable. That was a lie. She has always been lovable. Please let her feel your love and let her feel our love. Please let her know that the abusers tried to give her that name so she would never feel worthy to reach out to anyone who would really love her. They knew that name was a lie when they said it. We never agreed to that name. I give that name back to the abusers. I ask you God to bless her with the new name of [survivor's choice, such as Sweet Little Girl].

Psychological and spiritual separation of perceived spiritual attachments

I believe that ritually abused clients reveal their experiences of spiritual evil only to people whom they sense are receptive to its possible existence and who convey some genuine comfort in being able to help with it. Without this support, many survivors do not allow the perception of spiritual evil to become conscious. When clients perceive the presence of spiritual evil, internally or externally, I usually work with that perception, rather than initiating dialogue about whether the perceived evil is real or not. If I were to try to convince a ritually abused client that human spirits or entities are not real, to try to reduce their fear, etc., I might stand a chance with some hosts, but no chance with self-states raised in Satanism or abusive witchcraft. Those self-states were raised in cultures rooted in theologies that such entities are more powerful and enduring than human life. And these self-states are barely orientated to the outside world. Programming is most deeply resolved when it succeeds in changing the reality of programmed alters in the inner world. Whether such "evil" is spiritually real or not, it is psychologically real to these self-states, and I believe it can only be dealt with as such.

I have found that to achieve "separation" of perceived attachments, whether this mechanism is partly spiritual or only psychological, survivors must recall the rituals in which "transfers" and "captures" were perceived to be accomplished, and then assert their will to reject each act. I tell survivors that I believe that any act intended to spiritually control children, who are not aware that they had any choice to the contrary, can now be opposed and "separated" spiritually and psychologically by a simple act of one's will, that we each have control of our spiritual self. I believe that an overwhelmed, frightened, and abused psyche is what permitted the perceived "admission" of these entities and introjects. Making the trauma conscious and the exercise of free will is what allows for their rejection and separation.

Many survivors use traditionally religious approaches or personal spiritual approaches to "remove" perceived "attachments" and to retrieve "captured" parts of the self. This work generally includes the use of a spiritual base to refuse the abusers' right to have abused them, to refuse the words intended to bind them, to refuse the spirit or entity to remain, to will it to leave, to close all perceived portals, to sever all perceived astral pathways, and to declare one's right, or ask the spiritual source, to have all parts of one's self returned, with none of the abusers' spirits, words, evil, or deities/demons attached.

Technological programming can also result in the perception of "introjects" dwelling within, often intentionally "placed" by programmers. These can also be "separated" by one's will or spiritual source.

Many survivors easily differentiate self-states from perceived introjects or entities. For others, the therapist can help the survivor differentiate these through dialogue. Self-states, even those with a hostile veneer, usually desire some human connection with the therapist, are motivated to feel "better", and their hostility has a quality of underlying fear and pain. Perceived introjects and entities generally do not establish a "felt" human connection with the therapist. Instead, they demonstrate scorn for the survivor and intense hatred for the therapist.

In many cases, when the work seems "stuck", survivors may have the sense that "spiritual evil" is interfering. If they perceive that "evil" is being "sent" in the present, survivors can usually easily refuse its presence by asserting their will in intention or prayer. In the case of perceived interference by introjects or entities "attached" in prior abuse, it usually helps to "place" these in opaque, soundproof containers, guarded by spiritual protection if the survivor wishes. As the event is processed, words of control, implements and bodily substances of abuse, attached deities, etc., can also be placed in these containers. Once the event is fully processed, the container and its contents are generally easily expelled.

I have consistently observed that when affected self-states perceive spirits and entities to be gone, the survivor experiences tremendous relief. To date, no survivor I have worked with ever felt that they had separated a part of the self in the process.

"Removal" of structures

"Removal" of "structures", especially foundational structures, can be challenging, especially early in a survivor's recovery. Some structures are "placed" with near-death torture in the unconscious mind, "beneath" the self-state system. A meta-view of the inner world is often necessary to discover such structures. The programmer's goal is for the terror of death to secure the structure against any attempt to tamper with it by the victim, or by rival programmers.

Programmers often "install" structures with booby-traps to prevent their removal. Wires to explosive or electroshock devices may connect self-states and structures. Some programmers attach "demons" or "spirits" to protect their structures. A self-state may be programmed to be a loyal servant or good soldier to guard the structure. Structures may be connected and layered, more hidden structures installed by more skilled programmers. Rival programmers often compete to control victims.

Self-states trapped within, or connected to structures, have very little, if any, self-agency. They define themselves by the reality of the programmers who dictated that the structures can only be removed by their own parameters. Some programmers install a complex series of steps that must be followed to remove a structure, including explosive devices that must first be emptied of their explosive substances, then removed, codes to deactivate booby-traps along the way, separation of "demons", a master erase code, and modification of re-set codes to prevent their use.

Stimuli associated with a programme installation often serve as re-sets and must be contained, destroyed, removed, etc. Undiscovered stimuli can later serve to re-set programming, by programme design, for example, "When you hear this song, this grid will reappear in your chest", and by classical conditioning of associated stimuli with pain, terror, and programmer commands. It is, therefore, helpful to check, "Was there anything else being perceived in this event?" Words, music, smells, tastes, sights, and physical sensations can be changed to "impossible stimuli". Tools of torture must be separated from abused states, including drugs, toxins, wires, constraints, things used to rape, body fluids (blood, semen), "spirits", and "demons". Devices and substances can be changed to benign objects, destroyed, or washed clean, by an act of will or by one's spiritual source.

Programmers may initially install structures with the requirement that in order to remove the structure, the victim must be re-tortured in the same way while saying the removal code,. In actuality, this can be accomplished in imagination only and very quickly, while the removal code is said. In doing so, it is very important that the survivor mentally remains in the safe place rather than "slip into" the site of the torture.

Some survivors remove structures, fundamental and otherwise, from the inner world without following programmer "rules". This generally requires awareness of the structure and self-states trapped within, and development of much "true self", with compassion for what all self-states endured and forgiveness for what they were forced into doing to others. This capacity for self-love, setting intentions and/or spiritual faith, can be used to free self-states from structures and to remove the structures. Many survivors report that structures only "work" if self-states connected to them perceive them as real. When the programming is made conscious, even if only in significant ISH, and the trapped self-states understand that the structure that surrounds them is only an illusion, the structure simply vanishes.

Rutz (2003) realized that creative visualization was how her programming was done and used this same capacity to erase barriers and booby-traps and to deactivate and remove structures:

> A lot of my programming revolved around the Wizard of Oz. The hourglass was used in the event I would begin to remember and talk. They would tell us that if we talked the hourglasses [sic] sand would begin to run and when it was all run out we must do ourself in. We turned the hourglass on its side so it could no longer be used to threaten us. I was also told my head would explode. When I ran into this the first time, I was driving home from therapy. My head not only felt like it was going to explode; I saw a gigantic bomb with a lit fuse. I decided that I had used visualization for helping to heal other alters and since the programming they did was done with creative visualization, I should be able to undo it in the same way. I took my fingers and snuffed the wick out—it was that simple. Knowing their lies made it so much easier to dismantle the programming . . .
> I found there were hidden parts. We took a giant eraser and internally started erasing all the lines to the boxes and triangles inside of us. We saw people coming out on stretchers, with bandages and others internally were carrying them on cots to the healing place.
>
> When I was having trouble even getting close to memories we found booby traps and land mines surrounding them, so that every time we got close we couldn't get past these. We visualized a giant pacman in our blood stream. He was sent on a search and destroy mission for any programs that were implanted and dangerous. When pacman was through destroying these he yelled, "Mission Accomplished." Our progress after this was remarkable.

Relocation of self-states to an inner healing place

Once released from programme controls, survivors can use their imaginative and spiritual capacity to "relocate" hurt self-states from sites of abuse and programme structures to a place of healing within.

Often, only "a part of a part" can be located to a healing place when an event has been processed, because that self-state was abused repeatedly over many events.

Some ego-states require therapeutic help before moving to a healing place. Many need their feelings and experiences honoured and witnessed. Many need to critically evaluate the agenda of their abusers, now that they can safely do so. Many must grieve perceived bonds to their abusers. Some need the protective function of their abuser loyalty to be understood. Some have intense rage, and need to develop constructive channels to release it, or to contain or dissolve it imagistically or spiritually.

For Rutz (2003), "Neverland" held a pre-verbal baby who never grew up and "Shadowland" held an alter trained as an assassin. When she tried to rescue these trapped alters, they were initially afraid to leave their familiar places. She needed to communicate with them to get them to safety:

> It took a longtime [sic] and a good deal of work, to find this and break free, since even after the alters found out the truth they did not want to leave their lands right away where they felt safe and come to the safe place in my system. After some internal communication the baby was rescued from Neverland. Alters simply created a bridge and crossed from there to Shadowland. Our baby part was nurtured by our alter who was trained for killing, so it was very beneficial to both those alters. The door to Neverland was burned and holes were shot in the ceiling of Shadowland to let light through . . . eventually everyone felt safe enough so that an elevator was built to the healing place and Shadowland was destroyed too.

Ongoing spiritual, psychological, and physical healing occurs in the inner healing place. I ask clients what their self-states need for physical comfort, cleansing, love (pets are a common wish), etc. They may choose to have me ask their spiritual source to provide these, or may have ISH provide these.

There is a significant easing once ego-states are relocated to the inner healing place. It is often a full resolution for programmed fragmentary self-states. Once their programming is conscious and they have been relocated to a place of healing, they only need safety, love from the self or the survivor's spiritual source, and time to heal. They need not be actively engaged in therapy or "integrated" with the "true self" or host. More substantial ego states also require much emotional release, grieving, and sharing of experience and memory with the "true self", host, and therapist. I do not encourage integration, but view it as a very personal and seamless process that usually occurs as barriers between ego states are no longer needed.

In the process of resolving, overcoming, and removing programming, major shifts occur in self-states and in the internal landscape (inner world). This can be unsettling in that the familiar is no longer so.

When large structures that housed self-states are gone, some survivors perceive a "void". This usually must be replaced. A healing place provides a home and sense of grounding for previously programmed parts. Survivors create many other new and helpful places in their inner worlds.

Many survivors discover a foundational programme structure that separated two sides of their self-state system. The host side is amnestic for the other side, where most self-states endured very serious abuse as both victims and perpetrators. Once this barrier is gone, each side must develop compassion for the other. The host must face the horrors the abuse-bound parts endured and not recoil from them. The abuse-bound side must forgive the host for not enduring more abuse and must appreciate the host's role in living the normal side of life. Ultimately, they all must face that everyone was hurt and that they share this common bond. Survivor support groups can be of great help in resolving these conflicts.

Survivors can look forward to deeply moving changes. Rutz explains (2009, personal communication),

> Each alter's job is normal to that alter. It's all they know. Just as an abused child who is being incested and is told that is love, learns to believe that lie. They don't know any better, so to them that is "Normal." An alter like Samantha only knows pain, so why wouldn't it be normal. As I was healing, it was so vital to allow each alter to choose a new job or a new way of life. For instance, Guy chose to rock the Baby part and comfort her when the barriers between Neverland and Shadowland were dissolved. Think what that meant to the system's healing to have a part that was a trained killer be able to feel love and give love. That was huge.

Once substantial work has been achieved, and enough parts are in the inner place of healing, the hidden "core", an early and central aspect of the self that the individual had kept long-hidden from abusers, or that the programmers had sequestered, may feel safe enough to make itself known to the "true self", host, and therapist. Other major integrations of the self-system may spontaneously occur. This often results in a sense of vitality. Senses may feel heightened. One survivor reported truly seeing colour for the first time. There is often a sense of truly being alive in the world for the first time.
